CACOCHY'MICAL. } adj. [from cacochymy.]
CACOCHY'MICK. } Having the humours corrupted.

It will prove very advantageous, if only cacochymick, to clarify his blood with a laxative. Harvey on Consumptions.

If the body be cachochymical, the tumours are apt to degenerate into very venomous and malignant abscesses. Wiseman.

The ancient writers distinguished putrid fevers, by putrefaction of blood, choler, melancholy, and phlegm: and this is to be explained by an effervescence happening in a particular cachochymical blood. Floyer on the Humours.

CACOCHY'MY.† n. s. [Fr. cacochymie, from the Gr. κακοχυμία.] A depravation of the humours from a sound state, to what the physicians call by a general name of a cacochymy. Spots, and discolourations of the skin, are signs of weak fibres; for the lateral vessels, which lie out of the road of circulation, let gross humours pass, which could not, if the vessels had their due degree of stricture. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

Strong beer, a liquour that attributes the half of its ill qualities to the hops, consisting of an acrimonious fiery nature, sets the blood, upon the least cacochymy, into an orgasmus. Harvey.

CACODE'MON.* n. s. [Gr. κακὸς and δαίμων. An old substantive in our language, which Bullokar notices, Skelton uses cacodemonial, Poems, p. 164.] An evil spirit; a devil.

If the vultur pick out his right eye first, then they conclude that he is in paradise; if the left, then a cacodæmon vexes him. Sir T. Herbert's Travels. p. 168.

Hie thee to hell for shame, and leave this world,
Thou cacodemon. Shaksp. Rich. II.

The prince of darkness himself, and all the cacodemons, by an historical faith, believe there is a God. Howell's Lett. ii. 10.

Nor was the dog a cacodæmon,
But a true dog that would shew tricks
For the emperour, and leap o'er sticks.
Hudibras, ii. 3.

CACOE'THES.* n. s. [Fr. cacoethe, Cotgrave; from the Gr. κακοήθεια, which is from κακοήθης.] In medicine, an incurable ulcer; generally, a bad custom; a bad habit.

There is a certain distemper, which is mentioned neither by Galen nor Hippocrates, nor to be met with in the London Dispensary. Juvenal, in the motto of my paper, terms it a cacoethes, which is a hard word for a disease, called in plain English, the itch of writing: This cacoethes is as epidemical as the small pox.
Addison, Spect. No. 582.

CACO'GRAPHY.* n. s. [Gr. κακὸς and γράφω.] Bad spelling.

The orthography or cacography, style and manner of the English language in the reigns of Henry V. and VI. are very remote from the mock Saxon of Rowley. Walpoliana, i. xxxv.

CACO'PHONY.† n. s. [Fr. cacophonie, Cotgrave; from the Gr. κακοφωνία.] A bad sound of words.

These things shall lie by, till you come to carp at them, and alter rhimes, grammar, triplets, and cacophones of all kinds. Pope to Swift.

To CA'CUMINATE.† v. a. [cacumino, Lat.] To make sharp or pyramidal. Cockeram.

*CADA'VER. n. s. [Lat.] A corpse.

Who ever came
From death to life? Who can cadavers raise? — Thus their blasphemous tongues deride the truth. Davies, Wit's Pilgrimage, v. 2. b.

CADA'VEROUS.† adj. [Fr. cadavreux, Cotgrave; from cadaver, Lat.] Having the appearance of a dead carcase.

In vain do they scruple to approach the dead, who livingly are cadaverous, for fear of any outward pollution whose temper pollutes themselves. Brown, Vulg. Err.

The urine, long detained in the bladder, as well as glass, will grow red, fœtid, cadaverous, and alkaline. The case is the same with the stagnant waters of hydropical persons. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

CA'DDIS.† n. s. [This word is used in Erse for the variegated cloaths of the Highlanders. The Gael. cadas is cotton. Caddis properly means worsted galloon.]

1. A kind of tape or ribbon.

He hath ribbons of all the colours of the rainbow; inkles, caddises, cambricks, lawns; why, he sings them over as if they were gods and goddesses. Shakspeare.

2. A kind of worm or grub found in a case of straw.

He loves the mayfly, which is bred of the codworm, or caddis; and these make the trout bold and lusty. Walton's Angler.

CA'DDOW.* n. s. A chough, or jackdaw. Huloet.

A caddow, a jackdaw; Norf. In Cornwall they call the guilliam a kiddaw. Ray.

CADE.† adj. [It is deduced, by Skinner, from cadeler, Fr. an old word, which signifies to breed up tenderly.] Tame; soft; delicate; as, a cade lamb, a lamb bred at home, Dr. Johnson says. Some have thought it, with less reason, adopted from the Lat. cado, to fall; meaning a dropped or fallen lamb, the dam of which dying, the lamb is brought up by hand, in the house. The cade lamb is a tame lamb in Norfolk and Suffolk; in Cumberland, a pet lamb, i. e. a lamb that is made much of.

He brought his cade lamb with him to mass. Sheldon, Miracles of Antichrist, p. 224.

To CADE. v. a. [from the noun.] To breed up in softness.

CADE. n. s. [cadus, Lat.] A barrel.

We John Cade, so termed of our supposed father. —— Or rather of stealing a cade of herrings. Shakspeare.

Soon as thy liquor from the narrow cells
Of close press'd husks is freed, thou must refrain
Thy thirsty soul; let none persuade to broach
Thy thick, unwholesome, undigested cades. Philips.

CADE-LAMB.* See CADE.

CADE-WORM. n. s. The same with caddis.

CA'DENCE.† } n. s. [cadence, Fr.]
CA'DENCY. }

1. Fall; state of sinking; decline.

Now was the sun in western cadence low
From noon; and gentle airs, due at their hours,
To fan the earth, now wak'd. Milton.

2. The fall of the voice; sometimes the general modulation of the voice.

The sliding, in the close or cadence, hath an agreement with the figure in rhetorick, which they call præter expectatum; for there is a pleasure even in being deceived. Bacon.

There be words not made with lungs,
Sententious showers! O! let them fall,
Their cadence is rhetorical. Crashaw.

I never heard a better [song,] why, there's a cadence able to ravish the dullest Stoick. Brewer's Lingua, (1657.) iii. 7.

3. The flow of verses, or periods.

The words, the versification, and all the other elegancies of sound, as cadences, and turns of words upon the thought, perform exactly the same office both in dramatick and epick poetry. Dryden.

The cadency of one line must be a rule to that of the next; as the sound of the former must slide gently into that which follows. Dryden.

4. The tone or sound.

Hollow rocks retain
The sound of blustering winds, which all night lang
Had rous'd the sea, now with hoarse cadence lull
Sea-faring men, o'erwatch'd. Milton.

He hath a confused remembrance of words since he left the university; he hath lost half their meaning, and puts them together with no regard, except to their cadence. Swift.

5. In horsemanship.

Cadence is an equal measure or proportion, which a horse observes in all his motions, when he is thoroughly managed. Farrier's Dict.

6. In heraldry, cadency means distinction of houses or families.

To CA'DENCE.* v. a. [from the noun.] To regulate by musical measure or proportion.

A certain measured, cadenced step, commonly called a dancing step, which keeps time with, and as it were beats the measure of, the musick which accompanies and directs it, is the essential characteristick which distinguishes a dance from every other sort of motion. A. Smith on the Imitative Arts.

CA'DENT.* adj. [cadens, Lat.] Falling down.

Let it stamp wrinkles in her brow of youth:
With cadent tears fret channels in her cheeks;
Turn all her mother's pains, and benefits,
To laughter and contempt. Shaks. K. Lear.

*CADE'NZA. n. s. [Ital.] The fall or modulation of the voice in singing. See CADENCE, in the second sense.

CADE'T.† n. s. [cadet, Fr. It was anciently capdet; "capdet, cadet, puiné, par opposition à cap-d'ostal [or capdal] l'aîné, le chef de la maison," Roquefort. The eldest of the family was called capmas, i. e. chef de maison, chief or head of the family; and the younger capdet, from capitetum, a little head or chief. Dict. Trev.]

1. The younger brother.

Walter Buck was a cadet of the house of Flanders. Sir G. Buck, Hist of Rich. III. p. 68.

These rambling letters of mine — are nought else than a legend of the cumbersome life and various fortunes of a cadet. Howell's Lett. ii. 61.

2. The youngest brother.

Joseph was the youngest of the twelve, and David the eleventh son, and the cadet of Jesse. Brown, Vulg. Err.

3. A volunteer in the army, who serves in expectation of a commission.

The royal apartments are now occupied by a college of young gentlemen cadets, educated at the king's expence in all the sciences requisite for forming an engineer. Swinburne, Trav. through Spain, Lett. 44.

CA'DEW. n. s. A straw worm. See CADDIS. Dict.

To CADGE.* v. a. [perhaps from the Teut. katsen, ketsen, to run about; and certainly the parent of cadger, which Dr. Johnson has given, and which he derives from cadge, or cage, a panier; but I know of no instance in which cadge is used directly for cage, though it has been indeed the term for a round frame of wood, on which falconers carry their hawks, when they exposed them to sale. Cadge is a common verb for carry in the north of England.]

1. To carry a burthen; to carry on the back. Ray.

2. Cadging the belly; to stuff the belly; also to bind or tie a thing. Lancashire. Grose.

CA'DGER.† n. s. [from cadge.] A huckster; one who brings butter, eggs, and poultry, from the country to market; a cadger to a mill, a loader. Northumb. Grose. Mr. Brocket, in his North-Country Words, adds, that persons who bring fish from the sea to the Newcastle market are still called cadgers.

CA'DGY.* adj. [from the second meaning of To Cadge.] Cheerful, merry after good eating and drinking. A northern word. Brocket.

CA'DI.† n. s. A magistrate among the Turks and Persians, whose office seems nearly to answer to that of a justice of peace.

In Persia, the cadi passes sentence for a round sum of money. Ld. Lyttelton.

CADI'LLACK. n. s. A sort of pear.

CADU'CITY.* n. s. [old Fr. caducité, frailty; weakness; from the Lat. caducus.] Frailty; tendency to fall.

An heterogeneous jumble of youth and caducity. Ld. Chesterfield.

CADU'KE.* adj. [old Fr. caduc, "qui a perdu ses forces," Roquefort; from the Lat. caducus. This is an old English adjective, which Cotgrave and Sherwood use: "caduque, frail, caduke, feeble, &c." In later times, Dr. Scott and Dr. Ash have given the word with the definition of crazy. But fleeting or frail is the proper definition; and the word is so used in Scotland also.]

All their happiness was but caduke and unlasting. Hickes's Lucian.

CÆ'CIAS. n. s. [Lat.] A wind from the north east.

Now, from the north,
Boreas and Cæcias and Argestes loud
And Thrascias rend the woods, and seas upturn. Milton, P. L.

CÆSA'REAN. See CESARIAN.

CÆSU'RA.† n. s. [Lat.]

1. A figure in poetry, by which a short syllable after a complete foot is made long.

2. The natural pause or rest of the voice, which, falling upon some part of a verse, divides it into two unequal parts.

CÆ'SURAL.* adj. [from cæsura.] Relating to the poetical figure, or to the pause of the voice.

CÆRULE.* V. CERULE, and CERULEAN.

CA'FTAN. n. s. [Persick.]. A Persian or Turkish vest or garment.

CAG. n. s. A barrel or wooden vessel, containing four or five gallons. Sometimes keg.

CAGE. n. s. [cage, Fr. from cavea, Lat.]

1. An inclosure of twigs or wire, in which birds are kept.

See whether a cage can please a bird? or whether a dog grow not fiercer with tying? Sidney.

He taught me how to know a man in love; in which cage of rushes, I am sure, you are not a prisoner. Shakspeare.

Though slaves, like birds that sing not in a cage,
They lost their genius, and poetick rage;
Homers again and Pindars may be found,
And his great actions with their numbers crown'd. Waller.

And parrots, imitating human tongue,
And singing birds in silver cages hung;
And ev'ry fragrant flow'r, and od'rous green,
Were sorted well, with lumps of amber laid between. Dryden.

A man recurs to our fancy, by remembering his garment, a beast, bird, or fish, by the cage, or court-yard, or cistern, wherein it was kept. Watts on the Mind.

The reason why so few marriages are happy, is, because young ladies spend their time in making nets, not in making cages. Swift.

2. A place for wild beasts, inclosed with palisadoes.

3. A prison for petty malefactors.

To CAGE.† v. a. [from the noun.] To inclose in a cage.

He swoln, and pamper'd with high fare,
Sits down and snorts, cag'd in his basket-chair. Donne.

And now she would the caged cloister fly. Shakspeare, Lover's Complaint.

Though yon close anchorite's contracted shrowd
Made his innarrow'd carcass seem a crowd,
Yet the cag'd votary did wider dwell
Than thou in thy large roof, and spreading cell. Verses prefix'd to Gregory's Posthuma, 1650.

The Scots — treacherously sold him [K. Charles I.] to the goodly members sitting at Westminster, who after they had caged him awhile, at last set up a mock court of justice, in which they formally arraigned and condemned him. Dr. Matt. Griffith, Serm. 1660, p. 25.

CAIC, CAIQUE, CAIACA.* n. s. [Fr. caic, caique, a galley boat.] A skiff or sloop belonging to a galley. Chambers says, that the Cossacks give the same name, caic, to a small kind of bark used in the navigation of the Black Sea.

CAIL.* n. s. See KAIL.

CAI'MAN, n. s. The American name of a crocodile.

To CAJO'LE.† v. a. [cageoller, Fr. Cajeoler signifies to prate like a bird in a cage; to babble to little purpose; and is not perhaps from graculus, as Mr. Whiter in his Etymologicon Magnum affirms, but from the old Fr. gaiole, whence géolle, jaiole, and jéole, a cage or prison; Lat. cavea, caveola; low Lat. gabia, gajola. V. Roquefort, Gloss. The word now means, as Dr. Johnson says, to flatter, or coax; but this is far removed from the original sense. In the Pref. to the King's Cabinet opened, 4to. 1645, it appears that this word was introduced about that time; but it is mentioned by Heylin, eleven years after that time, as an unusual word.] To flatter; to sooth; to coax: a low word.

Thought he, 'tis no mean part of civil
State-prudence, to cajole the devil. Hudibras.

The one affronts him, while the other cajoles and pities him; takes up his quarrel, shakes his head at it, clasps his hand upon his breast, and then protests and protests. L'Estrange.

My tongue, that wanted to cajole
I try'd, but not a word would troll. Rymer.

CAJO'LER.† n. s. [cageoleur, Fr. a great and idle prater; one that (like a jay in a cage) jangles much to no purpose. Cotgrave.] A flatterer; a wheedler. Kersey.

CAJO'LERY.† n. s. [cajolerie, Fr.] Flattery.

Thus the charlatan spirit, by his cajolery persuades many easy persons to set vain and wanton liberties upon the exterior of their behaviours. W. Montagu, Devout Ess. P. II. 1654, p. 105.

Even if the lord-mayor and speaker mean to insinuate, that this influence is to be obtained and held by flattering their people, &c. such cajoleries perhaps would be more prudently practised than professed. Burke, Letter to R. Burke.

CAIRN.* n. s. [Gael. Ir. Welsh, carn; a heap of stones.] A heap of stones, from the ancient custom of throwing stones on the dead.

A cairn is a heap of stones thrown upon the grave of one eminent for dignity of birth, or splendour of achievements. Johnson, Journ. to the Western Islands.

CA'ISSON. n. s. [French.]

1. A chest of bombs or powder, laid in the enemy's way, to be fired at their approach.

2. A wooden case, in which the piers of bridges are built within the water.

CAI'TIFF.† n. s. [cattivo, Ital. a slave; whence it came to signify a bad man, with some implication of meanness; as knave in English, and fur in Latin; so certainly does slavery destroy virtue. A slave and a scoundrel are signified by the same words in many languages. So far Dr. Johnson; who also, in support of his moral assertion, ingeniously introduces a Greek line formed from two in Homer, Odyss. xvii. 322. But the word is not directly from cattivo, as he asserts. It is from the old Fr. chetiff, chaitiff, wretched; caitiû, Langued. Dial. Chaitif, caitif, caiptif; Lat. captivus. Our caitif is used by Wicliffe, Isaiah, lxi. Chaucer has the substantive caitifness, Test. of L. And Wicliffe: "He that leadeth into caitiftee, schal go into caitiftee." Apoc. xxiv.] A mean villain; a despicable knave: it often implies a mixture of wickedness and misery.

Vile caitiff, vassal of dread and despair,
Unworthy of the common breathed air;
Why livest thou, dead dog, a longer day,
And dost not unto death thyself prepare? Spenser.

'Tis not impossible,
But one, the wicked'st caitiff on the ground,
May seem as shy, as grave, as just, as absolute,
As Angelo. Shakspeare.

The wretched caitiff, all alone,
As he believ'd, began to moan,
And tell his story to himself. Hudibras.

I see him, who was once the object of my contempt and scorn, a despised beggar, an ulcerous caitiff, a loathsome spectacle of mortality, now basking himself in Abraham's bosom. (The rich man's Soliloq. of Lazarus.) Killingbeck, Serm. p. 178.

CAI'TIFF, or CAI'TIVE.* adj. [from the Fr. chetif.] Base; servile.

Would raise one's mind above the starrie sky,
And cause a caitive courage to aspire. Spenser, Shep. Cal. October.

Huge numbers lay
Of caitive wretched thralls, that wailed night and day. Spenser, F. Q. i. v. 45.

Start not, Dervise,
Tinge not thy caitiff cheek with reddening honour. Thomson.

CAKE.† n. s. [cuch, Teutonick; Welsh caccen; Arab. caac.]

1. A kind of delicate bread.

You must be seeing christenings! do you look for ale and cakes here, you rude rascals? Shaksp.

My cake is dough, but I'll in among the rest,
Out of hope of all, but my share of the feast. Shakspeare.

The dismal day was come, the priests prepare
Their leaven'd cakes, and fillets for my hair. Dryden.

2. Any thing of a form rather flat than high; by which it is sometimes distinguished from a loaf.

There is a cake that groweth upon the side of a dead tree, that hath gotten no name, but it is large and of a chesnut colour, and hard and pithy. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

3. Concreted matter; coagulated matter.

Yet when I meet again those sorcerers eyes,
Their beams my hardest resolutions thaw,
As if that cakes of ice and July met. Beaum. and Fl. Martial Maid.

Then when the fleecy skies new cloath the wood,
And cakes of rustling ice come rolling down the flood. Dryden.

To CAKE. v. n. [from the noun.] To harden, as dough in the oven.

This burning matter, as it sunk very leisurely, had time to cake together, and form the bottom, which covers the mouth of that dreadful vault that lies underneath it. Addison on Italy.

He rins'd the wound,
And wash'd away the strings and clotted blood,
That cak'd within. Addison.

To CAKE.* v. a. To force into concretions.

This is that very Mab,
That plats the manes of horses in the night,
And cakes the elflocks in foul sluttish hairs. Shakspeare.

He knoweth also whether that our stone
Be caked earth, or exhalation. Sylvester, Du Bart. p. 450.

To CAKE.* v. n. [a corruption perhaps of cackle.] To cackle as geese. In the north of England, geese are said to cake, hens to cackle. Ray and Grose.

CALABA'SH Tree.

It hath a flower consisting of one leaf, divided at the brim into several parts; from whose cup rises the pointal, in the hinder part of the flower; which afterwards becomes a fleshy fruit, having an hard shell. They rise to the height of twenty-five or thirty feet in the West Indies, where they grow naturally. The shells are used by the negroes for cups, as also for making instruments of musick, by making a hole in the shell, and putting in small stones, with which they make a sort of rattle. Miller.

CALAMA'NCO. n. s. [a word derived probably by some accident from calamancus, Lat. which, in the middle ages, signified a hat.] A kind of woollen stuff.

He was of a bulk and stature larger than ordinary, had a red coat, flung open to shew a calamanco waistcoat. Tatler.

CALAMI'FEROUS.* adj. [from calamus and fero, Lat.] A term applied by some to those plants, otherwise called culmiferous; also bearing a smooth stalk knotted, and generally hollow. Chambers and Ash.

CA'LAMINE. or Lapis Calaminaris. n. s. A kind of fossile bituminous earth, which, being mixed with copper, changes it into brass.

We must not omit those, which, though not of so much beauty, yet are of greater use, viz. loadstones, whetstones of all kinds, limestones, calamine, or lapis calaminaris. Locke.

CA'LAMINT.† n. s. [Fr. calament, from the Gr. καλαμίνθη.] The name of a plant.

To CALAMI'STRATE.* v. a. [old Fr. calamistrer, "kalamistrayer, friser, crispare comam," Lacombe: low Lat. calamistrare, from calamus; probably from twisting the hair into various shapes by pipes or similar means of art.] To curl or frizzle the hair. Cotgrave.

Which belike makes our Venetian ladies, at this day, to counterfeit yellow hair so much; great women to calamistrate and curl it up, to adorn their heads with spangles, pearls, and made-flowers; and all courtiers to affect a pleasing grace in this kind. Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 469.

CALAMISTRA'TION.* n. s. [from the verb.] The act of curling the hair. Obsolete.

Those curious needle-works, variety of colours, jewels, — embroideries, calamistrations, ointments, &c. will make, the veriest dowdy otherwise, a goddess. Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 475.

CALA'MITOUS. adj. [calamitosus, Lat.]

1. Miserable; involved in distress; oppressed with infelicity; unhappy; wretched; applied to men.

This is a gracious provision God Almighty hath made in favour of the necessitous and calamitous; the state of some in this life, being so extremely wretched and deplorable, if compared with others. Calamy.

2. Full of misery; distressful; applied to external circumstances.

What calamitous effects the air of this city wrought upon us the last year, you may read in my discourse of the plague. Harvey on Consump.

Strict necessity
Subdues me, and calamitous constraint!
Lest on my head both sin and punishment,
However insupportable, be all
Devolv'd. Milton.

Much rather I shall chuse
To live the poorest in my tribe, than richest,
And be in that calamitous prison left. Milton.

In this sad and calamitous condition, deliverance from an oppressour would have even revived them. South.

CALA'MITOUSNESS. n. s. [from calamitous.] Misery; distress.

CALA'MITY.† n. s. [calamité, Fr. Cotgrave, from calamitas, Lat.]

1. Misfortune; cause of misery; distress.

Another ill accident is drought, and the spindling of the corn, which with us is rare, but in hotter countries common; insomuch as the word calamity was first derived from calamus, when the corn could not get out of the stalk. Bacon.

2. Misery; distress.

This infinite calamity shall cause
To human life, and household peace confound. Milton.

From adverse shores in safety let her hear
Foreign calamity and distant war;
Of which, great heaven, let her no portion bear. Prior.

CA'LAMUS. n. s. [Lat.] A sort of reed, or sweet-scented wood, mentioned in Scripture with the other ingredients of the sacred perfumes. It is a knotty root, reddish without and white within, which puts forth long and narrow leaves, and brought from the Indies. The prophets speak of it as a foreign commodity of great value. These sweet reeds have no smell when they are green, but when they are dry only. Their form differs not from other reeds, and their smell is perceived upon entering the marshes. Calmet.

Take thou also unto thee principal spices of pure myrrh, of sweet cinnamon, and of sweet calamus. Exodus, xxx. 23.

CALA'SH.† n. s. caleche, Fr. Dryden and Butler wrote it caleche.]

1. A small carriage of pleasure.

Sir Matthew is gone abroad, I suspect a wooeing; and his caleche is gone with him.
Dryden's Lett. edit. Malone, p. 29.

Ladies hurried in caleches. Hudibras, iii. ii.

Daniel, a sprightly swain, that us'd to slash
The vigorous steeds that drew his lord's calash.
King.

The ancients used calashes, the figures of several of them being to be seen on ancient monuments. They are very simple, light, and drove by the traveller himself. Arbuthnot on Coins.

2. A covering to protect the head of a lady full dressed; generally made of silk, and projecting considerably over the face; being supported with hoops of cane.

CALCA'REOUS.* adj. [from the Lat. calx.] Partaking of the nature or qualities of calx or lime.

On the east side is a stratum of bones of all sizes, belonging to various animals and fowls, enchased in an incrustation of a reddish calcareous rock. Swinburne, Trav. through Spain, Lett. 29.

Soils consist of different combinations of two or more of the four primitive earths; namely, the calcareous, which I sometimes call mild calx; magnesia; argil; and the silicious. Kirwan on Manures, i. § 1.

CALCAVA'LLA. n. s. A superior kind of Lisbon wine.

CA'LCEATED. adj. [calceatus, Lat.] Shod; fitted with shoes.

CALCEDO'NIUS. n. s. [Lat.] A kind of precious stone. Calcedonius is of the agate kind, and of a misty grey, clouded with blue, or with purple. Woodward on Fossils.

CA'LCEDONY.* n. s. The calcedonius.

The first foundation was a jasper; the second, a sapphire; the third, a calcedony. Rev. xxi. 19.

CA'LCINABLE.* adj. [from calcine.] That may be calcined.

Not fermenting with acids, and imperfectly calcinable in a great fire. Hill on Fossils, Of Granite.

To CA'LCINATE. See To CALCINE.

In hardening, by baking without melting, the heat hath these degrees; first, it induurateth, then maketh fragile, and, lastly, it doth calcinate. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

CALCINA'TION. n. s. [from calcine; calcination, Fr.] Such a management of bodies by fire, as renders them reducible to powder; wherefore it is called chemical pulverization. This is the next degree of the power of fire beyond that of fusion; for when fusion is longer continued, not only the more subtile particles of the body itself fly off, but the particles of fire likewise insinuate themselves in such multitudes, and are so blended through its whole substance, that the fluidity, first caused by the fire, can no longer subsist. From this union arises a third kind of body, which, being very porous and brittle, is easily reduced to powder; for, the fire having penetrated every where into the pores of the body, the particles are both hindered from mutual contact, and divided into minute atoms. Quincy.

Divers residences of bodies are thrown away, as soon as the distillation or calcination of the body that yielded them is ended. Boyle.

This may be effected, but not without a calcination, or reducing it by art into a subtile powder. Brown, Vulg. Err.

CALCI'NATORY.† n. s. [Fr. calcinatoire, Cotgrave.] A vessel used in calcination.

To CA'LCINE.† v. a. [calciner, Fr. from calx, Lat.]

CA'LDRON. n. s. [chauldron, Fr. from calidus, Lat.] A pot; a boiler; a kettle.

In the midst of all
There placed was a caldron wide and tall,
Upon a mighty furnace, burning hot. Spenser, F. Q.

Some strip the skin, some portion out the spoil;
The limbs, yet trembling, in the caldrons boil:
Some on the fire the reeking entrails broil.
Dryden, Æn.

In the late eruptions, this great hollow was like a vast caldron, filled with glowing and melted matter, which, as it boiled over in any part, ran down the sides of the mountain. Addison.

CALE'CHE. The same with CALASH.

CALEFA'CTION.† n. s. [from calefacio, Lat.]

1. The act of heating any thing.

Let this lamp of zeal never go out in the temple of thy soul; cherish it with daily supplies from that ocean which is never dry, but abounds, and will increase thee, while thou seekest in humility to be enabled to a devout lustre and calefaction of others. Waterhouse's Apology for Learning, 1653, p. 135.

2. The state of being heated.

Every flatuous calefaction of the brain, whencesoever it arise, is apt to make a man ecstatical. Spenser, Vanity of Vulg. Proph. p. 105.

As [if] the remembrance of calefaction can warm a man in a cold frosty night. Moore, Philos. Poems, Pref. C. 2.

CA'LENDAR. n. s. [calendarium, Lat.] A register of the year, in which the months, and stated time, are marked, as festivals and holidays.

What hath this day deserv'd? what hath it done,
That it in golden letter should be set
Among the high tides, in the calendar?
Shakspeare, K. John.

We compute from calendars differing from one another; the compute of the one anticipating that of the other. Brown.

Curs'd be the day when first I did appear;
Let it be blotted from the calendar,
Lest it pollute the month! Dryden, Fables.

To CA'LENDAR.* v. a. [from the noun.] To enter in a calendar.

Twelve have been martyrs for religion, of whom ten are calendared for saints. Waterhouse's Apol. for Learning, 1653, p. 237.

Often martyred names, as well as men, are calendared. Whitlock, Mann. of the Eng. p. 21.

To CA'LENDER.† v. a. [calendrer, Fr. Skinner. Some derive this word from the Lat. cylindrus, or Gr. κύλινδρος; or rather from the low Lat. celendra, whence calendre; the whole effect of the machine depending upon a cylinder.] To dress cloth; to lay the nap of cloth smooth.

CA'LENDER.† n. s. [from the verb.]

CA'LENTURE. n. s. [from caleo, Lat.] A distemper peculiar to sailors, in hot climates; wherein they imagine the sea to be green fields, and will throw themselves into it. Quincy.

And for that lethargy was there no cure,
But to be cast into a calenture. Denham.

So, by a calenture misled,
The mariner with rapture sees,
On the smooth ocean's azure bed,
Enamell'd fields, and verdant trees;
With eager haste, he longs to rove
In that fantastick scene, and thinks
It must be some enchanted grove;
And in he leaps, and down he sinks. Swift.

CALF.† n. s. calves in the plural. [cealf, calf, Saxon; kalf, Dutch.]

1. The young of a cow.

The colt hath about four years of growth; and so the fawn, and so the calf. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

Acosta tells us of a fowl in Peru, called condore, which will kill and eat up a whole calf at a time. Wilkins.

Ah! Blouzelind, I love thee more by half,
Than does their fawns, or cows the new-fall'n calf. Gay.

2. Calves of the lips, mentioned by Hosea, signify sacrifices of praise and prayers, which the captives of Babylon addressed to God, being no longer in a condition to offer sacrifices in his temple. Calmet.

Turn to the Lord, and say unto him, Take away all iniquity, and receive us graciously: so will we render the calves of our lips. Hosea, xiv. 2.

3. By way of contempt and reproach applied to a human being; a dolt; a stupid wretch.

When a child haps to be got,
That after proves an idiot;
When folk perceive it thriveth not,
Some silly doating brainless calf,
That understands things by the half,
Says, that the fairy left the oaf,
And took away the other. Drayton, Nymp.

4. The thick, plump, bulbous part of the leg. [kalf, Dutch; Goth. calf, kalve, the calf of the leg. Serenius.]

Into her legs I'd have love's issues fall,
And all her calf into a gouty small. Suckling.

The calf of that leg blistered. Wiseman, Surgery.

CA'LFLIKE.* adj. Resembling a calf.

So I charm'd their ears,
That, calflike, they my lowing followed.
Shakspeare, Tempest.

CA'LIBER.† n. s. [calibre, Fr.] The bore; the diameter of the barrel of a gun; the diameter of a bullet.

It is easy for an ingenious philosopher to fit the caliber of these empty tubes to the diameter of the particles of light, so as they shall require no grosser kind of matter. Reid's Inquiry.

CALI'BRE.* n. s. [Fr. calibre, a quality, state, or degree; as qualibre. Cotgrave. This seems to be no other than a figurative meaning of the preceding word caliber; and, as such, is old in the French language. See Cotgrave both in CALIBRE and QUALIBRE. "Il n'est pas de mon qualibre, He is not of my quality, rank, or humour." With us, the word is modern; and is accented, like the Fr. word, on the second syllable.] Cast; turn; stamp.

Coming from men of their calibre, they were highly mischievous. Burke.

CA'LICE. n. s. [calix, Lat.] A cup; a chalice. See CHALICE.

There is a natural analogy between the ablution of the body and the purification of the soul; between eating the holy bread and drinking the sacred calice, and a participation of the body and blood of Christ. Taylor.

CA'LICO.† n. s. [from Calecut in India.] An Indian stuff made of cotton; sometimes stained with gay and beautiful colours. This was the original application of the word. The manufacture, in our own country, of making impressions upon linen, with beauty equal to that of the Indian, has completely anglicised the word.

I wear the hoop petticoat, and am all in calicoes, when the finest are in silks. Addison, Spectator.

CA'LICO-PRINTER.* n. s. The manufacturer of printed linens.

Suppose an ingenious gentleman should write a poem of advice to a calico-printer; do you think there is a girl in England, that would wear any thing but the taking of Lisle, or the battle of Oudenarde? Tatler, No. 3.

CA'LID. adj. [calidus, Lat.] Hot; burning; fervent.

CA'LIDITY.† n. s. [Fr. calidité.] Heat.

Ice will dissolve in any way of heat; for it will dissolve with fire, it will colliquate in water, or warm oil; nor doth it only submit into an actual heat, but not endure the potential calidity of many waters. Brown, Vulg. Err.

CA'LIDUCT.* n. s. [from calidus and ductus, Lat.] That which conveys heat; a stove. Coles.

Since the subterranean caliducts have been introduced. Evelyn.

CA'LIF.† } n. s. [khalifa, Arab. an heir or
CA'LIPH. } successor.] A title assumed by the successors of Mahomet among the Saracens, who were vested with absolute power in affairs, both religious and civil.

Ally, son-in-law to Mahomet, for pretending to the caliphship, was by this restless caliph every where pursued. Sir T. Herbert, Travels, p. 266.

CALIGA'TION. n. s. [from caligo, Lat. to be dark.] Darkness; cloudiness.

Instead of a diminution, or imperfect vision, in the mole, we affirm an abolition, or total privation; instead of caligation, or dimness, we conclude a cecity, or blindness. Brown.

CALI'GINOUS.† adj. [Fr. caligineux, from caliginosus, Lat.] Obscure; dim; full of darkness.

Their punishment [that of the rebellious angels] was their dejection and detrusion into the caliginous regions of the air.
Hallywell, Melampron. p. 18.

It is filled with such a thick and caliginous air, that the ground cannot be seen.
Ricaut's Greek Church, p. 65.

To CALK. v. a. [from calage, Fr. hemp, with which leaks are stopped; or from cæle, Sax. the keel. Skinner.] To stop the leaks of a ship.

There is a great errour committed in the manner of calking his majesty's ships; which being done with rotten oakum, is the cause they are leaky. Ralegh, Essays.

CA'LKER. n. s. [from calk.] The workman that stops the leaks of a ship.

The ancients of Gebal, and the wise men thereof, were in thee thy calkers; all the ships of the sea, with their mariners, were in thee to occupy thy merchandize. Ezek. xxvii. 9.

CA'LKIN. n. s.

1. A part prominent from a horse-shoe, turned up and pointed to secure the horse from falling. Ash. The word is rarely used in the singular number. In part of Yorkshire, they say cawkins for calkins; and some derive the word from the Teut. kauchen, calcare. See the Craven Dialect. 1824.

On this horse is Arcite
Trotting the stones of Athens, which the calkins
Did rather tell than trample.
Beaum. and Fl. Two Noble Kinsmen.

2. A calkin-pin is a term for a very large pin; whether in allusion to calkins or not, I am unable to say. Corruptly called also a corking-pin.

CA'LKING. n. s. A term in painting, used where the backside is covered with black lead, or red chalk, and the lines traced through on a waxed plate, wall, or other matter, by passing lightly over each stroke of the design with a point, which leaves an impression of the colour on the plate or wall. Chambers.

CA'LKING-IRON.* n. s. A kind of chisel used in calking a ship.

So here some pick out bullets from the side;
Some drive old oacum through each seam and rift;
Their left-hand does the calking-iron guide,
The rattling mallet with the right they lift.
Dryden.

To CALL.† v. a. [calo, Lat. kalder, Danish; Dr. Johnson says. It is rather from the Su. kalla; though the Gr. καλεω may be also mentioned; and the Heb. col, the voice. Lye's A.-Sax. Dict. gives calb, as the participle called, ed. Manning.]

1. To name; to denominate.

And God called the light day, and the darkness he called night. Gen. i. 5.

2. To summon, or invite, to or from any place, thing, or person. It is often used with local particles; as, up, down, in, out, off.

Knolles, History.

Or call up him, that left half told
The story of Cambuscan bold. Milton.

Drunkenness calls off the watchmen from their towers; and then evils proceed from a loose heart, and an untied tongue. Taylor, Holy Living.

The soul makes use of her memory, to call to mind what she is to treat of.
Duppa, Rules to Devotion.

Such fine employments our whole days divide,
The salutations of the morning tide
Call up the sun; those ended, to the hall
We wait the patron, hear the lawyers bawl.
Dryden.

Then, by consent, abstain from further toils,
Call off the dogs, and gather up the spoils.
Addison.

By the pleasures of the imagination or fancy, I mean such as arise from visible objects, when we call up their ideas into our minds by paintings, statues, or descriptions. Addison, Spect.

Why dost thou call my sorrows up afresh!
My father's name brings tears into my eyes.

When their sov'reign's quarrel calls 'em out,
His foes to mortal combat they defy.
Dryden, Virgil.

To CALL. v. n.

1. To stop without intention of staying. This meaning probably rose from the custom of denoting one's presence at the door by a call; but it is now used with great latitude. This sense is well enough preserved by the particles on or at; but is forgotten, and the expression made barbarous by in.

2. To make a short visit.

And, as you go, call on my brother Quintus,
And pray him, with the tribunes to come to me.
B. Jonson.

He ordered her to call at his house once a-week, which she did for some time after, when he heard no more of her. Temple.

4. To call on. To repeat solemnly.

Thrice call upon my name, thrice beat your breast,
And hail me thrice to everlasting rest. Dryden.

The Athenians, when they lost any men at sea, went to the shores, and calling thrice on their names, raised a cenotaph or empty monument, to their memories. Broome on the Odyssey.

5. To call upon. To implore; to pray to.

Call upon me in the day of trouble; I will deliver thee, and thou shalt glorify me. Psalm l. 15.

CALL.† n. s. [from the verb.]

1. A vocal address of summons, or invitation.

But death comes not at call; justice divine
Mends not her slowest pace, for pray'rs or cries.
Milton.

But would you sing, and rival Orpheus' strain,
The wond'ring forests soon should dance again:
The moving mountains hear the pow'rful call,
And headlong streams hang list'ning in their fall.
Pope.

2. Requisition authoritative and publick.

It may be feared, whether our nobility would contentedly suffer themselves to be always at the call, and to stand to the sentence of a number of mean persons. Hooker's Preface.

3. Divine vocation; summons to true religion.

Yet he at length, time to himself best known,
Rememb'ring Abraham, by some wond'rous call.
May bring them back repentant and sincere.
Milton.

4. A summons from heaven; an impulse.

How justly then will impious mortals fall,
Whose pride would soar to heav'n without a call?
Roscommon.

Those who to empire by dark paths aspire,
Still plead a call to what they most desire.
Dryden.

St. Paul himself believed he did well, and that he had a call to it, when he persecuted the christians, whom he confidently thought in the wrong: but yet it was he, and not they, who were mistaken. Locke.

5. Authority; command.

Oh! Sir, I wish he were within my call, or yours. Denham.

6. A demand: a claim.

Dependence is a perpetual call upon humanity, and a greater incitement to tenderness and pity, than any other motive whatsoever. Addison, Spectator,

7. An instrument to call birds.

For those birds or beasts were made from such pipes or calls, as may express the several tones of those creatures, which are represented. Wilkins, Mathemat. Magick.

8. In naval language, a sort of pipe or whistle used by the boatswain and his mates to summon the sailors to their several employments.

9. Calling; vocation; employment.

Now, through the land, his cure of souls he stretch'd,
And, like a primitive apostle, preach'd:
Still chearful, ever constant to his call;
By many follow'd, lov'd by most, admir'd by all.
Dryden.

10. A nomination.

Upon the sixteenth was held the serjeants feast at Ely place, there being nine serjeants of that call. Bacon.

11. Occasion; obligation: as, "he had no call to do it." Grose gives it as a Derbyshire expression, but it is a common low phrase.

12. Call of the House. In parliamentary language; to discover what members are absent without leave of the house or just cause; and to ensure their attendance, at the discussion of some eminently important question.

CA'LLER.* n. s. [from call, Fr. appelleur.] One who calls. Sherwood.

CA'LLET.† n. s. [It is said by Urry, Dr. Grey, and others to be derived from the Fr. calotte, a sort of cap or headdress worn by country girls. But the calotte is not a cap confined to those maidens; and if it were, why derive so opprobrious a word from that circumstance? It is probably one of the cant words of elder days. It appears from an entry in the Stationers' Books in 1563, that there was "an order of drabs or callets." Our old poet Skelton treats them as scolds, in which sense the verb callet is used in the north of England.]

A trull, or a scold.

Then Elinour sayd, ye callettes,
I shall breake your palettes,
Without ye now cease;
And so was made the dronken peace.
Skelton's Poems, p. 133.

He call'd her whore: a beggar, in his drink,
Could not have laid such terms upon his callet.
Shakspeare.

To CA'LLET.* v. n. [from the noun. A calleting housewife, in the north of England, is a scold. Ray.] To rail; to scold.

To hear her in her spleen
Callet like a butter-quean.
Brathwait, Care's Cure in Panedone, (1621.)

CA'LLING.† n. s. [from call.]

1. Vocation; profession; trade.

If God has interwoven such a pleasure with our ordinary calling, how much superiour must that be, which arises from the survey of a pious life? Surely, as much as christianity is nobler than a trade. South.

We find ourselves obliged to go on in honest industry in our callings. Rogers.

I cannot forbear warning you against endeavouring at wit in your sermons; because many of your calling have made themselves ridiculous by attempting it. Swift.

I left no calling for this idle trade,
No duty broke, no father disobey'd. Pope.

2. Proper station or employment.

The Gauls found the Roman senators ready to die with honour in their callings. Swift.

3. Class of persons united by the same employment or profession.

It may be a caution to all christian churches and magistrates, not to impose celibacy on whole callings, and great multitudes of men or women, who cannot be supposable to have the gift of continence. Hammond.

4. Divine vocation; invitation or impulse to the true religion.

Give all diligence to make your calling and election sure. 2 Peter, i. 10.

St. Peter was ignorant of the calling of the Gentiles. Hakewill on Providence.

5. Appellation. Not now in use.

I am more proud to be Sir Rowland's son,
His youngest son; and would not change that calling,
To be adopted heir of Frederick.
Shakspeare, As you Like it.

CA'LLICO.* See CALICO.

CALLI'DITY.* n. s. [Lat. calliditas.] Craftiness. Cockeram.

CA'LLIGRAPHY.* n. s. See CALIGRAPHY.

My calligraphy, a fair hand,
Fit for a secretary. B. Jonson, Magn. Lady.

CALLIGRA'PHICK.* adj. [from calligraphy.] Relating to beautiful writing.

At the end is an inscription importing the writer's name, and his excellence in the calligraphick art. Warton, Hist. of E. P.

CA'LLIPERS.† n. s. [Of this word I know not the etymology, nor does any thing more probable occur, than that, perhaps, the word is corrupted from clippers, instruments with which any thing is clipped, inclosed or embraced, Dr. Johnson says; but it is surely from caliber, (Fr. qualibre, the bore of a gun or any cylinder,) and indeed they are called caliber compasses.] Compasses with bowed shanks.

Callipers measure the distance of any round, cylindrick, conical body, so that, when workmen use them, they open the two points to their described width, and turn so much stuff off the intended place, till the two points of the callipers fit just over their work. Moxon's Mechanical Exercises.

CALLO'SITY. n. s. [callosité, Fr.] A kind of swelling without pain, like that of the skin, by hard labour; and therefore, when wounds, or the edges of ulcers, grow so, they are said to be callous. Quincy.

The surgeon ought to vary the diet of his patient, as he finds the fibres loosen too much, are too flaccid, and produce funguses, or as they harden and produce callosities; in the first case, wine and spirituous liquours are useful, in the last hurtful. Arbuthnot on Diet.

CA'LLOT.* See CALOTTE.

CA'LLOUS. adj. [callus, Lat.]

1. Indurated; hardened; having the pores shut up.

In progress of time, the ulcers became sinuous and callous, with induration of the glands. Wiseman.

2. Hardened in mind; insensible.

Licentiousness has so long passed for sharpness of wit, and greatness of mind, that the conscience is grown callous. L'Estrange.

The wretch is drench'd too deep,
His soul is stupid, and his heart asleep:
Fatten'd in vice, so callous and so gross,
He sins, and sees not, senseless of his loss. Dryden.

CA'LLOUSLY.* adv. In a callous or hardened manner.

CA'LLOUSNESS. n. s. [from callous.]

1. Hardness; induration of the fibres.

The oftener we use the organs of touching, the more of these scales are formed, and the skin becomes the thicker, and so a callousness grows upon it. Cheyne.

2. Insensibility.

If they let go their hope of everlasting life with willingness, and entertain final perdition with exultation, ought they not to be esteemed destitute of common sense, and abandoned to a callousness and numbness of soul? Bentley.

CA'LLOW.† adj. [Dr. Johnson offers no etymology. It is the Sax. calo, calu, bald, without hair; Lat. calvus.] Unfledged; naked; without feathers.

Bursting with kindly rupture, forth disclos'd
Their callow young. Milton, P. L.

Then as an eagle, who, with pious care,
Was beating widely on the wing for prey,
To her now silent airy does repair,
And finds her callow infants forc'd away. Dryden.

How in small flights they know to try their young,
And teach the callow child her parent's song. Prior.

CA'LLUS. n. s. [Latin.]

1. An induration of the fibres.

2. The hard substance by which broken bones are united.

CALM.† adj. [calme, Fr.; kalm, Dutch; Dr. Johnson says. Calme is derived, according to Covarruvias, from καῦμα, heat, the heat being greatest when there is no wind stirring. Huet deduces it from μαλακὸς, soft; whence the Latins formed malacia in the sense of calm, which is in Cæsar's Commentaries. From malacia they made malacus, and by transposition of letters came calamus, then calmus, and so calme, Fr. V. Morin. Etym. Dict. Fr. et Gr.]

1. Quiet; serene; not stormy; not tempestuous: applied to the elements.

Calm was the day, and, through the trembling air,
Sweet breathing Zephyrus did softly play
A gentle spirit, that lightly did allay
Hot Titan's beams, which then did glister fair. Spenser.

So shall the sea be calm unto us. Jonah.

2. Undisturbed; unruffled: applied to the passions.

We are calm as peace. Beaum. and Fl. Island Princess.

It is no ways congruous, that God should be frightening men into truth, who were made to be wrought upon by calm evidence, and gentle methods of persuasion. Atterbury.

The queen her speech with calm attention hears,
Her eyes restrain the silver-streaming tears. Pope.

CALM. n. s.

1. Serenity; stillness; freedom from violent motion: used of the elements.

It seemeth most agreeable to reason, that the waters rather stood in a quiet calm, than that they moved with any raging or overbearing violence. Ralegh.

Every pilot
Can steer the ship in calms; but he performs
The skilful part, can manage it in storms. Denham.

Nor God alone in the still calm we find,
He mounts the storm, and walks upon the wind. Pope.

2. Freedom from disturbance; quiet; repose: applied to the passions.

Great and strange calms usually portend the most violent storms; and therefore, since storms and calms do always follow one another, certainly, of the two, it is much more eligible to have the storm first, and the calm afterwards: since a calm before a storm is commonly a peace of a man's own making; but a calm after a storm, a peace of God's. South.

To CALM. v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To still; to quiet.

Neptune we find busy in the beginning of the Æneis, to calm the tempest raised by Æolus. Dryden.

2. To pacify; to appease.

Jesus, whose bare word checked the sea, as much exerts himself in silencing the tempests, and calming the intestine storms within our breasts. Decay of Piety.

Those passions which seem somewhat calmed, may be entirely laid asleep, and never more awakened. Atterbury.

He will'd to stay,
The sacred rites and hecatombs to pay,
And calm Minerva's wrath. Pope.

CA'LMER. n. s. [from calm.] The person or thing which has the power of giving quiet.

Angling was, after tedious study, a rest to his mind, a cheerer of his spirits, a diverter of sadness, a calmer of unquiet thoughts, a moderator of passions, a procurer of contentedness. Walton.

CA'LMLY. adv. [from calm.]

1. Without storms, or violence; serenely.

In nature, things move violently to their place, and calmly in their place; so virtue in ambition is violent, in authority settled and calm. Bacon.

His curled brows
Frown on the gentle stream, which calmly flows. Denham.

2. Without passions; quietly.

The nymph did like the scene appear,
Serenely pleasant, calmly fair;
Soft fell her words, as flew the air. Prior.

CA'LMNESS. n. s. [from calm.]

1. Tranquillity; serenity; not storminess.

While the steep horrid roughness of the wood
Strives with the gentle calmness of the flood. Denham.

2. Mildness; freedom from passion.

Sir, 'tis fit
You have strong party, or defend yourself
By calmness, or by absence: all's in anger. Shaks.

I beg the grace,
You would lay by those terrours of your face;
Till calmness to your eyes you first restore,
I am afraid, and I can beg no more. Dryden.

CA'LMY.† adj. [from calm.] Calm; peaceful. Not used; Dr. Johnson says. It is admirably used by other poets as well as Spenser, from whom alone Dr. Johnson has given an example; and is worthy of general use.

Will peace her halcyon nest venture to build
Upon a shore with shipwrecks fill'd?
And trust that sea, where, she can hardly say,
She' has known these twenty years one calmy day?
Cowley, Ode Restor. of K. Ch. II. st. 3.

Her calmy sight
Thou think'st thy heaven, and in her smiling eyes
Read'st all the sweets of thy fool's paradise.
Beaumont's Psyche, xvi. 15.

And now they nigh approached to the sted,
Where as those mermaides dwelt: it was a still
And calmy bay, on the one side sheltered
With the broad shadow of an hoary hill.
Spenser, F. Q.

CA'LOMEL.† n. s. [calomelas, a chymical word; from καλος, good, and μελας, black, in allusion to its colour and properties.] Mercury six times sublimed.

He repeated lenient purgatives with calomel, once in three or four days. Wiseman, Surgery.

CALORI'FICK. adj. [calorificus, Lat.] That has the quality of producing heat; heating.

A calorifick principle is either excited within the heated body, or transferred to it, through any medium, from some other. Silver will grow hotter than the liquour it contains. Grew.

CALO'TTE.† n. s. [French.]

1. A cap or coif, worn as an ecclesiastical ornament in France.

But we,
That tread the path of publick businesses,
Know what a tacit shrug is, or a shrink;
The wearing the callot, the politick hood,
And twenty other parerga, o' the bye,
You seculars understand not.
B. Jonson, Magn. Lady.

2. [In architecture.] A round cavity or depressure, in form of a cap or cup, lathed and plaistered, used to diminish the rise or elevation of a chapel, cabinet, alcove, &c. Harris.

CA'LOYERS. n. s. [καλος.] Monks of the Greek church.

Temp'rate as caloyers in their secret cells.
Madden on Boulter.

CA'LTROP, or CA'LTHROP.† n. s. [Sax. coltpæppe. It is called in Fr. chausse-trape, and cheval-attrappe. See Cotgrave, and Etym. Dict. 1691.]

1. An instrument made with four spikes, and so disposed, that, when thrown on the ground, one of them points upright, to wound horses' feet.

A calthrop, anciently used in war.
Blount's Tenures, p. 80.

The ground about was thick sown with caltrops, which very much incommoded the shoeless Moors.
L. Addison, Account of Tangiers.

2. A plant common in France, Spain, and Italy, where it grows among corn, and is very troublesome; for the fruit being armed with strong prickles, run into the feet of the cattle. This is certainly the plant mentioned in Virgil's Georgick, under the name of tribulus. Miller.

To CA'LVE.† v. n. [Sax. calpian.]

1. To bring a calf: spoken of a cow.

When she has calv'd, then set the dam aside,
And for the tender progen provide. Dryden.

2. It is used metaphorically for any act of bringing forth; and sometimes of men, by way of reproach.

I would they were barbarians, as they are,
Though in Rome litter'd; not Romans; as they are not;
Though calved in the porch o' th' capitol. Shaks.

The grassy clods now calv'd, now half appear'd
The tawny lion, pawing to get free
His hinder parts. Milton, P. L.

To CA'LVER.* v. a. [In the Prompt. Parv. "calwr, as [of] salmon or other fishes."] To cut in slices; applied to salmon, which bears the knife without breaking, which is fresh, callar, as the word still is used in the north of England; the fish shewing its calver or fat, (as calver is explained in the Complete Caterer, Lond. 1701,) which no fish will do unless it be perfectly fresh. The same book applies the term to sturgeon.

My foot-boy shall eat pheasants, calver'd salmons, knots, godwits, lampreys.
B. Jonson, Alchemist.

Provide me then chines fried, and the salmon calver'd. Killigrew, Parson's Wedding, 1664.

To CA'LVER.* v. n. To shrink by cutting, and not fall to pieces.

His flesh, [the grayling's,] even in his worst season, is so firm, and will so easily calver, that in plain truth he is very good meat at all times.
Cotton, Complete Angler.

CALVES-SNOUT. [antirrhinum.] A plant. Snap-dragon.

CALVILLE. n. s. [French.] A sort of apple.

CA'LVINISM.* n. s. The doctrine of Calvin; the general doctrine, says Dr. Ash, laid down in the Articles of the Church of England. Let those who may have been misled by this partial definition, or those who may still choose to avow it, read a masterly and successful "Attempt to illustrate those Articles of the Church of England, which the Calvinists improperly consider as Calvinistical," in a Series of Sermons preached before the University of Oxford by the Rev. Richard Lawrence, 8vo. Ox. 1805.

Most unhappy for the church of England, that so great a party in the English court should be still addicted to Calvinism.
Dean Martin's Letters, (dated 1660,) p. 68.

The delights arising from these objects were to be sacrificed to the cold and philosophical spirit of Calvinism, which furnished no pleasures to the imagination.
Warton, Note on Milton's Il Penseroso.

CA'LVINIST.* n. s. One who holds the doctrine of Calvin.

The Calvinist is tempted to a false security, and sloth; and the Arminian may be tempted to trust too much to himself, and too little to God.
Burnet on the Articles, Art. 17.

CALVINI'STICAL.* } adj. [from Calvinist.]
CALVINI'STICK. } Relating to Calvinism.

These divines brought back with them into England those narrow principles concerning church-government and ceremonies, which they had imbibed in the petty states and republicks abroad, where the calvinistick discipline was adopted. Warton, Hist. of Eng. Poetry, ii. 458.

CA'LVISH.* adj. [from calf.] Like a calf.

He was holden unworthy to be made a parish-priest, as having made a calvish answer.
World of Wonders, 1608, p. 240.

You seem like to Waltham's calf, that went nine miles to suck a cow; and when he came thither, the cow proved a bull: perhaps in your calvish meditation you thought, for your pains in advertising the picture-mother, to have sucked her dug.
Sheldon, Miracles of Antichrist, p. 141.

CA'LVITY.* n. s. [Fr. calvitie, from the Lat. calvities.] Baldness. Cockeram.

To CALU'MNIATE.† v. n. [calumnior, Lat. old Fr. calumpnier. Calumniate is among the words in the Rhemish translation of the N. Test. which Fulke in his remarks on it in 1617 considers as not familiar to the vulgar reader, and therefore says: "By this word is signified violent oppression by word or deed."] To accuse falsely; to charge without just ground.

Beauty, wit, high birth, desert in service,
Love, friendship, charity, are subject all
To envious and calumniating time. Shakspeare.

He mixes truth with falsehood, and has not forgotten the rule of calumniating strongly, that something may remain. Dryden, Fables, Preface.

Do I calumniate! thou ungrateful Vanoc!—
Perfidious prince!—It is a calumny
To say, that Gwendolen betroth'd to Yver,
Was by her father first assur'd to Valens?
A. Philips.

To CALU'MNIATE.† v. a. To slander.

He falls again to his old trade of downright calumniating our doctrine.
Bp. Patrick, Answ. to the Touchstone, &c. p. 199.

One trade or art, even those that should be the most liberal, make it their business to disdain and calumniate another. Spratt.

CALUMNIA'TION.† n. s. [from calumniate.] That which we call calumniation, is a malicious and false representation of an enemy's words or actions, to an offensive purpose. Ayliffe.

Some faulte you must fynde, where none is, partly to keepe in use your olde custome of calumniacion.
Abp. Cranmer to Bp. Gardiner, p. 388.

Inveighing sharply against these close, backbiting calumniations.
Bp. Hall, Cases of Conscience, ii. 8.

These descriptions —— are here delivered dispassionately, and not thrown out in the heat of controversy and calumniation.
Warton, Note on Milton's Silv. Lib.

CALU'MNIATOR.† n. s. [from calumniate, and Fr. calomniateur.] A forger of accusation; a slanderer.

The foul enemy and calumniator — whose name is the slanderous accuser of his brethren.
Sir E. Sandy's State of Religion.

The devil, the father of all calumniators and liars. Abp. Usher, Ans. to a Jesuit, &c. p. 98.

When all these calumniators shall have spit their venom, it will be found that an unspotted life will be to them both a confutation and revenge.
South, Serm. vii. 74.

He that would live clear of the envy and hatred of potent calumniators, must lay his finger upon his mouth, and keep his hand out of the ink pot.
L'Estrange.

At the same time that Virgil was celebrated by Gallus, we know that Bavius and Mœvius were his declared foes and calumniators. Addison.

CALU'MNIATORY.* adj. [from calumniator.] False; slanderous.

Upon admission of this passage, as you yourselves have related it in your calumniatory information. Mountagu, Appeal to Cæsar, p. 17.

CALU'MNIOUS.† adj. [from calumny, and Fr. calomnieux, Cotgrave.] Slanderous; falsely reproachful.

Virtue itself 'scapes not calumnious strokes.
Shakspeare.

With calumnious art
Of counterfeited truth, thus held their ears.
Milton, P. L.

Other calumnious and false taxations have been discovered in my answer.
Bp. Morton, Discharge of Imputations, &c. p. 159.

Whose overspreading barbarism — hath rendered the pure and solid law of God unbeneficial to us by their calumnious dunceries.
Milton, Doct. and Dis. of Divorce, ii. 22.

CALU'MNIOUSLY.* adv. [from calumnious.] In a slanderous manner.

Dealing in the case so insincerely, and calumniously, in their informations.
Mountagu, Appeal to Cæsar, p. 26.

Like a flood, you calumniously overflow, in the petty preface to your six reasons.
Sheldon, Miracles of Antichrist, p. 45.

CALU'MNIOUSNESS.* n. s. [from calumnious.] Slanderous accusation.

The bitterness of my stile was plainness, not calumniousness.
Bp. Morton, Discharge of Imputations, &c. p. 227.

CA'LUMNY.† n. s. [old Fr. calompnie, calomnie; from calumnia, Lat.] Slander; false charge; groundless accusation: with against, or sometimes upon, before the person accused.

Be thou as chaste as ice, as pure as snow,
Thou shalt not escape calumny. — Shakspeare.

It is a very hard calumny upon our soil or climate, to affirm, that so excellent a fruit will not grow here. Temple.

CALX, n. s. [Latin.] Any thing that is rendered reducible to powder by burning.

Gold, that is more dense than lead, resists peremptorily all the dividing power of fire; and will not be reduced into a calx, or lime, by such operation as reduces lead into it. Digby.

CA'LYCLE. n. s. [calyculus, Lat.] A small bud of a plant. Dict.

CALZO'ONS.* n. s. [Span. calzónes; Fr. calçons, close linen breeches, Cotgrave. Dr. Ash has given, for this word, calsounds.] Drawers.

The better sort of that sex here wear linen drawers, or calzoons. Sir T. Herbert, Trav. p. 115.

CAMA'IEU.† n. s. [from camachuia, which name is given by the orientals to the onyx, when, in preparing it, they find another colour. Fr. camaieu; low Lat. camahutus; Ital. camméo; and we now so pronounce the word, and write it cameo.]

1. A stone with various figures and representations of landskips, formed by nature.

Each nicer mould a softer feature drinks,
The bold cameo speaks, the soft intaglio thinks.
Darwin, Botan. Gard. P. I.

2. [In painting.] A term used where there is only one colour, and where the lights and shadows are of gold, wrought on a golden or azure ground. This kind of work is chiefly used to represent basso relievos. Chambers.

CA'MBER. n. s. [See CAMBERING.] A term among workmen.

Camber, a piece of timber cut arching, so as a weight considerable being set upon it, it may, in length of time, be induced to a straight.
Moxon's Mechanical Exercises.

CA'MBERING. n. s. A word mentioned by Skinner, as peculiar to shipbuilders, who say, that a place is cambering, when they mean arched. [from chambré, French.]

CA'MBIST.* n. s. [Lat. cambio, to exchange: old Fr. cambi, change, cambia, to change. Lacombe.] A name, which has been given in France to those who trade in notes and bills of exchange. The word cambist, though a term of antiquity, is even now a technical word of some use among merchants, traders, and bankers. Chambers.

CA'MBLET.* See CAMELOT. It is often written camblet. So the Italians write it ciambelotto.

CA'MBRICK. n. s. [from Cambray, a city in Flanders, where it was principally made.] A kind of fine linen, used for ruffles, women's sleeves and caps.

He hath ribbons of all the colours of the rainbow; inkles, caddises, cambricks, and lawns.
Shakspeare.

Rebecca had, by the use of a looking-glass, and by the further use of certain attire, made of cambrick, upon her head, attained to an evil art.
Tatler.

Confed'rate in the cheat, they draw the throng,
And cambrick handkerchiefs reward the song.
Gay.

CAME. The preterite of To come.

Till all the pack came up, and ev'ry hound
Tore the sad huntsman, grov'ling on the ground.
Addison.

CA'MEL. n. s. [camelus, Lat.] An animal very common in Arabia, Judæa, and the neighbouring countries. One sort is large, and full of flesh, and fit to carry burdens of a thousand pounds weight, having one bunch upon its back. Another have two bunches upon their backs, like a natural saddle, and are fit either for burdens, or men to ride on. A third kind is leaner, and of a smaller size, called dromedaries, because of their swiftness; which are generally used for riding by men of quality.

Camels have large solid feet, but not hard. Camels will continue ten or twelve days without eating or drinking, and keep water a long time in their stomach, for their refreshment. Calmet.

Patient of thirst and toil,
Son of the desart! even the camel feels,
Shot through his wither'd heart, the fiery blast.
Thomson.

CA'MEL-BACKED.* adj. Having a back like a camel; a hunch-back.

Not that he was crook-shoulder'd, or camel-backed. Fuller, Holy War, p. 215.

CA'MELOPARD. n. s. [from camelus and pardus, Lat.] An Abyssinian animal, taller than an elephant, but not so thick. He is so named, because he has a neck and head like a camel; he is spotted like a pard, but his spots are white upon a red ground. The Italians call him giaraffa. Trevoux.

CA'MELOT.† } n. s. [Fr. camelot, Ital. camc-
CA'MLET. } lotto from the Gr. καμηλωτή, the skin of the camel.

1. A kind of stuff originally made by a mixture of silk and camels hair; it is now made with wool and silk.

This habit was not of camels skin, nor any coarse texture of its hair, but rather some finer weave of camelot, grograin, or the like; in as much as these stuffs are supposed to be made of the hair of that animal. Brown, Vulg. Err.

The best camlets are made at Brussels.
Ld. Chesterfield.

2. Hair cloth.

Meantime the pastor shears their hoary beards,
And cases, of their hair, the loaden herds:
Their camelots warm in tents the soldier hold,
And shield the shiv'ring mariner from cold.
Dryden.

CA'MLETTED.* adj. [from camlet.] A piece of cloth of gold, fastened with a silken string, with a stamp of Arabick letters curiously gilded upon paper, and chamletted with red and blue, agreeable to the mode of Persia.
Sir T. Herbert, Trav. p. 214.

The paper become sleek and chamletted [or veined in such sort, as it resembles agat or porphyry. Sir T. Herbert, Trav. p. 294.

CA'MERA OBSCURA.† [Latin.] An optical machine used in a darkened chamber, so that the light coming only through a double convex glass, objects exposed to daylight, and opposite to the glass, are represented inverted upon any white matter placed in the focus of the glass. Martin.

He there saw the moral scenes of life passing in review before his mind, as exactly as the beautiful objects on his river Thames from his camera obscura. Tyers, Hist. Rhapsody on Pope, p. 16.

That the objects of sight are all painted in the bottom of the eye, upon a membrane called the retina, pretty much in the same manner as the like objects are painted in a camera obscura, is well known to whoever has the slightest tincture of the science of opticks.
A. Smith on the External Senses.

CA'MERADE.† n. s. [Fr. camarade, from the Gr. καμάρα; and camera, a chamber, Lat.] One that lodges in the same chamber; a bosom companion. By corruption we now use comrade.

CA'MERATED.† adj. [cameratus, Lat.] Arched; roofed, slopewise. Coles.

CAMERA'TION. n. s. [cameratio, Lat.] A vaulting or arching.

CA'MIS.* n. s. [Ital. camise; Fr. chemise; Lat. camisia; Græco-Barb. καμίσιον. V. Meursii Gloss. This is the true word which Spenser also writes, without reason, camus. See CAMUS.] A thin transparent dress.

All in a camis light of purple silke.
Spenser, F. Q. v. v. 2.

CAMISA'DO.† n. s. [camisa, a shirt, Ital. camisium, low Lat.] An attack made by soldiers in the dark; on which occasion they put their shirts outward, to be seen by each other; also, the dress itself.

They had appointed the same night, whose darkness would have encreased the fear, to have given a camisado upon the English. Hayward.

Their armours and camisadoes: I mean the shirts that covered their armours. Sir R. Williams, Actions of the Low Countries, (1618,) p. 83.

After midnight, we dislodged from our quarter some two thousand of our best men, all in camisadoes with scaling ladders.
Sir R. Williams, &c. p. 82.

The towne and cloyster, having intelligence, sallied out from both quarters some eight hundred footmen, with all their horsemen, to give a camisado under the conduct of Monsieur de Roveres. Sir R. Williams, &c. p. 41.

CA'MISATED. adj. [from camisa, a shirt.] Dressed with the shirt outward.

CA'MLET. See CAMELOT.

He had on him a gown with wide sleeves, of a kind of water camlet, of an excellent azure colour. Bacon.

CA'MMOCK. n. s. [cammoc, Saxon; ononis.] An herb; the same with petty whin, or restharrow.

CA'MOMILE.† n. s. [Fr. camomille; Gr. χαμαίμηλον, from χαμαι "à terre, et μηλία, pommier, quasi pommier nain, parce qu'elle s'élève peu, et qu'elle a une forte odeur de pomme." V. Morin, Etym. Dict. Fr. and Gr.] A flower. It is now more usually written chamomile.

The scent-full camomile, the verdurous costmary. Drayton, Polyolb. S. 15.

CA'MOUS, or CAMO'YS.† adj. [camus, Fr. written camous or camus by most of our elder writers. Camm in Welsh is crooked, and cammu, to bend or crooken; and in Lancashire cam is awry. Cam, Gael. crooked.] Flat; level; depressed. It is only used of the nose.

Many Spaniards, of the race of Barbary Moors, though after frequent commixture, have not worn out the camoys nose unto this day. Brown, Vulg. Err.

The most or all of these dogs were white little hounds, with crooked noses, called camuses. Sir R. Williams, Actions of the Low Countries, (1618,) p. 49.

CA'MOUSED,* part. adj. [from camous.] Crooked. Huloet.

And though my nose be camus'd, my lips thick,
And my chin bristled, Pan, great Pan, was such.
B. Jonson, Sad Shepherd.

CA'MOUSLY.* adv. [from camous.] Awry.

Her nose some dele hoked,
And camously croked. Skelton, Poems, p. 124.

CAMP. n. s. [camp, Fr. camp, Sax. from campus, Lat.] The order of tents, placed by armies when they keep the field. We use the phrase to pitch a camp, to encamp.

From camp to camp, through the foul womb of night,
The hum of either army stilly sounds. Shaks.

Next, to secure our camp, and naval pow'rs,
Raise an embattl'd wall, with lofty tow'rs. Pope.

To CAMP.† v. a. [Sax. campian, Fr. camper, to pitch a camp. Cotgrave.] To encamp; to lodge in tents, for hostile purposes.

Had our great palace the capacity
To camp this host, we would all sup together.
Shakspeare.

To CAMP.* v. n. To camp; to pitch a camp; to fix tents.

And there Israel camped before the mount.
Exodus, xix. 2.

I will camp against thee round about.
Isaiah, xxix. 3.

The great grasshoppers, which camp in the hedges in the cold day. Nahum, iii. 17.

I hope a philosophical dinner may be furnished with wine; otherwise, I will tell you plainly, I had rather be at a camping dinner than at yours. Bryskett, Discourse of Civil Life, p. 94.

Ravished, like some young Cephalus or Hylas, by a troop of camping housewifes in Viraginea. Milton, Apol. for Smectym.

CAMP-FIGHT. n. s. An old word for combat.

For their trial by camp-fight, the accuser was, with the peril of his own body, to prove the accused guilty; and, by offering him his glove or gauntlet, to challenge him to this trial. Hakewill.

CAMPA'IGN.† } n. s. [campaigne, Fr.;
CAMPA'NIA. } campania, Ital. The word campaign was not used probably till after the Restoration; for in the Life of Fuller in 1661 we find "during the campagnia, and while the army continued in the field, he performed the duty of his holy function."]

1. A large, open, level tract of ground, without hills.

In countries thinly inhabited, and especially in vast campanias, there are few cities, besides what grow by the residence of kings. Temple.

Those grateful groves that shade the plain,
Where Tiber rolls majestick to the main,
And fattens, as he runs, the fair campaign. Garth.

2. The time for which any army keeps the field, without entering into quarters.

This might have hastened his march, which would have made a fair conclusion of the campaign. Clarendon.

An Iliad rising out of one campaign. Addison.

To CAMPA'IGN.* v. n. [from the noun.] To serve in a campaign.

I have received the most flattering assurances from the officers, who campaigned in the late rebellion, that the military transactions have been accurately described. Sir R. Musgrave, Hist. of the Ir. Rebellion, p. vi.

CAMPA'IGNER.* n. s. [from campaign.] He who serves throughout a campaign; thus we say of a soldier, "he is an old campaigner."

CAMPA'NA.* n. s. [Lat.] The pasque-flower.

Campana here he crops, accounted wondrous good. Drayton, Polyolb. S. 13.

CAMPANO'LOGY.* n. s. [Lat. campana, and Gr. λογος.] The art or science of ringing bells.

CAMPA'NIFORM.† adj. [of campana, a bell, and forma, Lat.] A term used of flowers, which are in the shape of a bell. Harris.

Bind-weed, a beautiful white campaniform. Stukeley, Palæog. Sacr. p. 16.

CAMPA'NULA.* n. s. [Lat.] The bell-flower; the flower is of one leaf, shaped like a bell, spreading at the base.

CAMPA'NULATE. adj. The same with campaniform.

CAMPE'STRAL. adj. [campestris, Lat.] Growing in fields.

The mountain beech is the whitest; but the campestral, or wild beech, is blacker and more durable. Mortimer.

CAMPE'STRIAN.* adj. [old Fr. campestre, from the Lat. campestris.] Relating to the field; campestral.

CA'MPHIRE-TREE. n. s. [camphora, Lat.] There are two sorts of this tree; one is a native of the isle of Borneo, from which the best camphire is taken, which is supposed to be a natural exsudation from the tree, produced in such places where the bark of the tree has been wounded or cut. The other sort is a native of Japan, which Dr. Kempfer describes to be a kind of bay, bearing black or purple berries, and from whence the inhabitants prepare their camphire, by making a simple decoction of the root and wood of this tree, cut into small pieces; but this sort of camphire is, in value, eighty or an hundred times less than the true Bornean camphire. Miller.

It is oftener used for the gum of this tree.

To CA'MPHIRE.* v. a. [old Fr. camphrer.] To impregnate or wash with camphire.

Does every proud and self-affecting dame
Camphire her face for this? Tourneur, the Revenger's Tragedy.

Wash-balls perfumed, camphired, and plain, shall restore complexions to that degree, that a country foxhunter, who uses them, shall, in a week's time, look with a courtly and affable paleness. Tatler, No. 101.

CA'MPHORATE, or CA'MPHORATED.† adj. [from camphora, Lat.] Impregnated with camphire; as, spirits of wine camphorated.

By shaking the saline and camphorate liquours together, we easily confounded them into one high-coloured liquour. Boyle.

CA'MPING.* n. s. The act of playing at foot-ball in Norfolk and Suffolk, and perhaps in other counties. The Welsh camp is a game; and also the prize, given to the winner in any game of wrestling, running, and the like.

In our island, the exhibition of those manly sports in vogue among country people is called camping; and the enclosures for that purpose, where they wrestle and contend, are called camping closes. Bryant's Anc. Mythology.

CA'MPION. n. s. [lychnis, Lat.] A plant.

CA'MUS. n. s. [probably from camisa, Lat.] A thin dress, mentioned by Spenser.

And was yclad, for heat of scorching air,
All in a silken camus, lilly white,
Purfled upon with many a folded plight.
Spenser, F. Q.

CAN.* Often used for gan, or began, in our old poetry.

CAN.† n. s. [canne, Sax. the Dutch kan, is a quart. See also the old Fr. canne. Roquefort, Supplem.] A cup; generally a cup made of metal, or some other matter than earth.

I hate it as an unfill'd can. Shakspeare.

For his discourse, 'twas ever
About his business, war, or mirth, to make us
Relish a can of wine well.
Beaum. and Fl. Love's Pilgrimage.

One tree, the coco, affordeth stuff for housing, clothing, shipping, meat, drink, and can. Grew.

His empty can, with ears half worn away,
Was hung on high, to boast the triumph of the day. Dryden.

To CAN.† v. n. [konnen, Dutch; Sax. cunnan; Iceland. kunna; Goth. kunnan; to know, and to be able. It is sometimes, though rarely, used alone; but is in constant use as an expression of the potential mood; as, I can do, thou canst do, I could do, thou couldest do. It has no other terminations.]

1. To be able: to have power.

In place there is licence to do good and evil, whereof the latter is a curse; for, in evil, the best condition is not to will; the second not to can. Bacon, Ess. xi.

O, there's the wonder!
Mecænas and Agrippa, who can most
With Cæsar, are his foes. Dryden.

He can away with no company, whose discourse goes beyond what claret and dissoluteness inspires. Locke.

2. It expresses the potential mood; as, I can do it.

If she can make me blest! She only can:
Empire and wealth, and all she brings beside,
Are but the train and trappings of her love. Dryden.

3. It is distinguished from may, as power from permission; I can do it; it is in my power: I may do it; it is allowed me: but, in poetry, they are confounded.

4. Can is used of the person with the verb active, where may is used; of the thing, with the verb passive, as, I can do it; it may or can be done.

To CAN.* v. a. To know; to understand. Frequent in Chaucer.

Seemeth thy flocke thy counsell can.
Spenser, Shep. Cal. Feb. v. 77.

And can you these tongues perfectly?
Beaum. and Fl. The Coxcombe.

CANAILLE.† n. s. [French.] The lowest people; the dregs; the lees; the offscouring of the people: a French term of reproach, Dr. Johnson says. The Italians have the same expression, "canaglia, gente vile e abbietta." Dict. della Crusca. The expression in English is much older than I had supposed, when the first edition of this dictionary was published.

And this canaille of wild Independents — have hewed their way to, and lopped off the top, and to their power grubbed up the roots of the royal stock.
Archdeacon Arnway's Tablet, &c. 1661, p. 98.

To keep the sovereign canaille from intruding on the retirement of the poor king of the French. Burke.

CA'NAKIN.* n. s. [diminutive of can.] A small cup.

And let me the canakin clink. Shaksp. Othello.

CANA'L.† n. s. [canalis, Lat. Καυάλη, Græco-barb. an aqueduct. V. Critop. Emend. in Meursii Gloss. p. 42. old Fr. and Languedoc Dial. canal.]

1. A bason of water in a garden.

The walks and long canals reply. Pope.

2. Any tract or course of water made by art; as the canals in Holland, and the celebrated canals in this country.

The flood-compelling arch; the long canal,
Through mountains piercing, and uniting seas.
Thomson, Liberty, P. v.

3. [In anatomy.] A conduit or passage through which any of the juices of the body flow.

CA'NAL-COAL.† n. s. A fine kind of coal, dug up in England, Dr. Johnson says. The best is found near Wigan in Lancashire. As it soon lights, and emits a clear bright flame, it may be deduced perhaps from the Lat. candela, or the Welsh canwyll, a candle; or from the Sax. cene, quick, and ælan, to kindle. It is also written cannel-coal.

Even our canal-coal nearly equals the foreign jet. Woodward.

CANALI'CULATED. adj. [from canaliculatus, Lat.] Channelled; made like a pipe or gutter. Dict.

CANA'RY.† n. s. [from the Canary islands.]

1. Wine brought from the Canaries; now called sack.

I will to my honest knight Falstaff, and drink canary with him. —— I think I shall drink in pipe wine first with him; I'll make him dance.
Shakspeare, Merry Wives of Windsor.

2. An old dance. It is known in the Canary Isles by the name of canario.

They [the inhabitants of the Canary Islands] were and are at this day delighted with a kind of dance which they use also in Spain, and in other places; and because it took originall from thence, it is called the Canaries.
Transl. of Leo's Descript. of Africa, 1600.

I have seen a medicine,
That's able to breathe life into a stone;
Quicken a rock; and make you dance canary
With sprightly fire and motion.
Shakspeare, All's Well, &c.

To CANA'RY.† v. a. A cant word, Dr. Johnson says, which seems to signify to dance; to frolick. It is hardly a cant word, but adopted from the name of the dance, which Dr. Johnson dismisses with no other notice than that of "an old dance," and therefore probably guarded his definition of the verb with cant and seems.

Master, will you win your love with a French brawl? —— How mean'st thou, brawling in French? —— No, my compleat master; but to jigg off a tune at the tongue's end, canary to it with your feet, humour it with turning up your eyelids. Shakspeare, L. Labour's Lost.

CANA'RY-BIRD. n. s. An excellent singing bird, formerly bred in the Canaries, and nowhere else, but now bred in several parts of Europe, particularly Germany.

Of singing birds, they have linnets, goldfinches, ruddocks, canary birds, blackbirds, thrushes, and divers other. Carew, Surv. of Cornwall.

To CA'NCEL.† v. a. [canceller, Fr. from cancellis notare, to mark with cross lines, somewhat resembling cancelli, or lattice-work.]

1. To cross a writing.

A chancellor is he, whose office is to look into, and peruse, the writings and answers of the emperour; to cancel what is written amisse, and to signe that which is well. Jus Sigilli, (1673,) p. 8.

2. To efface; to obliterate in general.

Now welcome night, thou night so long expected,
That long day's labour doth at last defray,
And all my cares which cruel love collected,
Has summ'd in one, and cancelled for aye.
Spenser, Epithal.

Know then, I here forget all former griefs,
Cancel all grudge; repeal thee home again.
Shakspeare, Two Gent. of Ver.

Thou whom avenging pow'rs obey,
Cancel my debt, too great to pay,
Before the sad accounting day. Roscommon.

I pass the bills, my lords,
For cancelling your debts.
Southerne, Spartan Dame.

To CA'NCEL.* v. n.

In spite of our worst enemies, our kindred,
And a rash oath that cancell'd in the making,
We will pursue our loves to the last point.
Cowley.

CA'NCELLATED. particip. adj. [from cancel.] Cross-barred; marked with lines crossing each other.

The tail of the castor is almost bald, though the beast is very hairy; and cancellated, with some resemblance to the scales of fishes.
Grew's Museum.

CANCELLA'TION.† n. s. [old Fr. cancellation, "l'action de biffer les écritures ou les clauses d'un acte." Lacombe.] According to Bartolus, is an expunging or wiping out of the contents of an instrument, by two lines drawn in the manner of a cross. Ayliffe's Parergon.

CA'NCER.† n. s. [cancer, Lat. cancepe, Sax.]

1. A crabfish.

2. The sign of the summer solstice.

When now no more th' alternate Twins are fir'd,
And Cancer reddens with the solar blaze,
Short is the doubtful empire of the night.
Thomson.

3. A virulent swelling, or sore, not to be cured.

Any of these three may degenerate into a schirrus, and that schirrus into a cancer. Wiseman.

As when a cancer on the body feeds,
And gradual death from limb to limb proceeds:
So does the chillness to each vital part,
Spread by degrees, and creeps into the heart.
Addison, Ovid.

To CA'NCERATE. v. n. [from cancer.] To grow cancerous; to become a cancer.

But striking his fist upon the point of a nail in the wall, his hand cancerated, he fell into a fever, and soon after died on't. L'Estrange, Fab.

CANCERA'TION. n. s. [from cancerate.] A growing cancerous.

CA'NCEROUS. adj. [from cancer.] Having the virulence and qualities of a cancer.

How they are to be treated when they are strumous, schirrhous, or cancerous, you may see in their proper places. Wiseman.

CA'NCEROUSNESS. n. s. [from cancerous.] The state of being cancerous.

CA'NCRIFORM.* adj. [Lat. cancriformis.] The same as cancerous; as, a cancriform tumour.

CA'NCRINE. adj. [from cancer.] Having the qualities of a crab.

CA'NDENT. adj. [candens, Lat.] Hot; in the highest degree of heat, next to fusion.

If a wire be heated only at one end, according as that end is cooled upward or downward, it respectively acquires a verticity, as we have declared in wires totally candent. Brown, Vulg. Err.

CA'NDICANT. adj. [candicans, Lat.] Growing white; whitish. Dict.

CA'NDID.† adj. [candidus, Lat.]

1. White. This sense is certainly not common, as Dr. Johnson has observed, citing only Dryden.

The box receives all black: but, pour'd from thence,
The stones came candid forth, the hue of innocence. Dryden.

Ah! mild and gall-less dove,
Which dost the pure and candid dwellings love,
Canst thou in Albion still delight?
Still canst thou think it white?
Cowley, Ode, Restor. K. Ch. II. st. 3.

2. Free from malice; not desirous to find faults; fair; open; ingenuous.

The import of the discourse will, for the most part, if there be no designed fallacy, sufficiently lead candid and intelligent readers into the true meaning of it. Locke.

A candid judge will read each piece of wit,
With the same spirit that its author writ. Pope.

CA'NDIDATE.† n. s. [candidatus, Lat. candidat, Fr. which Cotgrave nearly two hundred years since has rendered, in terms very suitable to a certain sort of candidates in modern times, "a flatterer, a soother, a smoother; one that ever makes it fair weather!" The Romans denominated the suitor or competitor candidatus, from the white gown which he was obliged to wear.]

1. A competitor; one that solicits, or proposes himself for something of advancement.

So many candidates there stand for wit,
A place at court is scarce so hard to get.
Anonymous.

One would be surprised to see so many candidates for glory. Addison, Spect. No. 256.

2. It has generally for before the thing sought.

What could thus high thy rash ambition raise?
Art thou, fond youth, a candidate for praise? Pope.

3. Sometimes of.

Thy first fruits of poesy were giv'n,
To make thyself a welcome inmate there,
While yet a young probationer,
And candidate of heav'n. Dryden.

To CA'NDIDATE.* v. a. [from the noun.] To make a candidate; to render fit as a candidate.

The soldier is not expert, without passing through several perils. — The workman boils his silver, before it can be ready for burnishing. Without quarrelling with Rome, we can allow this purgatory, to purify and cleanse us, that we may be the better candidated for the court of Heaven and glory. Feltham, Resolves, ii. 57.

CA'NDIDLY. adv. [from candid.] Fairly; without trick; without malice; ingenuously.

We have often desired, they would deal candidly with us; for if the matter stuck only there, we would propose, that every man, should swear that he is a member of the church of Ireland. Swift.

CA'NDIDNESS.† n. s. [from candid.] Ingenuity; openness of temper; purity of mind.

It [conscience] presently sees the guilt of a sinful action; and, on the other side, observes the candidness of a man's very principles, and the sincerity of his intentions. South, Serm. ii. 454.

No man, drenched in hate, can promise to himself the candidness of an upright judge. Feltham, Resolves, ii. 62.

To CA'NDIFY.† v. a. [candifico, Lat.] To make white; to whiten. Coles.

CA'NDLE.† n. s. [candela, Lat. canȝel, Sax. canwyll, Welsh, which is supposed to be derived from cann, white, and gwyll, darkness, because it occasions darkness to be white. This, however, as well as the Lat. candela, refers us to the Lat. verb candeo, as the origin. The old Fr. also is candaille. Roq. Suppl.]

1. A light made of wax or tallow, surrounding a wick of flax or cotton.

Here burns my candle out, ay, here it dies,
Which, while it lasted, gave King Henry light.
Shakspeare.

We see that wax candles last longer than tallow candles, because wax is more firm and hard. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

Take a child, and, setting a candle before him, you shall find his pupil to contract very much, to exclude the light, with the brightness whereof it would otherwise be dazzled. Ray.

2. Light, or luminary.

By these bless'd candles of the night,
Had you been there, I think you would have begg'd
The ring of me, to give the worthy doctor.
Shakspeare.

CA'NDLEBERRY TREE. See SWEET-WILLOW; of which it is a species.

CA'NDLEHOLDER.† n. s. [from candle and hold.] He that holds the candle, Dr. Johnson says. It may be further observed, that candles were formerly borne by servants, and not placed on the table. Not attending to this circumstance, Dr. Johnson has also distinguished the candleholder, as "him who remotely assists;" when, in fact, the word in the passage which he has cited, means literally the holder of a torch or candle, as was common at the entertainments of our ancestors; which was a fashion borrowed from the French. Some think that the proverbial scoff, You are not fit to hold a candle to him, hence took its rise.

A torch for me: let wanton, light of heart,
Tickle the senseless rushes with her heels;
For I am proverb'd with a grandsire phrase,
To be a candleholder, and look on.
Shakspeare, Rom. and Juliet.

CA'NDLELIGHT.† n. s. [canȝelleohȶ, Sax.]

1. The light of a candle.

In darkness, candlelight may serve to guide men's steps, which, to use in the day, were madness. Hooker, ii. § 4.

Before the day was done, her work she sped,
And never went by candlelight to bed.
Dryden, Fables.

The boding owl
Steals from her private cell by night,
And flies about the candlelight. Swift.

Such as are adapted to meals, will indifferently serve for dinners or suppers, only distinguishing between daylight and candlelight. Swift.

2. The necessary candles for use.

I shall find him coals and candlelight.
Molineux to Locke.

CA'NDLEMAS.† n. s. [canȝelmæſſe, Sax.] The feast of the purification of the Blessed Virgin, which was formerly celebrated with many lights in churches.

The harvest dinners are held by every wealthy man, or, as we term it, by every good liver, between Michaelmas and Candlemas.
Carew, Survey of Cornwall.

There is a general tradition in most parts of Europe, that inferreth the coldness of the succeeding winter, upon shining of the sun upon Candlemas day. Brown, Vulg. Err.

Come Candlemas nine years ago she dy'd,
And now lies bury'd by the yew-tree side. Gay.

CA'NDLESTICK.† n. s. [canȝelſtıcca, Sax.] The instrument that holds candles.

The horsemen sit like fixed candlesticks,
With torch-staves in their hands; and their poor jades
Lob down their heads. Shakspeare.

These countries were once christian, and members of the church, and where the golden candlesticks did stand. Bacon.

I know a friend, who has converted the essays of a man of quality, into a kind of fringe for his candlesticks. Addison.

CA'NDLESTUFF. n. s. [from candle and stuff.] Any thing of which candles may be made; kitchen stuff; grease; tallow.

By the help of oil, and wax, and other candlestuff, the flame may continue, and the wick not burn. Bacon.

CA'NDLEWASTER.† n. s. [from candle and waste.] One that consumes candles; a spendthrift, Dr. Johnson says. Mr. Malone thinks it may mean a drunkard, one who passes the night in drinking, and thus wastes candles; and drunk is connected with the word in the example. The word appears to have been also a contemptuous term for scholars.

Patch grief with proverbs, make misfortune drunk
With candlewasters. Shakspeare.

A whoreson book-worm, a candle-waster.
B. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels.

CA'NDLES-ENDS.* n. s. [from candle and end.] A contemptuous term for scraps or fragments.

Our lives are but our marches to our graves,
How dost thou now, Lieutenant? ——
Faith 'tis true, Sir,
We are but spans, and candles ends.
Beaum. and Fl. Hum. Lieutenant.

CA'NDOCK. n. s. A weed that grows in rivers.

Let the pond lie dry six or twelve months, both to kill the water weeds, as water-lilies, candocks, reate, and bulrushes, and also, that as these die for want of water, so grass may grow on the pond's bottom. Walton.

CA'NDOUR. n. s. [candor, Lat.] Sweetness of temper; purity of mind; openness; ingenuousness; kindness.

He should have so much of a natural candour and sweetness, mixed with all the improvement of learning, as might convey knowledge with a sort of gentle insinuation. Watts.

To CA'NDY. v. a. [probably from candare, a word used in later times for to whiten.]

1. To conserve with sugar, in such a manner as that the sugar lies in flakes, or breaks into spangles.

Should the poor be flatter'd?
No, let the candy'd tongue lick absurd pomp,
And crook the pregnant hinges of the knee,
Where thrift may follow fawning. Shakspeare.

They have in Turkey confections like to candied conserves, made of sugar and lemons, or sugar and citrons, or sugar and violets, and some other flowers, and mixture of amber. Bacon.

With candy'd plantanes, and the juicy pine,
On choicest melons and sweet grapes they dine.
Waller.

2. To form into congelations.

Will the cold brook,
Candied with ice, cawdle thy morning toast,
To cure thy o'er-night's surfeit? Shakspeare.

3. To incrust with congelations.

Since when those frosts that winter brings,
Which candy every green,
Renew us like the teeming springs,
And we thus fresh are seen. Drayton.

To CA'NDY. v. n. To grow congealed.

CA'NDY Lion's foot. [catanance, Lat.] A plant. Miller.

CA'NDY Tuft-tree.* [iberis, Lat.] A plant. Chambers.

CANE.† n. s. [canna, Lat.; canne, Fr.; κάννα and κάννη, Gr.; kaneh, Heb. the river Kanah, the brook of reeds, Josh. xvii. 9.]

1. A kind of strong reed, of which walking staffs are made; a walking staff.

Shall I to please another wine sprung mind
Lose all mine own? God hath given me a measure
Short of his cane and body: must I find
A pain in that wherein he finds a pleasure?
Herbert.

The king thrust the captain from him with his cane; whereupon he took his leave and went home.
Harvey.

If the poker be out of the way, or broken, stir the fire with your master's cane. Swift.

2. The plant which yields the sugar.

This cane or reed grows plentifully both in the East and West Indies. Other reeds have their skin hard and dry, and their pulp void of juice; but the skin of the sugar cane is soft, and the spongy matter or pith it contains very juicy. It usually grows four or five feet high, and about half an inch in diameter. The stem or stalk is divided by knots a foot and a half apart. At the top it puts forth a number of long green tufted leaves, from the middle of which arise the flower and the seed. There are likewise leaves springing out from each knot; but these usually fall as the cane rises. They usually plant them in pieces cut a foot and a half below the top of the flower, and they are ordinarily ripe in ten months, though sometimes not till fifteen; at which time they are found quite full of a white succulent marrow, whence is expressed the liquour of which sugar is made. When ripe, they are cut, and carried in bundles to the mills, which consist of three wooden rollers, covered with steel plates.
Chambers.

Thou hast bought me no sweet cane with money.
Isaiah, xliii. 24.

To what purpose cometh there to me incense from Sheba? and the sweet cane from a far country?
Jerem. vi. 20.

And the sweet liquour on the cane bestow,
From which prepar'd the luscious sugars flow.
Blackmore.

3. A lance; a dart made of cane; whence the Spanish inego de cannas.

Abenamar, thy youth these sports has known,
Of which thy age is now spectator grown;
Judge-like thou sitt'st, to praise or to arraign,
The flying skirmish of the darted cane. Dryden.

4. A reed.

Food may be afforded to bees, by small canes or troughs conveyed into their hives.
Mortimer, Husbandry.

To CANE.† v. a. [from the noun.] To beat with a walking staff, or cane.

The great prince, who some years ago caned a general officer at the head of his army, disgraced him irrecoverably.
A. Smith, Theor. of Mor. Sent. i. 3.

CA'NIBAL.† n. s. See CANNIBAL. It was formerly written canibal.

Whose teeth are canibals, their tongues adder-forks. Florio's First-Fruits, &c. Pref. 1598.

CANI'CULAR. adj. [canicularis, Lat.] Belonging to the dog-star; as, canicular or dog-days.

In regard to different latitudes, unto some the canicular days are in the winter; as unto such as are under the equinoctial line; for, unto them, the dog-star ariseth, when the sun is about the tropick of Cancer, which season unto them is winter.
Brown, Vulg. Err.

CA'NICULE.* n. s. Lat. canicula, the dog-star; and figuratively, the dog-days.

We are here quite burnt up. — But among all these inconveniences, the greatest I suffer is from your departure, which is more afflicting to me than the canicule. Addison, Letter in the Student, ii. 89.

CANI'NE.† adj. [old Fr. canin, from caninus, Lat.]

1. Having the properties of a dog.

A kind of women are made up of canine particles: these are scolds, who imitate the animals out of which they were taken, always busy and barking, and snarl at every one that comes in their way. Addison, Spect. No. 209.

2. Canine hunger, in medicine, is an appetite which cannot be satisfied.

It may occasion an exorbitant appetite of usual things, which they will take in such quantities, till they vomit them up like dogs, from whence it is called canine. Arbuthnot.

CA'NISTER.† n. s. [canister or canistrum, Lat.]

1. A small basket.

White lilies in full canisters they bring,
With all the glories of the purple spring.
Dryden, Virgil.

2. A small vessel in which any thing, such as tea or coffee, is laid up. So in bas Bret. canastell, a little vessel; low Lat. canastellus.

CA'NKER.† n. s. [cancer, Lat. It seems to have the same meaning and original with cancer, but to be accidentally written with a k, when it denotes bad qualities in a less degree; or, canker might come from chancre, Fr. and cancer from the Latin. The Sax. cancepe or cancpe is both the animal and the disease.]

1. A worm that preys upon, and destroys fruits.

And loathful idleness he doth detest,
The canker worm of every gentle breast.
Spenser, F. Q.

That which the locust hath left, hath the canker worm eaten. Joel, i. 4.

Yet writers say, as in the sweetest bud
The eating canker dwells; so eating love
Inhabits in the finest wits of all. Shakspeare.

A huffing, shining, flatt'ring, cringing coward,
A canker worm of peace, was rais'd above him.
Otway.

2. A fly that preys upon fruits.

There be of flies, caterpillars, canker flies, and bear flies. Walton's Angler.

3. Any thing that corrupts or consumes. In the north of England, canker is the word for rust.

It is the canker and ruin of many men's estates, which, in process of time, breeds a public poverty.
Bacon.

Sacrilege may prove an eating canker, and a consuming moth, in the estate that we leave them.
Atterbury.

No longer live the cankers of my court;
All to your several states with speed resort;
Waste in wild riot what your land allows,
There ply the early feast, and late carouse. Pope.

4. A kind of wild worthless rose; the dogrose.

To put down Richard, that sweet lovely rose,
And plant this thorn, this canker Bolingbroke.
Shakspeare.

Draw a cherry with the leaf, the shaft of a steeple, a single or canker rose. Peacham.

5. An eating or corroding humour.

I am not glad, that such a sore of time
Should seek a plaister by a contemn'd revolt,
And heal th' inveterate canker of one wound,
By making many. Shakspeare.

6. Corrosion; virulence.

As with age his body uglier grows,
So his mind with cankers. Shakspeare.

7. A disease in trees. Dict.

The calf, the wind-shock, and the knot,
The canker, scab, scurf, sap, and rot. Evelyn.

8. A poisonous fungus, resembling a mushroom. Gloucestershire. Grose.

To CA'NKER. v. n. [from the noun.]

1. To grow corrupt; implying something venomous and malignant.

That cunning architect of canker'd guile,
Whom princes late displeasure left in bands,
For falsed letters, and suborned wile. Spenser. F. Q.

I will lift the down trod Mortimer
As high i'th' air as this unthankful king,
As this ingrate and canker'd Bolingbroke. Shaks.

Or what the cross dire looking planet smites,
Or hurtful worm with canker'd venom bites.
Milton, Arcades.

To some new clime, or to thy native sky,
Oh! friendless and forsaken virtue, fly:
The Indian air is deadly to thee grown;
Deceit and canker'd malice rule thy throne.
Dryden, Aurengz.

Let envious jealousy, and canker'd spite
Produce my actions to severest light,
And tax my open day, or secret night. Prior.

2. To decay by some corrosive or destructive principle.

Silvering will sully and canker more than gilding; which, if it might be corrected with a little mixture of gold, will be profitable.
Bacon, Phys. Rem.

To CA'NKER.† v. a.

1. To corrupt; to corrode.

Your gold and silver is cankered; and the rust of them shall be a witness against you, and shall eat your flesh as it were fire. St. James, v. 3.

Restore to God his due in tithe and time:
A tithe purloin'd, cankers the whole estate. Herbert.

2. To infect; to pollute.

An honest man will enjoy himself better in a moderate fortune, that is gained with honour and reputation, than in an overgrown estate, hat is cankered with the acquisitions of rapine and exaction.
Addison, Spect. No. 469.

CA'NKERBIT. particip. adj. [from canker and bit.] Bitten with an envenomed tooth.

Know thy name is lost;
By treason's tooth baregnawn and cankerbit.
Shakspeare.

Above his cedars top it high doth shoot,
And canker-like devoures it to the root.
Mir. for Mag. p. 704.

CA'NKEROUS.* adj. [from canker.] Corroding like a canker.

Another species of tyrannick rule,
Unknown before, whose cankerous shackles seiz'd
The envenom'd soul. Thomson, Liberty, P. iv.

CA'NKERY.* adj. [from canker.] Rusty.

It [the MS.] had the plain mark of age, the ink being turned brown and cankry. Wogan, in Burton's Genuineness of Ld. Clarendon's Hist. p. 140.

CA'NNABINE. adj. [cannabinus, Lat.] Hempen. Dict.

CA'NNIBAL.† n. s. [probably from the Lat. canis, a dog; Fr. "appetit de chien," a most unsatiate appetite, Cotgrave; and the modern chien is used for one of that kind. But see Herrera's Descripcion de las Indias Occidentales, vol. i. p. 11. col. 1. where we read, "Las Islas qui estan desde la Isla de San Juan de Porto rico al oriente de ella, para la costa de Tierra-Firme, se llamaron los Canibales por los muchos Caribes comedores de carne humana que truvo en ellas i segun se interpreta en su lengua Canibal, quiere decir, Hombre valiente, porque por tales eran tenidos de los otros Indios." In old maps, it may be added, the Caribbee Islands are called the Cannibal Islands.] An anthropophagite; a man-eater.

The cannibals themselves eat no man's flesh, of those that die of themselves, but of such as are slain. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

They were little better than cannibals, who do hunt one another; and he that hath most strength and swiftness, doth eat and devour all his fellows. Davies on Ireland.

It was my hint to speak,
Of the cannibals that each other eat;
The anthropophagi. Shakspeare.

The captive cannibal, opprest with chains,
Yet braves his foes, reviles, provokes, disdains;
Of nature fierce, untameable, and proud:
He bids defiance to the gaping croud;
And spent at last, and speechless as he lies,
With fiery glances mocks their rage, and dies.
Granville.

If an eleventh commandment had been given, Thou shalt not eat human flesh; would not these cannibals have esteemed it more difficult than all the rest? Bentley.

CA'NNIBALISM.* n. s. [from cannibal.] The character or conduct of a cannibal.

Unless a warm opposition to the spirit of levelling, to the spirit of impiety, to the spirit of proscription, plunder, murder, and cannibalism, be adverse to the true principles of freedom. Burke.

CA'NNIBALLY. adv. [from cannibal.] In the manner of a cannibal.

Before Corioli, he scotcht him and notcht him like a carbinado. — Had he been cannibally given, he might have broiled, and eaten him too. Shaksp.

CA'NNIPERS. n. s. [corrupted from callipers; which see.]

The square is taken by a pair of cannipers, or two rulers clapped to the side of a tree, measuring the distance between them. Mortimer's Husbandry.

CA'NNON. n. s. [cannon, Fr. from canna, Lat. a pipe, meaning a large tube. See CANE.]

1. A great gun for battery.
2. A gun larger than can be managed by the hand. They are of so many sizes, that they decrease in the bore from a ball of forty-eight pounds to a ball of five ounces.

As cannons overcharg'd with double cracks,
So they redoubled strokes upon the foe. Shakspeare.

He had left all the cannon he had taken; and now he sent all his great cannon to a garrison. Clarendon.

The making, or price, of these gunpowder instruments, is extremely expensive, as may be easily judged by the weight of their materials; a whole cannon weighing commonly eight thousand pounds; a half cannon, five thousand; a culverin, four thousand five hundred; a demi-culverin, three thousand; which, whether it be in iron or brass, must needs be very costly. Wilkins, Math. Magick.

CA'NNON-BALL, CA'NNON-BULLET, CA'NNON-SHOT. } n. s. [from cannon, ball, bullet, and shot.] The balls which are shot from great guns.

CA'NON.† n. s. [Gr. κάνων; Lat. canon: Sax. canon.]

1. A rule; a law.

The truth is, they are rules and canons of that law, which is written in all men's hearts; the church had for ever, no less than now, stood bound to observe them, whether the apostle had mentioned them or no. Hooker, iii. § 4.

His books are almost the very canon to judge both doctrine and discipline by. Hooker, Ecc. Pol. Pref.

Religious canons, civil laws are cruel,
Then what should war be? Shaksp.

Canons in logick are such as these: every part of a division, singly taken, must contain less than the whole; and a definition must be peculiar and proper to the thing defined. Watts.

2. The laws made by ecclesiastical councils.

Canon law is that law, which is made and ordained in a general council, or provincial synod of the church. Ayliffe.

These were looked on as lapsed persons, and great severities of penance were prescribed them, by the canons of Ancyra. Stillingfleet.

3. The books of Holy Scripture; or the great rule.

Canon also denotes those books of Scripture, which are received as inspired and canonical, to distinguish them from either profane, apocryphal, or disputed books. Thus we say, that Genesis is part of the sacred canon of the Scripture. Ayliffe.

4. A dignitary in cathedral churches. [Sax. canonicar, canons. Canons [were] so called from their having their shares out of a common stock, canon among the Romans signifying a certain payment. Stillingfleet. Ecc. Cases, vol. ii. p. 561.

For deans and canons, or prebends of cathedral churches, they were of great use in the church; they were to be of counsel with the bishop for his revenue, and for his government in causes ecclesiastical. Bacon.

Swift much admires the place and air,
And longs to be a canon there.
A canon! that's a place too mean:
No, doctor, you shall be a dean.
Two dozen canons round your stall,
And you the tyrant o'er them all. Swift.

5. Canons Regular. Such as are placed in monasteries. Ayliffe.
6. Canons Secular. Such as were placed in collegiate churches. Priests were called secular; and such as led a monastick life, regular. And so canons were both regular and secular. Weever's Fun. Mon.
7. [Among chirurgeons.] An instrument used in sewing up wounds. Dict.
8. A large sort of printing letter, probably so called from being first used in printing a book of canons; or perhaps from its size, and therefore properly written cannon.

CA'NONSHIP. } ecclesiastical benefice in some cathedral or collegiate church, which has a prebend, or a stated allowance out of the revenues of such church, commonly annexed to it. Ayliffe.

CA'NOPIED.† adj. [from canopy.] Covered with a canopy.
Her eyes, like marigolds, had sheath'd their light,
And canopied in darkness, sweetly lay,
Till they might open to adorn the day.
Shakspeare, Rape of Lucrece.
I sat me down to watch upon a bank,
With ivy canopied, and interwove
With flaunting honeysuckle. Milton, Comus.

CA'NOPY.† n. s. [Lat. canopeum, or conopeum; Gr. κωνωπεῖον, a net "that hangeth about beds to keep away gnats;" as Barret in his old dictionary rightly defines this word; "sometimes," he adds, "a tent or pavilion; and sometimes for a testern to hang over a bed." It is from κώνωψ, a gnat or fly. Varro uses conopeum for a bed or couch, De Re Rust. Our translators of the Apocrypha employ the word in its original sense.] A covering of state over or round a throne or bed: a covering spread over the head.
She is there brought unto a paled green,
And plac'd under a stately canopy,
The warlike feats of both those knights to see.
Spenser, F. Q.
Now spread the night her spangled canopy,
And summon'd every restless eye to sleep.
Fairfax.
She smote twice upon his neck with all her might, and she took away his head from him; and tumbled his body down from the bed, and pulled down the canopy from the pillars. Judith, xiii. 9.
Nor will the raging fever's fire abate,
With golden canopies, and beds of state. Dryden.

To CA'NOPY.† v. a. [from the noun.] To cover with a canopy. Dr. Johnson cites only Dryden, who has literally copied an elder poet.
When lofty trees I see barren of leaves,
Which erst from heat did canopy the herd.
Shakspeare, Sonnet.
And there large branches did display,
To canopy the place. Drayton, Quest of Cynthia.
The birch, the myrtle, and the bay,
Like friends did all embrace!
And their large branches did display,
To canopy the place. Dryden.

CANO'ROUS. adj. [canorus, Lat.] Musical; tuneful.

CANO'ROUSNESS.* n. s. [from canorous.] Musicalness. Scot.

CANT.† n. s. [probably from cantus, Lat. implying the odd tone of voice used by vagrants; but imagined by some to be corrupted from quaint. Or it may be from the Gael. caint, discourse; canteach, full of talk. But the old Fr. cant is "chant, action de chanter." V. Roquefort, Gloss.]
1. A corrupt dialect used by beggars and vagabonds.
2. A particular form of speaking peculiar to some certain class or body of men.
I write not always in the proper terms of navigation, land service, or in the cant of any profession. Dryden.
If we would trace out the original of that flagrant and avowed impiety, which has prevailed among us for some years, we should find, that it owes its rise to that cant and hypocrisy, which had taken possession of the people's minds in the times of the great rebellion.
Addison, Freeholder, No. 37.
Astrologers, with an old paltry cant, and a few pot-hooks for planets, to amuse the vulgar, have too long been suffered to abuse the world.
Swift, Predictions for the Year 1701.
A few general rules, with a certain cant of words, has sometimes set up an illiterate heavy writer, for a most judicious and formidable critick.
Addison, Spectator, No. 291.
3. A whining pretension to goodness, in formal and affected terms.
Of promise prodigal, while power you want,
And preaching in the self-denying cant.
Dryden, Aurengz.
He who should be present at all their long cant, would shew a greater ability in watching, than ever they could pretend to in praying, if he could forbear sleeping, having so strong a provocation to it, and so fair an excuse for it.
South, Serm. ii. 160.
4. Barbarous jargon.
The affectation of some late authors, to introduce and multiply cant words, is the most ruinous corruption in any language. Swift.
5. Auction. [It might be supposed to be from the old Fr. cant, combien; Lat. quantum, V. Roquefort, Gloss. But the Italian incanto is literally an auction: "vendere all' incanto," being as common as our phrase to be sold by auction; though it means that the sale is proclaimed by sound of trumpet. See Vocab. Della Crusca, in V. Incantare.]
Numbers of these tenants, or their descendants, are now offering to sell their leases by cant, even those which were for lives. Swift.

CANT.* n. s. [kant, Dutch. See CANTLE.] An angle; a corner; a niche. In Kent, the corner of a field is termed a cant: in Pembrokeshire, a piece of cheese is so called.
The first and principal person in the temple was Peace; she was placed aloft in a cant.
B. Jonson, Coron. Entertainment.

To CANT. v. n. [from the noun.] To talk in the jargon of particular professions or in any kind of formal, affected language, or with a peculiar and studied tone of voice.

Men cant about materia and forma; hunt chimeras by rules of art, or dress up ignorance in words of bulk or sound, which may stop up the mouth of enquiry. Glanville, Scept. Scient.

That uncouth affected garb of speech, or canting language rather, if I may so call it, which they have of late taken up, is the signal distinction and characteristical note of that, which, in that their new language, they call the godly party. Bp. Sanderson.

The busy, subtile serpents of the law,
Did first my mind from true obedience draw;
While I did limits to the king prescribe,
And took for oracles that canting tribe. Roscom.

Unskill'd in schemes by planets to foreshow,
Like canting rascals, how the wars will go.
Dryd. Juv.

To CANT.* v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To sell by auction.

Is it not the general method of landlords to wait the expiration of a lease, and then cant their land to the highest bidder? Swift, against the Power of Bishops.

2. To bid a price at an auction.

When two monks were outvying each other in canting the price of an abbey, he [William Rufus] observed a third at some distance, who said never a word: the king demanded why he would not offer; the monk said, he was poor: and besides, would give nothing if he were ever so rich: the king replied, then you are the fittest person to have it, and immediately gave it him. Swift, Hist. of Eng. Reign of W. II.

CANTA'TA.† n. s. [Ital.] A song, intermixed with recitatives and airs.

CANTE'EN.* n. s. In military language, a vessel of tin, [and sometimes of wood,] in the form of square bottles, used for carrying liquours to supply soldiers in camp. Chambers.

CANTA'TION.† n. s. [from canto, Lat.] The act of singing. Cockeram.

CA'NTER.† n. s. [from cant.] A term of reproach for hypocrites, who talk formally of religion, without obeying it; from the vagrants who cant.

A rogue,
A very canter, sir, one that maunds
Upon the pad. B. Jonson, Staple of News.

Oh 'twill be
An excellent age of crotchets, and of canters.
Beaum. and Fl. The Coronation.

That ignorance, idleness, pride, presumption, &c. which some spiritual canters affect.
Bp. Gauden's Heiraspistes, 1653, p. 97.

CA'NTER.* n. s. An abbreviation of Canterbury. See CANTERBURY GALLOP; in the definition of which, Dr. Johnson uses this substantive; and he is confirmed in the derivation by a passage in Sampson's Fair Maid of Clifton, (1633) where he, who personates the hobby horse, speaks of his smooth ambles and Canterbury paces.

To CA'NTER.* v. n. [from the noun.] To gallop easily or gently. Now, a common expression; as, the horse canters in a fine style.

CA'NTERBURY BELLS. See BELFLOWER.

CA'NTERBURY GALLOP. [In horsemanship.] The hand gallop of an ambling horse, commonly called a canter; said to be derived from the pilgrims riding to Canterbury on easy ambling horses.

CA'NTERBURY TALE.* n. s. An expression denoting any fabulous or overwrought narrative, adopted from the Canterbury Tales of Chaucer.

CANTHA'RIDES.† n. s. plural. [Fr. cantharide; Gr. καν θαρὶς, dimin. of κάνθαρος, a beetle or chafer.] Spanish flies; used to raise blisters.

The flies cantharides, are bred of a worm, or caterpillar, but peculiar to certain fruit trees; as are the fig tree, the pine tree, and the wild briar; all which bear sweet fruit, and fruit that hath a kind of secret biting or sharpness; for the fig hath a milk in it that is sweet and corrosive; the pine apple hath a kernel that is strong and abstersive. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

CA'NTHUS. n. s. [Latin.] The corner of the eye. The internal is called the greater, the external the lesser canthus. Quincy.

A gentlewoman was seized with an inflammation and tumour in the great canthus, or angle of her eye. Wiseman.

CA'NTICLE.† n. s. [Sax. cantic, from the Lat. canto.]

1. A song; used generally for a song in scripture. Bullokar calls it a sonnet.

This right of estate, in some nations, is yet more significantly expressed by Moses in his canticles, in the person of God to the Jews. Bacon, Holy War.

2. A division of a poem; a canto.

The end whereof, and dangerous event,
Shall for another canticle be spared.
Spenser, F. Q. iv. vi. 46.

CANTILI'VERS. n. s. Pieces of wood framed into the front or other sides of an house to sustain the moulding and eaves over it. Moxon's Mechan. Exercises.

CA'NTINGLY.* adv. [from cant.] In a canting manner.

I dread nothing more than the false zeal of my friends, in a suffering hour, as he [Whitfield] cantingly expresses it.
Trial of Mr. Whitfield's Spirit, (1740,) p. 40.

CA'NTION. n. s. [cantio, Lat.] Song, verses. Not now in use.

In the eighth eclogue the same person was brought in singing a cantion of Colin's making. Spenser, Shep. Cal. Glos.

CA'NTLE.† n. s. [kant, Dut. a corner; eschantillon, Fr. a piece. So far Dr. Johnson. The Teut. or Dutch kanteel, from kant, must be also noticed; and the Fr. chantel, a fragment, a piece of any thing; from the Lat. quantulum. The commentators on the passage in Shakspeare, which Dr. Johnson has cited as the only instance of this word, have derived cantle from the Fr. canton, and the Ital. canto, a corner. Cantle is one of our oldest words; signifying not merely a corner, but a portion of any thing; as a cantle or cantel of bread, cheese, and the like. Chaucer has "no part ne cantel of a thing."] A fragment; a portion; a corner or piece of any thing.

She brought her fees,
A cantel of Essex cheese. Skelton's Poems, p. 135.

Not these cantels and morsels of scripture, warbled — to give pleasure unto the ears.
Harmar, Tr. of Beza's Serm. p. 267.

See how this river comes, me crankling in,
And cuts me from the best of all my land,
A huge halfmoon, a monstrous cantle out.
Shakspeare, Hen. IV.

Do you remember
The cantell of immortal cheese ye carried with ye?
Beaum. and Fl. Queen of Corinth.

His robe of state is a scarlet mantle,
With eleven king's beards bordered about,
And there is room lefte yet in a kantle,
For thine to stand, to make the twelfth out.
Enderbie's Camb. Triumph. p. 197.

To CA'NTLE.† v. a. [from the noun.] To cut in pieces; to divide.

That this vast globe terrestrial should be cantled.
Decker's Whore of Babylon, 1607.

For four times talking, if one piece thou take,
That must be cantled, and the judge go snack.
Dryden, Juv.

CA'NTLET. n. s. [from cantle.] A piece; a fragment.

Nor shield, nor armour can their force oppose;
Huge cantlets of his buckler strew the ground,
And no defence in his bor'd arms is found. Dryd.

CA'NTO.† n. s. [Ital.]

1. A book, or section, of a poem. Dr. Johnson cites a passage, in proof of this definition, from Shakspeare, where the real word is canton; which was common, in Shakspeare's time, for canto. The cantos of the poems by Spenser and Butler must be in the recollection of most men.

2. The treble part of a song or musical composition.

CA'NTON.† n. s. [old Fr. cantoin, quanton, and then canton; from the Lat. quantum. Cotgrave defines canton, "a corner or cross-way in a street; also a hundred or canton, a precinct."]

1. A small parcel or division of land.

Only that little canton of land, called the English pale, containing four small shires, did maintain a bordering war with the Irish, and retain the form of English government. Davies.

2. A small community, or clan.

The same is the case of rovers by land; such, as yet, are some cantons in Arabia, and some petty kings of the mountains, adjacent to straits and ways. Bacon, Holy War.

3. In heraldry, the canton is that which occupies only a corner of the shield.

To CA'NTON.† v. a. [Fr. cantonner.] To divide into little parts. See CANTONMENT.

They would have cantoned the kingdom, and erected their several provinces into so many principalities. Bp. Morley, Corona. Serm. 1661, p. 24.

Families shall quit all subjection to him, and canton his empire into less governments for themselves. Locke.

It would certainly be for the good of mankind, to have all the mighty empires and monarchies of the world cantoned out into petty states and principalities. Addison on Italy.

The late king of Spain, reckoning it an indignity to have his territories cantoned out into parcels by other princes, during his own life, and without his consent, rather chose to bequeath the monarchy entire to a younger son of France. Swift.

They canton out to themselves a little province in the intellectual world, where they fancy the light shines, and all the rest is in darkness. Watts on the Mind.

To CA'NTONIZE. v. a. [from canton.] To parcel out into small divisions.

Thus was all Ireland cantonized among ten persons of the English nation. Davies on Ireland.

The whole forest was in a manner cantonized amongst a very few in number, of whom some had regal rights. Howel.

CA'NTONMENT.* n. s. [Fr.] That distinct situation, which soldiers occupy when quartered in different parts of a town; and to canton a town, is to divide it for such purpose.

There were no cities, no towns, no places of cantonment for soldiers.
Burke, Abridg. of Eng. Hist.

CA'NTRED. n. s. The same in Wales as an hundred in England. For cantref, in the British language, signifieth an hundred. Cowel.

The king regrants to him all that province, reserving only the city of Dublin, and the cantreds next adjoining, with the maritime towns.
Davies on Ireland.

CA'NTY.* adj. In the north of England, is cheerful, talkative. Grose. Perhaps from the Gael. canteach. See CANT. Others from the Su-Goth. gante. See Craven Dialect, 1824, where cant, (or canty,) is interpreted lively. So in Brocket's N. Country Words, it is merry, lively, cheerful; Su-Goth. ganta, ludificare.

CA'NVASS.† n. s. [canevas, Fr. cannabis, Lat. hemp.]

1. A kind of linen cloth woven for several uses, as sails, painting cloths, tents.

The master commanded forthwith to set on all the canvass they could, and fly homeward. Sidney.

And eke the pens that did his pinions bind,
Were like main yards with flying canvass lin'd.
Spenser, F. Q.

Their canvass castles up they quickly rear,
And build a city in an hour's space. Fairfax.

Where-e'er thy navy spreads her canvass wings,
Homage to thee, and peace to all she brings.
Waller.

With such kind passion hastes the prince to fight,
And spreads his flying canvass to the Sound;
Him whom no danger, were he there, could fright;
Now absent, every little noise can wound. Dryd.

Thou, Kneller, long with noble pride,
The foremost of thy art, hast vy'd
With nature in a generous strife,
And touch'd the canvass into life. Addison.

2. The act of sifting voices, or trying them previously to the decisive act of voting: [from canvass, as it signifies a sieve.]

There be that can pack cards, and yet cannot play well: so there are some that are good in canvasses and factions, that are otherwise weak men. Bacon, Ess. xxii.

But why shouldst thou take thy neglect, thy canvass so to heart? It may be thou art not fit.
Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 357.

I deem it worthy the canvass and discussion of sober and considerate men.
More, Pre-exist. of the Soul, Pref.

To CA'NVASS† v. a. [Skinner derives it from canabasser, Fr. to beat hemp; which being a very laborious employment, it is used to signify, to search diligently into. This is a verb in our language of much higher authority than Woodward or L'Estrange, whom Dr. Johnson cites. Barret, in his old dictionary, has "canvessed, much talked of;" and the word in Shakspeare implies to examine narrowly. So Cotgrave renders canabasser, "to canvass, or curiously to examine, or sift out, the depth of the matter."]

1. To sift; to examine; from canvass, a straining cloth.

Thou, that contriv'dst to murder our dead lord;
Thou, that giv'st whores indulgences to sin:
I'll canvass thee in thy broad cardinal's hat,
If thou proceed in this thy insolence.
Shakspeare, K. Hen. VI. P. I.

I have made careful search on all hands, and canvassed the matter with all possible diligence.
Woodward.

2. To debate; to discuss.

The curs discovered a raw hide in the bottom of a river, and laid their heads together how to come at it: they canvassed the matter one way and t'other, and concluded, that the way to get it, was to drink their way to it. L'Estrange.

To CA'NVASS. v. n. To solicit; to try votes previously to the decisive act.

Elizabeth being to resolve upon an officer, and being by some that canvassed for others, put in some doubt of that person she meant to advance, said, she was like one with a lanthorn seeking a man. Bacon.

This crime of canvassing, or soliciting for church preferment, is, by the canon law, called simony. Ayliffe's Parergon.

CA'NVASS-CLIMBER.* n. s. [from canvass and climb.] He who climbs the mast to furl or unfurl the sail or canvass.

A sea
That almost burst the deck, and from the ladder-tackle
Wash'd off a canvass-climber. Shaksp. Pericles.

CA'NVASSER.* n. s. [from canvass.] One who solicits favour or a vote.

As real publick counsellors, not as the canvassers at a perpetual election.
Burke on the Duration of Parliaments.

CA'NY. adj. [from cane.]

1. Full of canes.
2. Consisting of canes.

But in his way lights on the barren plains
Of Sericana, where Chineses drive,
With sails and wind, their cany waggons light.
Milton, P. L.

CA'NZONET. n. s. [canzonetta, Ital.] A little song.

Vecchi was most pleasing of all others, for his conceit and variety, as well his madrigals as canzonets. Peacham.

CAP.† n. s. [cap, Welsh; cæppe, Sax. cappe, Germ. cappe, Fr. cappa, Ital. capa, Span. kappe, Dan. and Dutch; caput, the head, Latin.]

1. The garment that covers the head.

Here is the cap your worship did bespeak. —
Why, this was moulded on a porringer,
A velvet dish. Shaksp. Taming the Shrew.

I have ever held my cap off to thy fortune. —
— Thou hast serv'd me with much faith. Shaksp.

First, lolling, sloth in woollen cap,
Taking her after-dinner nap. Swift.

The cap, the whip, the masculine attire,
For which they roughen to the sense.
Thomson, Autumn.

2. The ensign of the cardinalate.

Henry the Fifth did sometimes prophecy,
If once he came to be a cardinal,
He'd make his cap coequal with the crown.
Shakspeare, Hen. VI.

3. The topmost; the highest.

Thou art the cap of all the fools alive.
Shakspeare, Timon.

4. A reverence made by uncovering the head.

They more and less, came in with cap and knee,
Met him in boroughs, cities, villages.
Shakspeare, Hen. IV.

Should the want of a cap or a cringe so mortally discompose him, as we find afterwards it did.
L'Estrange.

5. A vessel made like a cap.

It is observed, that a barrel or cap, whose cavity will contain eight cubical feet of air, will not serve a diver above a quarter of an hour. Wilkins.

6. Cap of a great gun. A piece of lead laid over the touch-hole, to preserve the prime.

7. Cap of maintenance. One of the regalia carried before the king at the coronation.

8. To set a man's cap. This was a phrase of elder times, meaning to make a fool of a man.

This manciple sette their aller cappe.
Chaucer, Prol. Cant. Tales.

9. To set her cap at him. This is a phrase of modern times, signifying that a woman considers herself worthy the notice of a particular person.

To CAP.† v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To cover on the top.

The bones next the joint are capped with a smooth cartilaginous substance, serving both to strength and motion. Derham.

2. To deprive of the cap.

If one, by another occasion, take any thing from another, as boys sometimes use to cap one another, the same is straight felony.
Spenser on Ireland.

3. To cap verses. To name alternately verses beginning with a particular letter; to name in opposition or emulation; to name alternately in contest. To cap, is, in the Cumberland dialect, to surpass, to overcome in argument. Capping verses, is used by Dryden, though Dr. Johnson has not noticed it.

Now I have him under girdle, I'll cap verses with him to the end of the chapter.
Dryden, Amphytrion.

Where Henderson, and th' other masses,
Were sent to cap texts, and put cases. Hudibras.

Sure it is a pitiful pretence to ingenuity, that can be thus kept up, there being little need of any other faculty but memory, to be able to cap texts. Government of the Tongue.

There is an author of ours, whom I would desire him to read, before he ventures at capping characters. Atterbury.

4. To excel; to surpass: a common expression in Cumberland, and other parts of the north.

To CAP.* v. n. To uncover the head, by way of salutation or respect; a word still retained in our universities.

Three great ones of the city,
In personal suit to make me his lieutenant,
Oft capp'd to him. Shaksp. Othello.

Still capping, cringing, applauding: — waiting at men's doors with all affability.
Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 112.

CAP à pè. } [cap à piè, Fr.] From head
CAP à piè. } to foot; all over.

A figure like your father,
Arm'd at all points exactly, cap à piè,
Appears before them, and, with solemn march,
Goes slow and stately by them. Shaks. Hamlet.

There for the two contending knights he sent,
Arm'd cap à piè, with rev'rence low they bent.
Dryden, Fab.

A woodlouse,
That folds up itself in itself for a house,

As round as a ball, without head, without tail,
Inclos'd cap à pè in a strong coat of mail. Swift.

CAP-PAPER. A sort of coarse brownish paper. So called from being formed into a kind of cap to hold commodities.

Having, for trial sake, filtred it through cap-paper, there remained in the filtre a powder. Boyle.

CAPABI'LITY.† n. s. [from capable.] Capacity; the quality of being capable.

Sure he that made us with such large discourse,
Looking before, and after, gave us not
That capability and godlike reason
To rust in us unus'd. Shakspeare.

There being a possibility of creating things after sundry and manifold manners, nothing was yet determined, but this vast capability of things was unsettled, fluid, and of itself undeterminable as water. But the Spirit of God, who was the vehicle of the Eternal Wisdom, — having hovered awhile over all the capacities of this fluid possibility, — forthwith settled upon what was most perfect and exact. More, Conject. Cabbalist, p. 23.

CA'PABLE. adj. [capable, Fr.]

1. Sufficient to contain; sufficiently capacious.

When we consider so much of that space, as is equal to, or capable to receive a body of any assigned dimensions. Locke.

2. Endued with powers equal to any particular thing.

To say, that the more capable, or the better deserver, hath such right to govern, as he may compulsorily bring under the less worthy, is idle. Bacon.

When you hear any person give his judgment, consider with yourself whether he be a capable judge. Watts.

3. Intelligent; able to understand.

Look you, how pale he glares;
His form and cause conjoined, preaching to stones,
Would make them capable. Shaksp. Hamlet.

4. Intellectually capacious; able to receive.

I am much bound to God, that he hath endued you with one capable of the best instructions. Digby.

Susceptible.

The soul, immortal substance, to remain,
Conscious of joy, and capable of pain. Prior.

6. Qualified for; without any natural impediment.

There is no man that believes the goodness of God, but must be inclined to think, that he hath made some things for as long a duration as they are capable of. Tillotson.

7. Qualified for; without legal impediment.

Of my land,
Loyal and natural boy! I'll work the means
To make thee capable. Shaksp. K. Lear.

8. It has the particle of before a noun.

What secret springs their eager passions move,
How capable of death for injur'd love! Dryden, Virgil.

9. Hollow. This sense is not now in use.

Lean but upon a rush,
The cicatrice, and capable impressure,
Thy palm some moments keeps. Shakspeare, As you Like it.

CA'PABLENESS.† n. s. [from capable.] The quality or state of being capable; knowledge; understanding; power of mind.

The efficacy of these does not depend upon the mere opus operatum: but upon the capableness of the subject, and the qualifications of the person they are applied to. Killingbeck's Serm. p. 322.

To CAPA'CIFY.* v. a. [Lat. capax and facio.] To qualify; to make one capable.

Wisdom capacifies us to enjoy pleasantly and innocently all those good things the divine goodness hath provided for and consigned to us. Barrow, Serm. i. 5.

CAPA'CIOUS.† adj. [capax, Lat.] It may be observed, that Johnson's examples go no higher than to Thomson and Watts. In 1655 it was considered as a strange word. See Bagwell's Myst. of Astronomy of that date; words at the end, "not familiarly used."]

1. Wide; large; able to hold much.

Beneath th' incessant weeping of those drains,
I see the rocky Siphons stretch'd immense,
The mighty reservoirs of harden'd chalk,
Or stiff compacted clay, capacious found. Thomson, Autumn.

2. Extensive; equal to much knowledge, or great design.

There are some persons of a good genius, and a capacious mind, who write and speak very obscurely. Watts.

CAPA'CIOUSLY.* adv. [from capacious.] In a wide or capacious manner.

CAPA'CIOUSNESS. n. s. [from capacious.] The power of holding or receiving; largeness.

A concave measure, of known and denominate capacity, serves to measure the capaciousness of any other vessel. In like manner, to a given weight, the weight of all other bodies may be reduced, and so found out. Holder on Time.

CAPACITA'TION.* n. s. [from the verb.] Capability.

To CAPA'CITATE. v. a. [from capacity.] To make capable; to enable; to qualify.

By this instruction we may be capacitated to observe those errours. Dryden.

These sort of men were sycophants only, and were endued with arts of life, to capacitate them for the conversation of the rich and great. Tatler, No. 56.

CAPA'CITY. n. s. [capacité, Fr.]

1. The power of holding or containing any thing.

Had our palace the capacity
To camp this host, we would all sup together. Shakspeare.

Notwithstanding thy capacity
Receiveth as the sea, nought enters there,
Of what validity and pitch soe'er,
But falls into abatement and low price. Shakspeare, Tw. Night.

For they that most and greatest things embrace,
Enlarge thereby their mind's capacity,
As streams enlarg'd, enlarge the channel's space. Davies.

Space, considered in length, breadth, and thickness, I think, may be called capacity. Locke.

2. Room; space.

There remained, in the capacity of the exhausted cylinder, store of little rooms, or spaces, empty or devoid of air. Boyle.

3. The force or power of the mind.

No intellectual creature is able, by capacity, to do that which nature doth without capacity and knowledge. Hooker, i. § 3.

In spiritual natures, so much as there is of desire, so much there is also of capacity to receive. I do not say, there is always a capacity to receive the very thing they desire; for that may be impossible. South.

An heroick poem requires the accomplishment of some extraordinary undertaking; which requires the duty of a soldier, and the capacity and prudence of a general. Dryden, Juv. Dedication.

4. Power; ability.

Since the world's wide frame does not include
A cause with such capacities endu'd,
Some other cause o'er nature must preside. Blackmore.

5. State; condition; character.

A miraculous revolution, reducing many from the head of a triumphant rebellion, to their old condition of masons, smiths, and carpenters; that, in this capacity, they might repair what, as colonels and captains, they had ruined and defaced. South.

You desire my thoughts as a friend, and not as a member of parliament; they are the same in both capacities. Swift.

CAPA'RISON. n. s. [caparazon, a great cloke, Span.] A horsecloth, or a sort of cover for a horse, which is spread over his furniture. Farrier's Dict.

Tilting furniture, emblazon'd shields,
Impresses quaint, caparisons, and steeds,
Bases and tinsel trappings, gorgeous knights,
At joust and tournament. Milton, P. L.

Some wore a breastplate, and a light juppon;
Their horses cloath'd with rich caparison. Dryden, Fab.

To CAPA'RISON.† v. a. [old Fr. caparasonner.]

1. To dress in caparisons.

The steeds caparison'd with purple, stand;
With golden trappings, glorious to behold,
And champ betwixt their teeth the foaming gold. Dryden.

2. To dress pompously: in a ludicrous sense.

Don't you think, though I am caparisoned like a man, I have a doublet and hose in my disposition. Shakspeare, As you Like it.

CA'PCASE.* n. s. [from cap and case.] A covered case; a chest.

He asked his wife whether she shut the trunks and chests fast, whether the capcase be sealed, and whether the hall door be bolted. Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 116.

One cart will serve for all your furniture,
With room enough behind to ease the footman,
A capcase for your linnen, and your plate. Beaum. and Fl. Noble Gentleman.

CAPE.† n. s. [cape, Fr. capo, Ital. from the Lat. caput.]

1. Headland; promontory.

What from the cape can you discern at sea? — — Nothing at all; it is a high wrought flood. Shakspeare, Othello.

The parting sun,
Beyond the earth's green cape, and verdant isles,
Hesperian sets; my signal to depart. Milton, P. L.

The Romans made war upon the Tarentines, and obliged them by treaty not to sail beyond the cape. Arbuthnot on Coins.

2. The neck-piece of a cloke. [Fr. cappe, Dan. kappe, a cloke or riding-coat.]

He was clothed in a robe of fine black cloth, with wide sleeves and cape. Bacon.

CA'PER. n. s. [from caper, Latin, a goat.] A leap; a jump; a skip.

We that are true lovers, run into strange capers; but as all is mortal in nature, so is all nature in love mortal in folly. Shaksp. As you Like it.

Flimnap, the treasurer, is allowed to cut a caper on the strait rope, at least an inch higher than any other lord in the whole empire. Swift, Gulliver's Travels.

CA'PER.† n. s. [Fr. câpre; Gr. κάππαρις, the tree and the fruit.] An acid pickle. See CAPERBUSH.

We invent new sauces and pickles, which resemble the animal ferment in taste and virtue, as mangoes, olives, and capers. Floyer on the Humours.

CA'PER-BUSH. n. s.
The fruit is fleshy, and shaped like a pear. This plant grows in the south of France, in Spain and in Italy, upon old walls and buildings; and the buds of the flowers, before they are open, are pickled for eating. Miller.

CA'PER-CUTTING.* n. s. [from caper and cut. To cut a caper is a common phrase. See the citation from Swift under CAPER. The Italians have a similar expression, tagliar le capriole.] The act of dancing in a frolicksome manner.
I am not gentle, sir, nor gentle will be,
Till I have justice, my poor child restor'd,
Your caper-cutting son has run away with.
Beaum. and Fl. Love's Pilgrimage.

To CA'PER. v. n. [from the noun.]
1. To dance frolicksomely.
The truth is, I am only old in judgment; and he that will caper with me for a thousand marks, let him lend me the money, and have at him.
Shakspeare, Hen. IV.
2. To skip for merriment.
Our master
Capering to eye her. Shaksp. Tempest.
His nimble hand's instinct then taught each string
A capering cheerfulness, and made them sing
To their own dance. Crashaw's Poems, p. 82.
The family tript it about, and caper'd like hail-stones bounding from a marble floor.
Arbuthnot, John Bull.
3. To dance; spoken in contempt.
The stage would need no force, nor song, nor dance,
Nor capering monsieur from active France.
Rowe.

CA'PERER. n. s. [from caper.] A dancer: in contempt.
The tumbler's gambols some delight afford:
No less the nimble caperer on the cord:
But these are still insipid stuff to thee,
Coop'd in a ship, and toss'd upon the sea.
Dryden, Juv.

CA'PIAS. n. s. [Lat.] A writ of two sorts, one before judgement, called capias ad respondendum, in an action personal, if the sheriff, upon the first writ of distress, return that he has no effects in his jurisdiction. The other is a writ of execution after judgement.

Bp. Berkeley, Siris, § 224.

CA'PILLARY.† adj. [old Fr. capillaire, from capillus, hair, Lat.]
1. Resembling hairs; small; minute: applied to plants.
Capillary or capillaceous plants, are such as have no main stalk or stem, but grow to the ground, as hairs on the head; and which bear their seeds in little tufs or protuberances on the backside of their leaves. Quincy.
2. Applied to vessels of the body. Small: as the ramifications of the arteries.
Ten capillary arteries in some parts of the body, as in the brain, are not equal to one hair; and the smallest lymphatick vessels are an hundred times smaller than the smallest capillary artery.
Arbuthnot on Aliments.

CA'PILLARY.* n. s. [from the adj.] A small plant; or a small vessel.
The hyssop — may tolerably be taken for some kind of minor capillary, which best makes out the antithesis with the cedar.
Sir T. Brown on the Plants in Scripture, p. 8.
Our common hyssop is not the least of vegetables, nor observed to grow upon walls: but, rather, some kind of capillaries which are very small plants, and only grow upon walls and stony places. Ibid. Vulg. Err.
What remains, is received into the capillaries of the veins in the several parts.
Smith's Old Age, p. 233.
Tar-water, by its active qualities, doth stir the humours, entering the minutest capillaries, and dislodging obstructions.
Bp. Berkeley on Tar-Water.

CAPILLA'TION. n. s. [from capillus, Lat.] A vessel like a hair; a small ramification of vessels. Not used.
Nor is the humour contained in smaller veins, or obscurer capillations, but in a vesicle.

The piteous maiden careful, comfortless,
Does throw out thrilling shrieks and shrieking cries. Spenser, F. Q.

Martha, thou art careful and troubled about many things. Luke, x. 41.

Be careful for nothing; but in every thing by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving let your requests be made known to God. Phil. iv. 6.

Welcome, thou pleasing slumber;
A while embrace me in thy leaden arms,
And charm my careful thoughts. Denham, Sophy.

2. Provident; diligent: sometimes with of or for.

Behold thou hast been careful for us with all this care; what is to be done for thee? 2 Kings, iv. 13.

Hence get thee to bed, have careful looking to,
And eat warm things, and trouble not me. Beaum. and Fl. Maid's Tragedy.

To cure their mad ambition, they were sent
To rule a distant province, each alone:
What could a careful father more have done? Dryden.

3. Watchful; cautious: with of.

It concerns us to be careful of our conversations. Ray.

4. Subject to perturbations; exposed to troubles; full of anxiety; full of solicitude.

By him that rais'd me to this careful height,
From that contented hap, which I enjoy'd. Shakspeare.

CA'REFULLY.† adj. [Sax. carfullice.]

1. In a manner that shews care.

Envy, how carefully does it look? how meagre and ill-complexioned? Collier.

2. Heedfully; watchfully; vigilantly; attentively.

You come most carefully upon your hour. Shakspeare.

By considering him so carefully as I did before my attempt, I have made some faint resemblance of him. Dryden.

All of them, therefore, studiously cherished the memory of their honourable extraction, and carefully preserved the evidences of it. Atterbury.

3. Providently.

4. Cautiously.

CA'REFULNESS.† n. s. [Sax. carfulneſſe.] Vigilance; heedfulness; caution.

The death of Selymus was, with all carefulness, concealed by Ferhates. Knolles, Hist. of the Turks.

By seeming cold or careless of his will. Shaks.

A woman the more curious she is about her face, is commonly the more careless about her house. B. Jonson.

A father, unnaturally careless of his child, sells or gives him to another man. Locke.

2. Cheerful; undisturbed.

Thus wisely careless, innocently gay,
Cheerful he play'd. Pope.

In my cheerful morn of life,
When nurs'd by careless solitude I liv'd,
And sung of nature with unceasing joy,
Pleas'd have I wander'd through your rough domain. Thomson.

3. Unheeded; thoughtless; unconsidered.

The freedom of saying as many careless things as other people, without being so severely remarked upon. Pope.

4. Unmoved by; unconcerned at.

'Tis no matter, Sweet, let her say what she will, thou art not worse to me, and therefore not at all; be careless. Beaum. and Fl. Scornful Lady.

Careless of thunder from the clouds that break,
My only omens from your looks I take. Granville.

5. Contrived without care or art; having an appearance of negligence.

How earnest were some preachers against careless ruffs, yea, and against set ruffs too? Bp. Taylor, Artif. Hands. p. 119.

CA'RELESSLY.† adv. [from careless.] Negligently; inattentively; without care; heedlessly.

There he him found all carelessly display'd,
In secret shadow from the sunny ray. Spenser, F. Q.

Not content to see,
That others write as carelessly as he. Waller.

Hear now this, thou that art given to pleasures, that dwellest carelessly. Isaiah, xlvii. 8.

This is the rejoicing city, that dwelt carelessly. Zeph. ii. 15.

Many young gentlemen flock to him every day; and fleet the time carelessly, as they did in the golden world. Shakspeare, As you like it.

The body was carelessly, and without solemnity, interred in some retired and unfrequented place. Ricaut, Greek Church, p. 279.

CA'RELESSNESS.† n. s. [Sax. carleaſneſ.] Heedlessness; inattention; negligence; absence of care; manner void of care.

For Coriolanus, neither to care whether they love or hate him, manifests the true knowledge he has in their disposition, and, out of his noble carelessness, lets them plainly see it. Shakspeare, Coriolanus.

Who, in the other extreme, only doth
Call a rough carelessness good fashion;
Whose cloak his spurs tear, or whom he spits on,
He cares not. Donne.

It makes us to walk warily, and tread sure, for fear of our enemies; and that is better, than to be flattered into pride and carelessness. Bp. Taylor, Rule of living holy.

The ignorance or carelessness of the servants can hardly leave the master disappointed. Temple.

I who at sometimes spend, at others spare,
Divided between carelessness and care. Pope.

CA'RENCY.* n. s. [carence, old Fr. carens, Lat.] Want; lack.

This sense of dereliction and carency of Divine favour for the time, it was the Father's pleasure to have it so. Bp. Richardson on the Old Test. 1655, p. 185.

CA'RENTANE.* n. s. [Fr. quarantaine, from the Lat. quadragena or quarentena, Lent, or the term of forty days. See QUARANTAIN.] A papal indulgence, multiplying the remission of penance by forties.

In the church of St. Vitus and Modestus, there are, for every day in the year, seven thousand years, and seven thousand carentanes of pardon. Bp. Taylor, Dissuasive against Popery.

To CARE'SS.† v. a. [Fr. caresser, from carus, Lat. Dr. Johnson says. Rather from the Gr. καρίζειν for καταρίζειν, supposed by Morin to have been one of the words imported from Ionia to Marseilles. Ital. carezzare and careggiare. The word caress is evidently of no great age in our language. Heylin mentions it, in 1656, as uncouth and unusual.] To endear: to fondle; to treat with kindness.

If I can feast, and please, and caress my mind with the pleasures of worthy speculations, or virtuous practices, let greatness and malice vex and abridge me, if they can. South.

CARE'SS. n. s. [from the verb.] An act of endearment; an expression of tenderness.

He, she knew, would intermix
Grateful digressions, and solve high dispute
With conjugal caresses. Milton, P. L.

There are some men who seem to have brutal minds wrapt up in human shapes; their very caresses are crude and importune. L'Estrange.

After his successor had publickly owned himself a Roman catholick, he began with his first caresses to the church party. Swift.

CA'RET. n. s. [caret, Lat. there is wanting.] A note which shews where something interlined should be read.

CA'RGASON.† n. s. [cargaçon, Spanish.] A cargo. Not used, Dr. Johnson says; and he gives only the first of the examples from Howell. By Howell it is often used, but I have not found it elsewhere.

My body is a cargason of ill humours. Howell's Letters.

The ship Swan was sailing home with a cargazon valued at 80,000l. Howell's Letters, i. vi. 42.

These travellers, in lieu of the ore of Ophir wherewith they should come home richly freighted, may be said to make their return in apes and owls, in a cargazon of complements and cringes, or some huge monstrous periwigs, which is the golden fleece they bring over with them. Howell, Instruct. for For. Travel, p. 188.

CA'RGO.† n. s. [charge, Fr. Dr. Johnson says. But the old Fr. cargue must here be cited. Nor should the Ital. carico or carco, a burthen, be overlooked.] The lading of a ship; the merchandize or wares contained and conveyed in a ship.

In the hurry of the shipwreck, Simonides was the only man that appeared unconcerned, notwithstanding that his whole fortune was at stake in the cargo. L'Estrange.

A ship, whose cargo was no less than a whole world, that carried the fortune and hopes of all posterity. Burnet, Theory.

This gentleman was then a young adventurer in the republick of letters, and just fitted out for the university with a good cargo of Latin and Greek. Addison.

CARICATU'RE.* n. s. [Ital. caricatura, from caricare, to load or charge, that is, to exaggerate. The word was written caricatura, in our own language, till within the last half century.] The representation of a person or circumstance, so as to render the original ridiculous, without losing the resemblance.

Expose not thyself, by four-footed manners, unto monstrous draughts and caricatura representations. Brown, Christ. Mor. ii. 14.

From all these hands we have such draughts of mankind as are represented in those burlesque pictures which the Italians call caricaturas; where the art consists in preserving, amidst distorted proportions and aggravated features, some distinguishing likeness of the person, but in such a manner as to transform the most agreeable beauty into the most odious monster. Spectator, No. 537.

Let not this strained affectation of striving to be witty upon all occasions, be thought exaggerated, or a caricatura of Cowley.

Dr. Warton, Essay on Pope.

A portrait is sufficient; a caricature needless. Bp. Horne, Lett. on Infidelity, Pref.

A new exhibition in English of the French caricature [Amyot's] of this most valuable biographer [Plutarch] by North, must have still more widely extended the deviation from the original. Warton, Hist. of Eng. Poet. iii. Diss. p. xx.

To CARICATU'RE.* v. a. [from the noun.] To ridicule; to represent unfairly.

He could draw an ill face, or caricature a good one, with a masterly hand. Lord Lyttelton.

The numerous imitators, who are certain to follow every extraordinary effort of genius, may be induced to caricature its errours. Pye.

CARICATU'RIST.* n. s. [from caricature.] One who caricatures other persons or things.

That circumstance would afford sufficient ground to a professed caricaturist for denying him that fertility which unquestionably he possessed; ridicule, not truth, being the object of all painters and writers of that description. Malone, Life of Dryden, p. 492.

CA'RICOUS Tumour. [from carica, a fig, Lat.] A swelling in the form of a fig.

CA'RIES. n. s. [Latin.] That rottenness which is peculiar to a bone. Quincy.

CA'RINATED *Leaf. In botany, a leaf, of which the back resembles the keel of a ship. [Lat. carina, the keel.] Chambers.

CARIO'SITY. n. s. [from carious.] Rottenness.

This is too general, taking in all cariosity and ulcers of the bones. Wiseman's Surgery.

CA'RIOUS. adj. [cariosus, Lat.] Rotten.

I discovered the blood to arise by a carious tooth. Wiseman.

CARK. n. s. [cape, Saxon.] Care; anxiety; solicitude; concern; heedfulness. This word is now obsolete.

And Klaius taking for his youngling cark,
Lest greedy eyes to them might challenge lay,
Busy with oker did their shoulders mark. Sidney.

He down did lay
His heavy head, devoid of careful cark.
Spenser, F. Q.

To CARK.† v. n. [ceapcian, Saxon.] To be careful; to be solicitous; to be anxious. It is now very little used, and always in an ill sense.

I do find what a blessing is chanced to my life, from such muddy abundance of carking agonies, to states which still be adherent. Sidney.

Hark my husband, he's singing and hoiting;
And I'm fain to cark and care, and all little enough.
Beaum. and Fl. Knight of the Burning Pestle.

What can be vainer, than to lavish out our lives in the search of trifles, and to lie carking for the unprofitable goods of this world? L'Estrange.

CA'RKING.* n. s. [from cark.] Care; anxiety.

Nothing can supersede our own carkings and contrivances for ourselves, but the assurance that God cares for us. Decay of Piety.

CARLE.† n. s. [Iceland. karl, a rustick, or man of mean condition; Goth. karl, "karl oc konung, plebs et princeps," Ihre. Germ. karl; Welsh carl, a clown or a miser; Sax. capl. a miser, a rustick, a male; whence, in our language, carl-cat, a he-cat; also ceopl, whence the synonyme churl.] A mean, rude, rough, brutal man. We now use churl.

The carle beheld, and saw his guest
Would safe depart, for all his subtile sleight.
Spenser, F. Q.

Answer, thou carle, and judge this riddle right,
I'll frankly own thee for a cunning wight.
Gay's Pastorals.

The editor was a covetous carle, and would have his pearls of the highest price. Bentley.

That the old carlot once was master of.
Shakspeare, As you like it.

CA'RMAN. n. s. [from car and man.] A man whose employment it is to drive cars.

If the strong cane support thy walking hand,
Chairmen no longer shall the wall command;
E'n sturdy carmen shall thy nod obey,
And rattling coaches stop to make thee way.
Gay's Trivia.

CA'RMELITE. n. s. [carmelite, Fr.] A sort of pear.

CARMI'NATIVE.† n. s. [supposed to be so called, as having vim carminis, the power of a charm.]

Carminatives are such things as dilute and relax at the same time, because wind occasions a spasm, or convulsion in some parts. Whatever promotes insensible perspiration, is carminative: for wind is perspirable matter retained in the body. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

CARMI'NATIVE.† adj. [old Fr. carminatif.] See the example to the substantive.

Carminative and diuretick
Will damp all passion sympathetick. Swift.

CA'RMINE. n. s. A bright red or crimson colour, bordering on purple, used by painters in miniature. It is the most valuable product of the cochineal mastick, and of an excessive price. Chambers.

CA'RNAGE. n. s. [carnage, Fr. from caro, carnis, Lat.]

1. Slaughter; havock; massacre.

He brought the king's forces upon them rather as to carnage than to fight, insomuch as without any great loss or danger to themselves, the greatest part of the seditious were slain. Hayward.

2. Heaps of flesh.

Such a scent I draw
Of carnage, prey innumerable! and taste
The savour of death from all things there that live.
Milton, P. L.

His ample maw, with human carnage fill'd,
A milky deluge next the giant swill'd. Pope.

CA'RNAL. adj. [carnal, Fr. carnalis, low Lat.

1. Fleshly; not spiritual.

Thou dost justly require us, to submit our understandings to thine, and deny our carnal reason, in order to thy sacred mysteries and commands. King Charles.

From that pretence
Spiritual laws by carnal power shall force
On every conscience. Milton, P.L.

Not such in carnal pleasure; for which cause,
Among the beasts no mate for thee was found.
Milton, P.L.

A glorious apparition! had not doubt,
And carnal fear, that day dimm'd Adam's eye.
Milton, P.L.

He perceives plainly, that his appetite to spiritual things abates, in proportion as his sensual appetite is indulged and encouraged; and that carnal desires kill not only the desire, but even the power of tasting purer delights. Atterbury.

2. Lustful; lecherous; libidinous.

This carnal cur
Preys on the issue of his mother's body. Shaksp.

CA'RNAL-MINDED.* adj. [from carnal and mind.] Thinking only of the flesh; worldly-minded.

Abusing the credulous and carnal-minded, thereby to be masters of their persons and wealth. More, Antid. against Idolatry, ch. 10.

He [Jesus Christ] stript off those veils and colours, which the worldly and carnal-minded Scribes and Pharisees had laid over them [the Scriptures.] West on the Resurrection, p. 191.

CA'RNAL-MINDEDNESS.* n. s. [from carnal-minded.] Grossness of mind.

They made their own virtue their god, which was the most cursed piece of carnal-mindedness and idolatry. Ellis, Knowledge of Divine Things, p. 282.

CA'RNALIST.* n. s. [from carnal.] One given to carnality.

They are in a reprobate sense mere carnalists, fleshly-minded men. Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 686.

CA'RNALITE.* n. s. [from carnal.] A worldly-minded man.

God is on our side, and therefore we feare not what the pope or any other carnalite can do against us. Anderson, Expos. upon Benedictus, (1573,) fol. 7. b.

CARNA'LITY.† n. s. [old Fr. charnalité.]

1. Fleshly lust; compliance with carnal desires.

An inciter of lust, and the wakener of carnality. Feltham's Resolves, ii. 36.

Mortifications were more in use, and all luxurious indulgence to carnality generally condemned. Ricaut, Greek Church, p. 307.

If godly, why do they wallow and sleep in all the carnalities of the world, under pretence of christian liberty? South.

2. Grossness of mind.

So was Jerobcam's episcopacy partly from the pattern of the law, and partly from the pattern of his own carnality. Milton, Reason of Ch. Gov. i. 5.

He did not institute this way of worship, but because of the carnality of their hearts, and the proneness of that people to idolatry. Tillotson.

To CA'RNALIZE.* v. a. [from carnal.] To debase to carnality.

What concord can there be between a sensual and carnalized spirit, that understands no other pleasures but only those of the flesh, and those pure and virgin-spirits, that neither eat nor drink, but live for ever upon wisdom and holiness, and love and contemplation. Scott's Christian Life, i. § 2.

CA'RNALLY.† adv. [from carnal.]

1. According to the flesh; not spiritually.

Where they found men in diet, attire, furniture of house, or any other way observers of civility and decent order, such they reproved, as being carnally and earthly minded. Hooker.

In the sacrament we do not receive Christ carnally, but we receive him spiritually; and that of itself is a conjugation of blessings and spiritual graces. Bp. Taylor's Worthy Communicant.

So the sense requires; it being spoken carnally, or like a man, to charge God with injustice. Tr. of Knatchbull's Annot. p. 157.

2. Libidinously; lustfully.

Thou shalt not lie carnally with thy neighbour's wife, to defile thyself with her. Levit. xviii. 20.

CA'RNALNESS. n. s. The same with carnality. Dict.

CARNA'TION. n. s. [carnes, Lat.] The name of the natural flesh colour; from whence perhaps the flower is named; the name of a flower.

And lo the wretch! whose vile, whose insect lust
Laid this gay daughter of the spring in dust:
O punish him! or to th' Elysian shades
Dismiss my soul, where no carnation fades. Pope.

CARNA'TIONED.* adj. [from carnation.] Coloured like the carnation.

Court gentle zephyr, court and fan
Her softer breasts carnation'd wan.
Lovelace, Luc. P. p. 12.

CARNE'LION. n. s. A precious stone.

The common carnelion has its name from its flesh colour, [carne;] which is, in some of these stones, paler, when it is called the female carnelion; in others deeper, called the male. Woodward.

CA'RNEOUS. adj. [carneus, Lat.] Fleshy.

In a calf, the umbilical vessels terminate in certain bodies, divided into a multitude of carneous papillæ. Ray.

CA'RNEY.* A disease in horses, wherein their mouths become so furred that they cannot eat. Chambers.

CARNIFICA'TION.* n. s. [from carnify.] The making of, or turning to, flesh. In medicine, the reverse of ossification. Chambers.

To CA'RNIFY. v. n. [from caro, carnis, Lat.] To breed flesh; to turn nutriment into flesh.

At the same time I think, I deliberate, I purpose, I command; in inferiour faculties, I walk, I see, I hear, I digest, I sanguify, I carnify. Hale, Origin of Mankind.

CA'RNIVAL.† n. s. [Ital. carnavale, Fr. carnaval. Our old writers seem to have considered it as "the bidding farewel to flesh," carni vale. See Bullokar's Expositor. But Ducange explains the word by carn-a-val, the flesh being put into the pot at this feast, in order to compensate for the abstinence ensuing; and therefore, in the low Latin, the word was carnelevamen; yet the former seems to be right. The carnival formerly began upon Ashwednesday." Carnisprivium sic in Matt. Paris, in sua historia vocatur Quinquagesima Dominica; nam in istac die relinquebatur carnis comestio, &c." Hierolexic. auct. D. Melitensi et Carolo ejus fratre. V. QUINQUAGESIMA. Thus Carnisprivium is translated in some of our Lat. and Eng. dictionaries, "Lent, the Carnival, or Shrovetide."] The feast held in the popish countries before Lent; a time of luxury.

The whole year is but one mad carnival, and we are voluptuous not so much upon desire or appetite, as by way of exploit and bravery. Decay of Piety.

CARNI'VOROUS. adj. [from carnis and voro.] Flesheating; that of which flesh is the proper food.

In birds there is no mastication or comminution of the meat in the mouth; but in such as are not carnivorous, it is immediately swallowed into the crop or craw. Ray on the Creation.

Man is by his frame, as well as his appetite, a carnivorous animal. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

CARNO'SITY.† n. s. [carnosité, Fr.] Fleshy excrescence.

What's good for a carnosity in the bladder? Beaum. and Fl. The Chances.

By this method, and by this course of diet, with sudorificks, the ulcers are healed, and that carnosity resolved. Wiseman.

CA'RNOUS. adj. [old Fr. charneux, from caro, carnis, Lat.] Fleshy.

The first or outward part is a thick and carnous covering, like that of a walnut: the second, a dry and flosculous coat, commonly called mace. Brown, Vulg. Err.

The muscle whereby he is enabled to draw himself together, the academists describe to be a distinct carnous muscle, extended to the ear. Ray on the Creation.

CA'ROB, or St. John's Bread. [soliqua, Lat.]

A tree very common in Spain, and in some parts of Italy, where it produces a great quantity of long, flat, brown-coloured pods, which are thick, mealy, and of a sweetish taste. These pods are eaten by the poorer inhabitants. Miller.

CARO'CHE.† n. s. [Ital. carrozza, said to be from carro rozzo, a red carriage; whence, as chariots were first used in Italy, the Fr. carosse; and thence our old word caroche; which, Dr. Johnson says, is used in the comedy of Albumazar, and is obsolete. It is a very frequent word in our old writers. Probably the unauthorized modern word barouche may have been introduced by some learned charioteer, with a retrospective view to caroche.] A coach; a carriage of pleasure.

Like any lady, countess, dutchess, or queen, they shall have gowns, tires, jewels, coaches, and caroches. Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 500.

Make ready my caroch. Beaum. and Fl. Custom of the Country.

A caroch with six horses. Transl. of Boccalini, (1621,) p. 79.

CA'ROCHED.* part. adj. [from caroche.] Placed in a coach.

This man's taking up a common wench
In raggs and lowsie, then maintaining her
Caroach'd in cloth of tissue. Beaum. and Fl. Little Fr. Lawyer.

CARO'L.† n. s. [carola, Ital. from choreola, Lat. Dr. Johnson says: Mr. Brand deduces it from cantare, to sing, and rola, an interjection of joy. In old French, however, carole is a kind of dance. See Cotgrave in V. CAROLLE, Lacombe, and Roquefort. "Carolle, divertisement, accompagnée de danses et de bals." Rom. de R. Gl.]

1. A song of joy and exultation.

And let the Graces dance unto the rest,
For they can do it best:
The whiles the maidens do their carol sing,
To which the woods shall answer, and their echo ring. Spenser, Epithalamium.

Even in the old testament, if you listen to David's harp, you shall hear as many herse-like airs as carols. Bacon.

Oppos'd to her, on t'other side advance
The costly feast, the carol, and the dance,
Minstrels and musick, poetry and play,
And balls by night, and tournaments by day. Dryden.

2. A song of devotion.

No night is now with hymn or carol blest. Shakspeare.

They gladly thither haste; and, by a choir
Of squadron'd angels, hear his carol sung. Milton, Ode.

3. A song in general.

The carol they began that hour,
How that a life was but a flower. Shaksp.

To CA'ROL.† v. n. [carolare, Ital. caroler, old Fr. To sing; to warble; to sing in joy and festivity.

Hark, how the cheerful birds do chant their lays,
And carol of love's praise. Spenser.

This done, she sung, and caroll'd out so clear,
That men and angels might rejoice to hear. Dryden.

Hovering swans, their throats releas'd
From native silence, carol sounds harmonious. Prior.

To CA'ROL.† v. a. To praise; to celebrate in song.

She with precious vial'd liquours heals,
For which the shepherds at their festivals,
Carol her goodness loud in rustick lays. Milton, Com.

CA'ROLING.* n. s. [from carol.] An hymn, or song of devotion.

They see such admirable things,
As carries them into an extasy,
And hear such heavenly notes and carolings
Of God's high praise. Spenser, Hymn of Heav. Beauty.

CA'ROTID. adj. [carotides, Lat.] Two arteries, so called, which arise out of the ascending trunk of the aorta, near where the subclavian arteries arise.

The carotid, vertebral, and splenick arteries, are not only variously contorted, but also here and there dilated, to moderate the motion of the blood. Ray on the Creation.

CARO'TIDAL.* adj. The same as CAROTID.

The two carotidal, and the two vertebral arteries are this golden quaternion.

Smith's Old Age, p. 220.

CARO'USAL.† n. s. [from carouse. It seems more properly pronounced with the accent upon the second syllable; but Dryden accents it on the first, Dr. Johnson says. Dryden, however, was only observing the fashion of his own time; as the example from Marvel shews. Some imagine carousal to be derived from the Ital. carosello, a diminutive of carro, a chariot; and that the entertainment, originally, was a course or contest of chariots and horses; and that the word at length signified generally a magnificent feast.] A festival.

This game, these carousals Ascanius taught,
And building Alba to the Latins brought.
Dryden.

Before the crystal palace, where he dwells,
The armed angels hold their carousels.
A. Marvel, in Lachrymæ Musarum, 1650.

Leaving out the warlike part of the carousals, and forming a poetical design for the use of the machines, the songs and the dances.

Dryden, Pref. to Albion and Albanius.

A royal carousal given by Charles the Fifth of France to the emperour Charles the Fourth, in the year 1378, was closed with the theatrical representation of the Conquest of Jerusalem by Godfrey of Bulloign.

Warton, Hist. of Eng. Poetry, i. 245.

To CARO'USE.† v. n. [carousser, Fr. from gar ausz, all out, Germ. Dr. Johnson says. But the Germ. rausch, drunkenness, seems better entitled to the fame of producing carouse.] To drink; to quaff; to drink largely.

He calls for wine: a health, quoth he, as if
H'ad been aboard carousing to his mates
After a storm. Shakspeare.

Learn with how little life may be preserved,
In gold and myrrh they need not to carouse.
Ralegh.

Now hats fly off, and youths carouse,
Healths first go round, and then the house,
The brides came thick and thick. Suckling.

Under the shadow of friendly boughs
They sit carousing, where their liquour grows.
Waller.

To CARO'USE. v. a. To drink up lavishly.

Now my sick fool, Roderigo,
Whom love hath turn'd almost the wrong side out,
To Desdemona hath to-night carous'd
Potations pottle deep. Shakspeare.

Our cheerful guests carouse the sparkling tears
Of the rich grape, whilst musick charms their ears. Denham.

CARO'USE. n. s. [from the verb.]

1. A drinking match.

Waste in wild riot what your land allows,
There ply the early feast, and late carouse. Pope.

2. A hearty dose of liquour.

He had so many eyes watching over him, as he could not drink a full carouse of sack; but the state was advertised thereof within few hours after. Davies on Ireland.

Please you, we may contrive this afternoon,
And quaff carouses to our mistress' health. Shaksp.

CARO'USER. n. s. [from carouse.] A drinker; a toper.

The bold carouser, and advent'ring dame,
Nor fear the fever, nor refuse the flame;
Safe in his skill from all constraint set free,
But conscious shame, remorse, and piety.
Grenville.

CARP. n. s. [carpe, Fr.] A pond fish.

A friend of mine stored a pond of three or four acres with carps and tench.

Hale, Origin of Mankind.

To CARP.† v. n. [carpo, Lat.] To censure; to cavil; to find fault: with at before the thing or person censured. It was formerly used in the sense of to jest.

In felowship well could she laugh and carpe.
Chaucer, C. T. Prol. 470.

Tertullian, even often through discontentment, carpeth injuriously at them, as though they did it even when they were free from such meaning.
Hooker.

This your all licens'd fool
Does hourly carp and quarrel, breaking forth
In rank and not to be endured riots. Shakspeare.

No, not a tooth or nail to scratch,
And at my actions carp or catch. Herbert.

When I spoke,
My honest homely words were carp'd and censur'd,
For want of courtly stile. Dryden.

To CARP.* v. a. To blame.

Which my saying divers ignorant persons, not used to reade old auncient authors, nor acquainted with their phrase and maner of speeche, did carpe and reprehend, for lacke of good understandyng.

Abp. Cranmer, Doct. of the Sacrament, fol 100.

They carpe us like crakers.

Skelton's Poems, p. 213.

Herod heard John gladly, while he carped others. Abp. Sandy's Serm. fol. 120. b.

CA'RPENTER.† n. s. [charpentier, Fr. low Lat. carpenterius, in the thirteenth century. Mr. Horne Tooke observes, that what we now call a carpenter, was anciently called a smith; and that the translation of the N. Test. ascribed to Wicliffe, proves that smith and carpenter were then [in the fourteenth century] synonimous, viz. "Wher this is not a smith, ether a carpentere, the sone of Marie." St. Mark, vi. 2, 3. If this be the true reading, it is remarkable that it should not be noticed in a recent publication of Wicliffe's Testament, by the learned and reverend Mr. Baber, where the passage is simply thus; without smith, and without any note, or various reading; "Wher this is not a carpenter the sone of Marye." The parallel passage in St. Matthew, xiii. 55. has also only carpenter.] An artificer in wood; a builder of houses and ships. He is distinguished from a joiner, as the carpenter performs larger and stronger work.

This work performed with advisement good,
Godfrey his carpenters, and men of skill,
In all the camp, sent to an aged wood. Fairfax.

In building Hero's great ship, there were three hundred carpenters employed for a year together.
Wilkins.

In burden'd vessels, first with speedy care,
His plenteous stores do season'd timbers send,
Thither the brawny carpenters repair,
And, as the surgeons of maim'd ships, attend.
Dryden.

CA'RPENTRY. n. s. [from carpenter.] The trade or art of a carpenter.

It had been more proper for me to have introduced carpentry before joinery, because necessity did doubtless compel our forefathers to use the convenience of the first, rather than the extravagancy of the last. Moxon's Mechanical Exercises.

CA'RPER.† n. s. [from To CARP.] A caviller; a censorious man.

I have not these weeds,
By putting on the cunning of a carper. Shaksp.

That audacious carper at the works of God was sufficiently silenced. Smith's Old Age, p. 58.

CA'RPET.† n. s. [karpet, Dutch, Ital. carpetta; from the city of Cairo, and the Ital. tapeto, i. e. tapestry made at Cairo.]

1. A covering of various colours, spread upon floors or tables.

Be the Jacks fair within, the Jills fair without,
carpets laid, and every thing in order? Shakspeare.

Against the wall, in the middle of the half pace, is a chair placed before him, with a table and carpet before it. Bacon.

2. Ground variegated with flowers, and level and smooth.

Go signify as much, while here we march
Upon the grassy carpet of this plain. Shakspeare.

The carpet ground shall be with leaves o'erspread,
And boughs shall weave a cov'ring for your head.
Dryden.

3. Any thing variegated.

The whole dry land is, for the most part, covered over with a lovely carpet of green grass, and other herbs. Ray.

4. Carpet is used, proverbially, for a state of ease and luxury; as, a carpet knight, a knight that has never known the field, and has recommended himself only at table, Dr. Johnson says. This reflects no great credit on the knights in question. The fact is, that a carpet-knight was so called, because he received his honour from the king's hand in the court, and upon a carpet, or such like ornament belonging to the regal state. Markham's Booke of Honour, 1625. p. 71. They were sometimes called knights of the green cloth, in contradistinction to those who were knighted as soldiers; and they were selected from those, who had been serviceable to the court, city, or state, and had therefore merited distinction, whether having studied law, physick, or any other arts and sciences. Holme's Acad. of Armory, B. iii. p. 57.

He is knight, dubbed with unhacked rapier, and on carpet consideration. Shakspeare.

5. To be on the carpet, [sur le tapis, Fr.] is to be the subject of consideration; an affair in hand.

To CA'RPET. v. a. [from the noun.] To spread with carpets.

We found him in a fair chamber, richly hanged and carpeted under foot, without any degrees to the state; he was set upon a low throne, richly adorned, and a rich cloth of state over his head, of blue satin embroidered. Bacon.

The dry land we find every where naturally carpeted over with grass, and other agreeable wholesome plants. Derham.

CA'RPET-WALK.* } n. s. Carpet-way: a
CA'RPET-WAY. } green way; a way on the turf. Ray.

Mow carpet-walks, and ply weeding. Evelyn.

CA'RPING. particip. adj. [from To CARP.] Captious; censorious.

No carping critick interrupts his praise,
No rival strives, but for a second place.
Granville.

Lay aside therefore a carping spirit, and read even an adversary with an honest design to find out his true meaning; do not snatch at little lapses, and appearances of mistake. Watts.

CA'RPING.* n. s. [from the verb.] Cavil; censure; abuse.

The passage of the Israelites over Jordan, in memory of which those stones at Gilgal were set up, is free from all those little carpings beforementioned, that are made as to the passage through the Red-sea. Leslie, Method with the Deists.

CA'RPINGLY. adv. [from carping.] Captiously; censoriously.

We derive out of the Latin at second hand by the French, and make good English, as in these adverbs, carpingly, currently, actively, colourably. Camden's Remains.

CA'RPMEALS. n. s. A kind of coarse cloth made in the north of England. Phillips's World of Words.

CA'RPUS. n. s. [Latin.] The wrist so named by anatomists, which is made up of eight little bones, of different figures and thickness, placed in two ranks, four in each rank. They are strongly tied together by the ligaments which come from the radius, and by the annulary ligament. Quincy.

I found one of the bones of the carpus lying loose in the wound. Wiseman's Surgery.

CARR.* n. s. [Su. Goth. kaer.] A marsh, or flat land. Common in the north of England. Hence in Yorkshire the name of a village, Kirby-over-carrs.

CA'RRACK. See CARACK.

CA'RRAT. See CARAT.

CA'RRAWAY.† n. s. See CARAWAY. Mr. Mason blames Dr. Johnson for here referring to caraway, which means caraway seeds, when carraway, the word before us, means apples; "carraway Harvey apples," he says, "so called from their spicy flavour," as a Herefordshire friend informed him. There may be such apples; but both Johnson and the poet will be supported, in opposition to Mr. Mason, in using carraways as the seeds or comfits, and not as apples, by the following passage; which, as Mr. Steevens observes, may settle this important point!

This is a confirmation of our use in England, for the serving of apples and other fruites last after meales. Howbeit, we are wont to eate carawaies or biskets, or some other kind of comfits or seedes together with apples, thereby to breake winde ingendred by them: and surely it is a very good way for students.
Cogan's Haven of Health, 1595.

Nay, you shall see mine orchard, where, in an arbour, we will eat a last year's pippin of my own grafting, with a dish of carraways, and so forth; come, cousin, silence, and then to bed.
Shakspeare, Hen. IV.

CA'RRIABLE.* adj. [from carry.] That may be carried. Sherwood.

CA'RRIAGE.† n. s. [cariage, Fr. baggage; from carry.]

1. The act of carrying or transporting, or bearing any thing.

The unequal agitation of the winds, though material to the carriage of sounds farther or less way, yet do not confound the articulation.
Bacon, Nat. Hist.

If it seem so strange to move this obelisk for so little space, what may we think of the carriage of it out of Egypt? Wilkins.

2. Conquest; acquisition.

Solyman resolved to besiege Vienna, in good hope, that by the carriage away of that, the other cities would, without resistance, be yielded.
Knolles, Hist. of the Turks.

3. Vehicle; that in which any thing is carried.

What horse or carriage can take up and bear away all the loppings of a branchy tree at once?
Watts.

4. The frame upon which cannon is carried.

He commanded the great ordnance to be laid upon carriages, which before lay bound in great unwieldy timber, with rings fastened thereto, and could not handsomely be removed to or fro.
Knolles, Hist. of the Turks.

5. Behaviour; personal manners.

Before his eyes he did cast a mist, by his own insinuation, and by the carriage of his youth, that expressed a natural princely behaviour.
Bacon, Hen. VII.

Though in my face there's no affected frown,
Nor in my carriage a feign'd niceness shown,
I keep my honour still without a stain. Dryden.

Let them have ever so learned lectures of breeding, that which will most influence their carriage, will be the company they converse with, and the fashion of those about them. Locke.

6. Conduct; measures; practices.

You may hurt yourself; nay, utterly
Grow from the king's acquaintance by this carriage. Shakspeare.

He advised the new governour to have so much discretion in his carriage, that there might be no notice taken in the exercise of his religion.
Clarendon.

7. Management; manner of transacting. Not used.

The manner of carriage of the business, was as if there had been secret inquisition upon him.
Bacon, Hen. VII.

8. That which is carried; the burthen.

With speare in th' one hand [Calepine] staid himselfe upright,
With th' other staid his lady up with steady might: —
But when as Calepine came to the brim,
And saw his carriage past that perill well, —
His heart with vengeaunce inwardly did swell.
Spenser, F. Q. vi. iii. 34.

CA'RRIER. n. s. [from To carry.]

1. One who carries something.

You must distinguish between the motion of the air, which is but a vehiculum causæ, a carrier of the sounds, and the sounds conveyed.
Bacon, Nat. Hist.

For winds, when homeward they return, will drive
The loaded carriers from their evening hive.
Dryden.

2. One whose profession or trade is to carry goods for others.

I have rather made it my choice to transcribe all, than to venture the loss of my originals by post or carrier. Pierce's Letters.

The roads are crouded with carriers, laden with rich manufactures. Swift.

3. A messenger; one who carries a message.

The welcome news is in the letter found;
The carrier's not commissioned to expound;
It speaks itself. Dryden, Religio Laici.

4. The name of a species of pigeons, so called from the reported practice of some nations, who send them with letters tied to their necks, which they carry to the place where they were bred, however remote.

There are tame and wild pigeons, and of tame there are croppers, carriers, runts. Walton's Angler.

CA'RRION.† n. s. [old Fr. caroigne, carongne: modern, charogne; from the Lat. caro and rodens. V. Roquefort.]

1. The carcase of something not proper for food.

They did eat the dead carrions, and one another soon after; insomuch that the very carcases they scraped out of their graves. Spenser on Ireland.

It is I,
That, lying by the violet in the sun,
Do as the carrion does, not as the flower. Shaksp.

Ravens are seen in flocks where a carrion lies, and wolves in herds to run down a deer. Temple.

Sheep, oxen, horses fall; and heap'd on high,
The differing species in confusion lie,
Till warn'd by frequent ills, the way they found,
To lodge their loathsome carrion under ground.
Dryden.

Criticks, as they are birds of prey, have ever a natural inclination to carrion. Pope.

2. Any flesh so corrupted as not to be fit for food.

Not all that pride that makes thee swell,
As big as thou dost blown-up veal;
Nor all thy tricks and slights to cheat,
Sell all thy carrion for good meat. Hudibras.

The wolves will get a breakfast by my death,
Yet scarce enough their hunger to supply,
For love has made me carrion ere I die. Dryden.

3. A name of reproach for a worthless woman.

Shall we send that foolish carrion, Mrs. Quickly, to him, and excuse his throwing into the water?
Shakspeare.

CA'RRION.† adj. [from the substantive.] Relating to carcases; feeding upon carcases.

Match to match I have encounter'd him,
And made a prey for carrion kites and crows,
Even of the bonny beasts he lov'd so well.
Shakspeare, Henry VI.

You'll ask me why I rather choose to have
A weight of carrion flesh, than to receive
Three thousand ducats? Shaksp. Merch. of Venice.

This foul deed shall smell above the earth
With carrion men groaning for burial.
Shakspeare, Jul. Cæs.

The charity of our death-bed visits from one another, is much at a rate with that of a carrion crow to a sheep; we smell a carcase. L'Estrange.

CA'RRION-LEAN.* adj. Applied properly to beasts; to jades that be more carrion like, or more lean. Huloet.

Told our intents before.

Shakspeare, Love's Labour's Lost.

CART.† n. s. See CAR. [cpæt, cpat, Sax. cart, Welsh; formerly applied to a chariot; Fr. charette, a cart. So Chaucer uses cart and carter for chariot and charioteer.]

1. A carriage in general.

The Scythians are described by Herodotus to lodge always in carts, and to feed upon the milk of mares. Temple.

Triptolemus, so sung the Nine,
Strew'd plenty from his cart divine. Dryden.

2. A wheel-carriage, used commonly for luggage.

Now while my friend, just ready to depart,
Was packing all his goods in one poor cart,
He stopp'd a little ———. Dryden's Juvenal.

3. A small carriage with two wheels, used by husbandmen, distinguished from a waggon, which has four wheels.

Alas! what weights are these that load my heart!
I am as dull as winter starved sheep,
Tir'd as a jade in overladen cart. Sidney.

4. The vehicle in which criminals are carried to execution.

The squire, whose good grace was to open the scene,
Now fitted the halter, now travers'd the cart,
And often took leave, but was loth to depart.

Prior.

To CART.† v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To expose in a cart by way of punishment.

If this house be not turn'd within this fortnight
With the foundation upward, I'll be carted.

Beaum. and Fl. Tamer tamed.

Democritus ne'er laugh'd so loud,
To see bawds carted through the croud. Hudibras.

No woman led a better life:
She to intrigues was e'en hard-hearted;
She chuckl'd when a bawd was carted;
And thought the nation ne'er would thrive,
Till all the whores were burnt alive. Prior.

2. To place in a cart.

Thespis — with his carted actors.

Sir W. Soame and Dryd. Art of Poetry.

To CART.† v. n. To use carts for carriage.

CA'RTEL.† n. s. [cartel, Fr. cartello, Ital. dimin. of Lat. charta.]

1. A writing containing, for the most part, stipulations between enemies.

As this discord among the sisterhood is likely to engage them in a long and lingering war, it is the more necessary that there should be a cartel settled among them. Addison, Freeholder.

2. Anciently any publick paper, Dr. Johnson says. But it was particularly the challenge to a duel or combat, as even the solitary instance from Daniel, with which he illustrates the word, proves. It is sometimes written chartel.

They flatly disavouch
To yield him more obedience, or support;
And as to perjur'd duke of Lancaster,
Their cartel of defiance, they prefer.

Daniel's Civil War.

Xerxes — sent a cartel of defiance against the mountain Atho.

Bp. Taylor, Holy Dying, viii. § 8.

Chief of domestick knights and errant,
Either for chartel or for warrant. Hudibras, i. 1.

Some, housewrights; some, shipwrights; some, cartwrights; and some, the joiners of smaller works. Fotherby, Atheom. p. 193.

CA'RUCATE.* n. s. [Lat. caruca, Fr. carrue, a plough, cart, or team.] A plough-land. See CARVE. As much land as one team can plough in the year.

The hide was the measure of land in the Confessor's reign; the carucate, that to which it was reduced by the Conqueror's new standard. — Twelve carucates of land make one hide. — It [the carucate] must be various according to the nature of the soil, and custom of husbandry, in every county. Kelham, Domesday Book, p. 168.

CARVE.* n. s. [old Fr. carrue; low Lat. carua. See CARUCATE.]

As cantreds are diversely estimated, so are also carves or plowlands. Sir J. Ware on Spenser's Ireland.

A hide, a plough-land, or a carve, I hold clearly equivalent. Selden, on Drayton's Polyolb. S. 11.

To CARVE.† v. a. [ceorfan, Sax. kerven, Dutch; from the Goth. karfwa.]

1. To cut wood or stone, or other matter, into elegant forms.

Taking the very refuse, he hath carved it diligently when he had nothing else to do. Wisdom, xiii. 13.

Had Democritus really carved mount Athos into a statue of Alexander the Great, and had the memory of the fact been obliterated by some accident, who could afterwards have proved it impossible, but that it might casually have been? Bentley.

2. To cut meat at the table.
3. To make any thing by carving or cutting.

Yet fearing idleness, the nurse of ill,
In sculpture exercis'd his happy skill;
And carv'd in iv'ry such a maid so fair,
As nature could not with his art compare,
Were she to work. Dryden.

4. To engrave.

O Rosalind! these trees shall be my books,
And in their barks my thoughts I'll character;
That every eye, which in this forest looks,
Shall see thy virtue witness'd every where.
Run, run, Orlando, carve on every tree,
The fair, the chaste, the unexpressive she. Shaks.

5. To distribute; to apportion; to provide at will.

He had been a keeper of his flocks, both from the violence of robbers and his own soldiers; who could easily have carved themselves their own food. South.

How dares sinful dust and ashes invade the prerogative of Providence, and carve out to himself the seasons and issues of life and death? South.

The labourer's share, being seldom more than a bare subsistence, never allows that body of men opportunity to struggle with the richer, unless when some common and great distress emboldens them to carve to their wants. Locke.

6. To cut; to hew.

Or they will buy his sheep forth of the cote,
Or they will carve the shepherd's throat.
Spenser, Pastorals.

Brave Macbeth, with his brandish'd steel,
Like valour's minion, carved out his passage.
Shakspeare.

To CARVE. v. n.

1. To exercise the trade of a sculptor.
2. To perform at table the office of supplying the company from the dishes.

Well then, things handsomely were serv'd;
My mistress for the strangers carv'd. Prior.

CA'RVEL.† n. s. See CARAVEL. A small ship.

I gave them order, if they found any Indians there, to send in the little fly-boat, or the carvel, into the river; for, with our great ships, we durst not approach the coast. Ralegh.

She spreads sattens, as the king's ships do canvass, every where, she may spare me her misen, and her bonnets, strike her main petticoat, and yet outsail me, I am a carvel to her. Beaum. and Fl. Wit without Money.

CA'RVEL.* n. s. Apparently a term for the urtica marina, or sea-blubber. See BLUBBER.

The carvel is a sea-fome, floating upon the surface of the ocean, of a globous form, like so many lines throwing abroad her stings, which she can spread at pleasure, angling for small fishes, which by that artifice she captivates. Sir T. Herbert, Trav. p. 26.

CA'RVER. n. s. [from carve.]

1. A sculptor.

All arts and artists Theseus could command,
Who sold for hire, or wrought for better fame,
The master painters and the carvers came. Dryden.

2. One that cuts up the meat at the table.

Meanwhile thy indignation yet to raise,
The carver, dancing round each dish, surveys
With flying knife, and, as his art directs,
With proper gestures ev'ry fowl dissects. Dryden.

3. One that apportions, or distributes at will.

In this kind, to come in braving arms,
Be his own carver, and cut out his way,
To find out right with wrongs it may not be. Shakspeare, Rich. II.

We are not the carvers of our own fortunes. L'Estrange.

CA'RVING. n. s. [from carve.] Sculpture; figures carved.

They can no more last like the ancients, than excellent carvings in wood, like those in marble and brass. Temple.

The lids are ivy, grapes in clusters lurk
Beneath the carving of the curious work. Dryden's Virgil.

CA'RUNCLE. n. s. [caruncula, Lat.] A small protuberance of flesh, either natural or morbid.

Caruncles are a sort of loose flesh, arising in the urethra by the erosion made by virulent acrid matter. Wiseman.

The Turkey has a bare red carunculated head and neck. British Birds, i. 287.

CARYA'TES. } n. s. [from Carya, a
CARYA'TIDES. } city taken by the Greeks, who led away the women captives; and, to perpetuate their slavery, represented them in buildings as charged with burdens.] An order of columns or pilasters under the figures of women, dressed in long robes, serving to support entablatures. Chambers.

CASCA'DE.† n. s. [cascade, Fr. cascata, Ital. from cascare, to fall. Written cascata so late as 1685.] A cataract; a waterfall.

There is a great cascata or fall of waters. Brown, Travels, 1685, p. 79.

Rivers diverted from their native course,
And bound with chains of artificial force,
From large cascades in pleasing tumult roll'd. Prior.

The river Teverone throws itself down a precipice, and falls by several cascades, from one rock to another, till it gains the bottom of the valley. Addison.

CASE.† n. s. [caisse, Fr. a box.]

1. Something that covers or contains any thing else; a covering; a box; a sheath.

O cleave, my sides!
Heart, once be stronger than thy continent,
Crack thy frail case. Shakspeare, Ant. and Cleop.

Each thought was visible that roll'd within,
As through a crystal case the figur'd hours are seen. Dryden.

Other caterpillars produced maggots, that immediately made themselves up in cases. Ray on the Creation.

The body is but a case to this vehicle. Broome on the Odyssey.

Just then Clarissa drew, with tempting grace,
A two-edg'd weapon from her shining case. Pope.

2. Hence the cover, or skin, of an animal.

O, thou dissembling cub, what wilt thou be,
When time hath sow'd a grizzle on thy case? Shakspeare, Twelfth Night.

Generally, as with rich-furr'd conies, their cases are far better than their bodies.
Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 480.

In each seven small brass and leather guns, charged with case-shot. Clarendon.

CASE. n. s. [casus, Lat.]

1. Condition with regard to outward circumstances.
Unworthy wretch, quoth he, of so great grace,
How dare I think such glory to attain?
These that have it attain'd, were in like case,
Quoth he, as wretched, and liv'd in like pain.
Spenser, F. Q.
Question your royal thoughts, make the case yours;
Be now a father, and propose a son.
Shakspeare, Hen. IV.
Some knew the face,
And all had heard the much lamented case.
Dryden.
These were the circumstances under which the Corinthians then were, and the argument which the apostle advances is intended to reach their particular case. Atterbury.
My youth may be made, as it never fails in executions, a case of compassion.
Pope, Pref. to his Works.

2. State of things.
He saith, that if there can be found such an equality between man and man, as between man and beast, or between soul and body, it investeth a right of government, which seemeth rather an impossible case, than an untrue sentence. Bacon.
Here was the case; an army of English, wasted and tired with a long winter's siege, engaged an army of a greater number than themselves, fresh and in vigour. Bacon.
I can but be a slave where-ever I am; so that, taken or not taken, 'tis all a case to me.
L'Estrange.
They are excellent in order to certain ends; he hath no need to use them, as the case now stands, being provided for with the provision of an angel.
Bp. Taylor, Holy Living.
Your parents did not produce you much into the world, whereby you have fewer ill impressions; but they failed, as is generally the case, in too much neglecting to cultivate your mind. Swift.

3. [In physick.] State of the body; state of the disease.
It was well; for we had rather met with calms and contrary winds, than any tempests; for our sick were many, and in very ill case. Bacon.
Chalybeate water seems to be a proper remedy in hypochondriacal cases. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

4. History of a disease.

5. State of a legal question.
If he be not apt to beat over matters, and to call up one thing, to prove and illustrate another, let him study the lawyers cases; so every defect of the mind may have a special receipt.
Bacon, Essays.

6. In ludicrous language, condition with regard to leanness, or fat. In case, is lusty or fat.
Thou liest, most ignorant monster; I am in case to justle a constable. Shakspeare, Tempest.

Quoth Ralph, I should not, if I were
In case for action now be here. Hudibras.
For if the sire be faint, or out of case,
He will be copied in his famish'd race.
Dryden, Virgil.
The priest was pretty well in case,
And shew'd some humour in his face;
Look'd with an easy careless mien,
A perfect stranger to the spleen. Swift.

7. Contingence; possible event.
The atheist, in case things should fall out contrary to his belief or expectation, hath made no provision for this case; if, contrary to his confidence, it should prove in the issue that there is a God, the man is lost and undone for ever.
Tillotson.

8. Question relating to particular persons or things.
Well do I find each man most wise in his own case. Sidney.
It is strange, that the ancient fathers should not appeal to this judge in all cases, it being so short and expedite a way for the ending of controversies.
Tillotson.

9. Representation of any fact or question.

10. The variation of nouns. The several changes which the noun undergoes in the Latin and Greek tongues, in the several numbers, are called cases, and are designed to express the several views or relations under which the mind considers things with regard to one another; and the variation of the noun for this purpose is called declension.
Clarke's Lat. Gram.

11. In case. [in caso, Ital.] If it should happen; upon the supposition that: a form of speech now little used.
For in case it be certain, hard it cannot be for them to shew us where we shall find it; that we may say these were the orders of the apostles.
Hooker.
A sure retreat to his forces, in case they should have an ill day, or unlucky chance in the field.
Bacon, Hen. VII.
This would be the accomplishment of their common felicity, in case, either by their evil destiny or advice, they suffered not the occasion to be lost. Hayward.

To CASE. v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To put in a case or cover.
Case ye, case ye; on with your vizours, there's money of the king's coming down the hill.
Shakspeare, Hen. IV.
The cry went once for thee,
And still it might, and yet it may again,
If thou wouldst not entomb thyself alive,
And case thy reputation in a tent.
Shakspeare, Tr. and Cress.
Like a fall'n cedar, far diffus'd his train,
Cas'd in green scales, the crocodile extends.
Thomson.

2. To cover as a case.
Then comes my fit again, I had else been perfect;
As broad, and general, as the casing air,
To saucy doubts and fears. Shaks. Macbeth.

3. To cover on the outside with materials different from the inside.
Then they began to case their houses with marble. Arbuthnot.

4. To strip off the covering; to take off the skin.

They fell presently to reasoning and casing upon the matter with him, and laying distinctions before him. L'Estrange.

To CASEHA'RDEN. v. a. [from case and harden.] To harden on the outside.
The manner of casehardening is thus: Take cow horn or hoof, dry it thoroughly in an oven, then beat it to powder; put about the same quantity of bay salt to it, and mingle them together with stale chamberlye, or else white wine vinegar. Lay some of this mixture upon loam, and cover your iron all over with it; then wrap the loam about all, and lay it upon the hearth of the forge to dry and harden. Put it into the fire, and blow up the coals to it, till the whole lump have just a blood-red heat.
Moxon, Mech. Exercises.

CA'SEMATE.† n. s. [Ital. casamatta, from casa armata; Span. casamata; a vault formerly made to separate the platforms of the lower and upper batteries. Formerly written casamate.]

1. [In fortification.] A kind of vault or arch of stone-work, in that part of the flank of a bastion next the curtain, somewhat retired or drawn back towards the capital of the bastion, serving as a battery to defend the face of the opposite bastion, and the moat or ditch.
Secure your casamates,
Here Master Picklock, sir, your man o' law
And learn'd attorney, has sent you a bag of munition. B. Jonson, Staple of News.

2. The well, with its several subterraneous branches, dug in the passage of the bastion, till the miner is heard at work, and air given to the mine. Harris.

CA'SEMENT. n. s. [casamento, Ital.] A window opening upon hinges.
Why, then may you have a casement of the great chamber window, where we play, open, and the moon may shine in at the casement.
Shakspeare, Mids. N. Dr.
Here in this world they do much knowledge read,
And are the casements which admit most light.
Davies.
They waken'd with the noise, did fly
From inward room to window eye,
And gently op'ning lid, the casement,
Look'd out, but yet with some amazement.
Hudibras.
There is as much difference between the clear representations of the understanding then, and the obscure discoveries that it makes now, as there is between the prospect of a casement and a key hole.
South.

CA'SEOUS. adj. [caseus, Lat.] Resembling cheese; cheesy.
Its fibrous parts are from the caseous parts of the chyle. Floyer on Humours.

CA'SERN.† n. s. [caserne, Fr.] A little room or lodgement erected between the rampart and the houses of fortified towns, to serve as apartments or odgings for the soldiers of the garrison, with beds. Harris.

CA'SEWORM. n. s. [from case and worm.] A grub that makes itself a case.

Caddises, or caseworms, are to be found in this nation, in several little brooks. Floyer.

CASH.† n. s. [caisse, Fr. This etymology, given by Dr. Johnson, has been questioned. But our word certainly seems to have been used, originally, in the French sense. "She [the countess of Shrewsbury] is said to have amassed a great sum of money to some ill use: 20,000l. are known to be in her cash." Winwood's Memorials, iii. 281. Lat. capsa. The Su. cassa is cash.] Money; properly, ready money; money in the chest, or at hand.

A thief, bent to unhoard the cash
Of some rich burgher. Milton, P. L.

He is at an end of all his cash, he has both his law and his daily bread now upon trust. Arbuthnot, John Bull.

He sent the thief, that stole the cash, away
And punish'd him that put it in his way. Pope.

CA'SH-KEEPER. n. s. [from cash and keep.] A man entrusted with the money.

Dispensator was properly a cash-keeper, or privy-purse. Arbuthnot on Coins.

To CASH.* v. a. [from the noun.] A mercantile expression; as, to cash a bill, i. e. to give money for the promissory payment.

To CASH.* v. a. [from the Fr. casser. Perhaps the parent of our word cashier.] To discard.

And thereupon cashing the greatest part of his land army, he only retained one thousand of the best souldiers. Sir A. Gorges, in Purchas's Pilgrim.

CA'SHEWNUT. n. s. A tree that bears nuts, not with shells but husks. Miller.

CASHI'ER.† n. s. [from cash, and Teut. cassier, or kassier. Formerly written casheure.] He that has charge of the money.

Where's my casheure?
Are the summes right?
Decker, Westward Hoe, 1607.

If a steward or cashier be suffered to run on, without bringing him to a reckoning, such a sottish forbearance will teach him to shuffle. South.

A Venetian, finding his son's expences grow very high, ordered his cashier to let him have no more money than what he should count when he received it. Locke.

Flight of cashiers, or mobs, he'll never mind;
And knows no losses, while the muse is kind. Pope.

To CASHI'ER. v. a. [casser, Fr. cassare, Lat.]

1. To discard; to dismiss from a post, or a society, with reproach.

Does 't not go well? Cassio hath beaten thee,
And thou by that small hurt hast cashier'd Cassio.
Shakspeare.

Seconds in factions many times prove principals; but many times also they prove cyphers, and are cashiered. Bacon.

If I had omitted what he said, his thoughts and words being thus cashiered in my hands, he had no longer been Lucretius. Dryden.

They have already cashiered several of their followers as mutineers. Addison, Freeholder.

The ruling rogue, who dreads to be cashier'd,
Contrives, as he is hated, to be fear'd. Swift.

2. It seems, in the following passages, to signify the same as to annul; to vacate; which is sufficiently agreeable to the derivation.

If we should find a father corrupting his son, or a mother her daughter, we must charge this upon a peculiar anomaly and baseness of nature; if the name of nature may be allowed to that which seems to be utter cashiering of it, and deviation from, and a contradiction to, the common principles of humanity. South.

Some cashier, or at least endeavour to invalidate, all other arguments, and forbid us to hearken to those proofs, as weak or fallacious. Locke.

CA'SHOO.* n. s. The gum or juice of a tree in the East Indies.

CA'SING.* n. s. [from To case.]

CASK.† n. s. [casque, Fr. cadus, Lat. Dr. Johnson says. But it may be from the Goth. kas, a vessel. It has been observed to me, that the Fr. casque is used only in the sense of a helmet; but caque in French is a small barrel.]

1. A barrel; a wooden vessel to stop up liquour or provisions.

The patient turning himself abed, it makes a fluctuating kind of noise, like the rumbling of water in a cask. Hervey.

Perhaps to-morrow he may change his wine,
And drink old sparkling Alban, or Setine,
Whose title, and whose age, with mould o'ergrown,
The good old cask for ever keeps unknown. Dryd.

2. It has cask in a kind of plural sense, to signify the commodity or provision of casks.

Great inconveniences grow by the bad cask being commonly so ill seasoned and conditioned, as that a great part of the beer is ever lost and cast away. Ralegh.

To CASK.* v. a. [from the noun.] To put into a cask; as, to cask beer or wine.

CASK. } n. s. casque, Fr. cassis, Lat.]
CA'SQUET. } A helmet; armour for the head: a poetical word.

Let thy blows, doubly redoubled,
Fall like amazing thunder on the casque
Of thy pernicious enemy. Shakspeare.

And these
Sling weighty stones, when from afar they fight;
Their casques are cork, a covering thick and light.
Dryden.

Why does he load with darts
His trembling hands, and crush beneath a cask
His wrinkled brows? Addison.

CA'SKET. n. s. [a diminutive of caisse, a chest, Fr. casse, cassette.] A small box or chest for jewels, or things of particular value.

They found him dead, and cast into the streets,
An empty casket, where the jewel, life,
By some damn'd hand was robb'd and ta'en away.
Shakspeare.

O ignorant poor man! what dost thou bear,
Lock'd up within the casket of thy breast?
What jewels, and what riches hast thou there?
What heav'nly treasure in so weak a chest? Davies.

Mine eye hath found that sad sepulchral rock,
That was the casket of Heav'n's richest store. Milt.

That had by chance pack'd up his choicest treasure
In one dear casket, and sav'd only that. Otway.

This casket India's glowing gems unlocks,
And all Arabia breathes from yonder box. Pope.

To CA'SKET.† v. a. [from the noun.] To put into a casket.

I have writ my letters, casketed my treasure, and given order for our horses. Shakspeare.

The casting of the skin is, by the ancients, compared to the breaking of the secundine, or cawl, but not rightly; for that were to make every casting of the skin a new birth: and besides, the secundine is but a general cover, not shaped according to the parts, but the skin is shaped according to the parts. The creatures that cast the skin, are the snake, the viper, the grasshopper, the lizard, the silkworm, &c. Bacon.

O fertile head, which every year
Could such a crop of wonders bear!
Which might it never have been cast,
Each year's growth added to the last,
These lofty branches had supply'd
The earth's bold sons prodigious pride. Waller.

The waving harvest bends beneath his blast,
The forest shakes, the groves their honours cast. Dryden.

From hence, my lord, and love, I thus conclude,
That though my homely ancestors were rude,
Mean as I am, yet may I have the grace
To make you father of a generous race:
And noble then am I, when I begin,
In virtue cloth'd, to cast the rags of sin. Dryden.

The ladies have been in a kind of moulting season, having cast great quantities of ribbon and cambrick, and reduced the human figure to the beautiful globular form. Addison.

A cast of dreadful dust will soon allay.
Dryden, Virg.

3. State of any thing cast or thrown.

In his own instance of casting ambsace, though it partake more of contingency than of freedom; supposing the positure of the party's hand, who did throw the dice; supposing the figure of the table, and of the dice themselves; supposing the measure of force applied, and supposing all other things which did concur to the production of that cast, to be the very same they were, there is no doubt but, in this case, the cast is necessary.
Bp. Bramhall's Answer to Hobbes.

Plato compares life to a game at tables; there what cast we shall have is not in our power, but to manage it well, that is. Norris.

4. Manner of throwing.

Some harrow their ground over, and sow wheat or rye on it with a broad cast; some only with a single cast, and some with a double. Mortimer.

5. The space through which any thing is thrown.

And he was withdrawn from them about a stone's cast, and kneeled down and prayed.
St. Luke, xxii. 41.

6. A stroke; a touch.

Some muttering at the aultar, and an other sort jettyng up and down to wayte when my Ladie shall be ready to see a caste of their office.
Confutation of N. Shaxton, (1546,) sign. G. vi.

We have them all with one voice for giving him a cast of their court prophecy. South.

Another cast of their politicks, was that of endeavouring to impeach an innocent lady, for her faithful and diligent service of the queen. Swift.

This was a cast of Wood's politicks; for his information was wholly false and groundless. Swift.

7. Motion of the eye; direction of the eye.

Pity causeth sometimes tears, and a flection or cast of the eye aside; for pity is but grief in another's behalf; the cast of the eye is a gesture of aversion, or lothness, to behold the object of pity.
Bacon, Nat. Hist.

A man shall be sure to have a cast of their eye to warn him before they give him a cast of their nature to betray him. South.

If any man desires to look on this doctrine of gravity, let him turn the first cast of his eyes on what we have said of fire. Digby on the Soul.

There held in holy passion still,
Forget thyself to marble, till,
With a sad leaden downward cast,
Thou fix them on the earth as fast. Milton, Il Pens.

They are the best epitomes in the world, and let you see, with one cast of an eye, the substance of above an hundred pages.
Addison on Ancient Medals.

8. He that squints is said popularly to have a cast with his eye.

9. The throw of dice.

Were it good,
To set the exact wealth of all our sta es
All at one cast; to set so rich a main
On the nice hazard of some doubtful hour?
Shakspeare.

10. Venture from throwing dice; chance from the fall of dice.

When you have brought them to the very last cast, they will offer to come to you, and submit themselves. Spenser on Ireland.

With better grace an ancient chief may yield
The long contended honours of the field,
Than venture all his fortune at a cast,
And fight, like Hannibal, to lose at last. Dryden.

Will you turn recreant at the last cast? Dryden.

In the last war, has it not sometimes been an even cast, whether the army should march this way or that way? South.

11. A mould; a form.

The whole would have been an heroick poem, but in another cast and figure, than any that ever had been written before. Prior.

12. A shade or tendency to any colour.

A flaky mass, grey, with a cast of green, in which the talky matter makes the greatest part of the mass. Woodward.

The qualities of blood in a healthy state are to be florid, the red part congealing, and the serum ought to be without any greenish cast.
Arbuthnot on Aliments.

13. Exterior appearance.

The native hue of resolution
Is sicklied o'er with the pale cast of thought.
Shakspeare.

New names, new dressings, and the modern cast,
Some scenes, some persons alter'd, and outfac'd
The world. Sir J. Denham.

14. Manner; air; mien.

Pretty conceptions, fine metaphors, glittering expressions, and something of a neat cast of verse, are properly the dress, gems, or loose ornaments of poetry. Pope, Letters.

Neglect not the little figures and turns on the words, nor sometimes the very cast of the periods; neither omit or confound any rites or customs of antiquity. Pope on Homer.

15. A flight; a number of hawks dismissed from the fist.

A cast of merlins there was besides, which, flying of a gallant height, would beat the birds that rose, down unto the bushes, as falcons will do wild fowl over a river. Sidney.

16. [Casta, Spanish.] A breed; a race; a species.

This world was to be continued for four ages, and to be peopled by four casts or sorts of men.
Lord's Discov. of the Banians, 1630, p. 3.

Many of the Indian casts will not drink out of the same cup, nor feed out of the same dish with a person deemed impure; and they hold all such [impure] except their own fraternity.
Bryant, Anc. Mythol.

17. [Cast, Welsh.] A trick.

I have detected his untrue meaning, revealed his juggling castes, and by his own authors opened clearly their meaning much contrarie to his assertion. Martin, Marriage of Priests (1554), LL. i.

18. The act of casting metal.

Such daily cast of brazen cannon,
And foreign mart for implements of war.
Shakspeare, Hamlet.

CA'STANET.† n. s. [castaneta, Span. diminit. of the Lat. castanea, a chesnut; the dancer's shells are said to resemble the shells of a chesnut.] A small shell of ivory, or hard wood, which dancers rattle in their hands.

2. CASTLES in the air. [chateaux d'Espagne, Fr.] Projects without reality.

These were but like castles in the air, and in men's fancies, vainly imagined.
Ralegh, History of the World.

Do not our great reformers use
This sidrophel to forebode news;
To write of victories next year,
And castles taken yet i' the air? Hudibras, ii. iii.

CA'STLE-BUILDER.* n. s. A fanciful projector; he who builds castles in the air.

The poets—are the greatest castle-builders in the world. Student, i. 223.

CA'STLE-BUILDING.* n. s.

Castle-building, or the science of aerial architecture, is of much too vague a nature to be comprehended in a concise regular definition: but, for the sake of custom and method, I define it to be the craft of erecting baseless fabricks in the air, and peopling them with proper notional inhabitants for the employment and improvement of the understanding. Student, i. 223.

CA'STLE-CROWNED.* adj. [from castle and crown.] Crowned or topped with a castle.

It was my chance in walking all alone,
The ancient castle-crowned hill to scale.

CA'STOR and POLLUX [In meteorology.] A fiery meteor, which appears sometimes sticking to a part of the ship, in form of one, two, or even three or four balls. When one is seen alone, it is called Helena, which portends the severest part of the storm to be yet behind; two are denominated Castor and Pollux, and sometimes Tyndarides, which portend a cessation of the storm.
Chambers.

CASTO'REUM. n. s. [from castor. In pharmacy.] A liquid matter inclosed in bags or purses, near the anus of the castor, falsely taken for his testicles.
Chambers.

CA'STORY.* n. s. [from castoreum.] Probably the oil drawn from castoreum, and used in the preparation of colours.

Polish't ivory,
Which cunning craftsman hand hath overlaid
With fayre vermilion or pure castory.
Spenser, F. Q. ii. ix. 41.

CASTRAMETA'TION.† n. s. [old Fr. castrametation, from castra metor, Lat.] The art or practice of encamping.

Between Chadlington and Saresden is also an unmentioned camp, either Saxon or Danish, for both are concerned in this question; and their castrametation, even under the most practicable and commodious circumstances of ground, is sometimes ambiguous.
Warton, Hist. of Kiddington, p. 50.

To CA'STRATE.† v. a. [castro, Lat.]

1. To geld.

Origen—having read that scripture, "There be some that castrate themselves for the kingdom of God," which was but a parabolical speech, he did really, and therefore foolishly, castrate himself.
Bp. Morton, Discharge of Imputations, &c. p. 138.

2. To take away the obscene parts of a writing, Dr. Johnson says. It means to take away any part of a publication; as, a castrated set of Holinshed's Chronicles means a copy, which wants a considerable portion that had once been published in it, and has been removed. It means also, in a general sense, to take away.

Ye castrate the desires of the flesh, and shall obteine a more ample rewarde of grace in heaven.
Martin, Marriage of Priests, (1554) Y. i. b.

CASTRA'TION. n. s. [from castrate.] The act of gelding.

The largest needle should be used, in taking up the spermatick vessels in castration.

The revenue of Ireland, both certain and casual, did not rise unto ten thousand pounds. Davies on Ireland.

That which seemeth most casual and subject to fortune, is yet disposed by the ordinance of God. Ralegh, History.

Whether found, where casual fire
Had wasted woods, on mountain, or in vale
Down to the veins of earth. Milton, P. L.

The commissioners entertained themselves by the fire-side, in general and casual discourses. Clarendon.

Most of our rarities have been found out by casual emergency, and have been the works of time and chance, rather than of philosophy. Glanville.

The expences of some of them always exceed their certain annual income; but seldom their casual supplies. I call them casual, in compliance with the common form. Atterbury.

CA'SUALLY. adv. [from casual.] Accidentally; without design or set purpose.

Go, bid my woman
Search for a jewel, that too casually
Hath left mine arm. Shakspeare.

Wool new shorn, laid casually upon a vessel of verjuice, had drunk up the verjuice, though the vessel was without any flaw. Bacon.

I should have acquainted my judge with one advantage, and which I now casually remember. Dryden.

CA'SUALNESS. n. s. [from casual.] Accidentalness.

CA'SUALTY. n. s. [from casual.]

1. Accident; a thing happening by chance, not design.

With more patience men endure the losses that befall them by mere casualty, than the damages which they sustain by injustice. Ralegh, Essays.

That Octavius Cæsar should shift his camp that night that it happened to be took by the enemy, was a mere casualty; yet it preserved a person, who lived to establish a total alteration of government in the imperial city of the world. South.

2. Chance that produces unnatural death.

Builds in the weather on the outward wall,
Ev'n in the force and road of casualty. Shaksp.

It is observed in particular nations, that, within the space of two or three hundred years, notwithstanding all casualties, the number of men doubles. Burnet's Theory.

We find one casualty in our bills, of which, though there be daily talk, there is little effect. Graunt's Bills of Mortality.

CA'SUIST. n. s. [casuiste, Fr. from casus, Lat.] One that studies and settles cases of conscience.

The judgment of any casuist, or learned divine, concerning the state of a man's soul, is not sufficient to give him confidence. South.

You can scarce see a bench of porters without two or three casuists in it, that will settle you the rights of princes. Addison.

Who shall decide, when doctors disagree,
And soundest casuists doubt like you and me?
Pope.

To CA'SUIST.* v. n. [from the noun.] To play the casuist.

We never leave subtilizing and casuisting, till we have straitened and pared that liberal path into a razor's edge to walk on.
Milton, Doct. and Dis. of Divorce, ii. 20.

CA'SUISTICAL.† adj. [from casuist.] Relating to cases of conscience; containing the doctrine relating to cases.

What arguments they have to beguile poor, simple, unstable souls with, I know not: but surely the practical, casuistical, that is, the principal, vital part of their religion savours very little of spirituality. South.

There is a generation of men, who have framed their casuistical divinity to a perfect compliance with all the corrupt affections of a man's nature. South, Serm, ii. 393.

CA'SUISTRY. n. s. [from casuist.] The science of a casuist; the doctrine of cases of conscience.

This concession would not pass for good casuistry in these ages. Pope, Odyssey, Notes.

Morality, by her false guardians drawn,
Chicane in furs, and casuistry in lawn.
Pope, Dunciad.

CAT.† n. s. [katz, Teuton, chat, Fr. cat, Sax. old Fr. cat; bas Bret. cat; low Lat. catus, cattus. The Persian also is chat. See Sir T. Herbert's Trav. p. 317.] A domestick animal that catches mice, commonly reckoned by naturalists the lowest order of the leonine species.

'Twas you incens'd the rabble:
Cats, that can judge as fitly of his worth,
As I can of those mysteries, which Heaven
Will not have earth to know.
Shakspeare, Coriolanus.

Thrice the brinded cat hath mew'd.
Shakspeare, Macbeth.

A cat, as she beholds the light, draws the ball of her eye small and long, being covered over with a green skin, and dilates it at pleasure.
Peacham on Drawing.

CAT.† n. s. A sort of ship.

There are vessels, at this day, which are common upon the northern part of the English coast, and are called cats. Part of the harbour at Plymouth is called Catwater, undoubtedly from ships of this denomination, which were once common in those parts. Bryant, Observ. on Rowley's Poems.

CAT.* n. s. A double trivet or tripod, having six feet; so called, perhaps, from falling, as it is said of the cat, always on its legs.

CAT in the pan.† [imagined by some to be rightly written Catipan, as coming from Catipania. An unknown correspondent imagines, very naturally, that it is corrupted from Cate in the pan, Dr. Johnson says. Some have imagined it to be connected with the Ital. accattare; whence accattapane, for a beggar. But our old writers do not countenance this. They write cat in the pan, whether cate or cake be intended or not. "Perchance this turning catte in the pan, is but as he dyd in the kinge's daies." Bp. Gardiner de Obed. trans. Roan, 1553. "A subtile turning the catte in the panne, or wresting of a false thing to some purpose." Huloet's Dict.]

There is a cunning which we, in England, call the turning of the cat in the pan; which is, when that which a man says to another, he lays it as if another had said it to him. Bacon.

CAT o' nine tails. A whip with nine lashes, used for the punishment of crimes.

You dread reformers of an impious age,
You awful cat o' nine tails to the stage,
This once be just, and in our cause engage.
Prologue to Vanbrugh's False Friend.

CAT'S-PAW.* n. s. An expression of no great date or good authority in our language; but now common; as, he has been the cat's paw of the man who flattered him only to serve his own ends.

CAT-EYED.* adj. [from cat and eye.] Having eyes like a cat.

If cat-ey'd, then a Pallas is their love;
If freckled, she's a party-coloured dove.
Dryden, Lucret.

CATABA'PTIST.* n. s. [from Gr. κατὰ and βαπτίζω.] One who is against, or who abuses, Baptism.

Of these anabaptists, or catabaptists, who differ no more than Bavius and Mœvius, Alstedius maketh fourteen sorts.
Featley, Dippers Dipt, p. 23.

CATACHRE'SIS.† n. s. [κατάχρησις, abuse.] It is in rhetorick, the abuse of a trope, when the words are too far wrested from their native signification, or when one word is abusively put for another, for want of the proper word; as, a voice beautiful to the ear.
Smith's Rhetorick.

I ask — if now and then he does not offer at a catachresis — wresting and torturing a word into another meaning.
Dryden, Ess. on Dram. Poesy.

Their skill in astronomy dwindled into that, which, by a great catachresis, is called judicial astrology. Stillingfleet, Orig. Sac. i. 3.

CATACHRE'STICAL. adj. [from catachresis.] Contrary to proper use; forced; far fetched.

A catachrestical and far derived similitude it holds with men, that is, in a bifurcation.
Brown, Vulg. Err.

CATECHRE'STICALLY.* adv. [from catachrestical.] In a forced or exaggerated manner.

Where, in divers places of Holy Writ, the denunciation against groves is so express, it is frequently to be taken but catachrestically.
Evelyn, iv. § 4.

CA'TACLYSM.† n. s. [old Fr. cataclisme, from Gr. κατακλύσμος.] A deluge; an inundation; used generally for the universal deluge.

The opinion that held these cataclysms and empyroses universal, was such, as held, that it put a total consummation unto things in this lower world. Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

CA'TACOMBS.† n. s. [from κατὰ and κυμβος, a hollow or cavity. It has been pretended that the word was formerly catatombs from κατα and τυμβος, meaning a subterranean tomb. V. Morin, Dict. Etymol. Fr. and Gr. But catacombs is the true expression. See Greenhill's Art of Embalming, 1705, p. 96.] Subterraneous cavities for the burial of the dead; of which there are a great number about three miles from Rome, supposed to be the caves and cells where the primitive christians hid and assembled themselves, and where they interred the martyrs, which are accordingly visited with devotion. But, anciently, the word catacomb was only understood of the tombs of St. Peter and St. Paul.
Chambers.

On the side of Naples, are the catacombs, which must have been full of stench, if the dead bodies that lay in them were left to rot in open nitches.
Addison.

CATACOU'STICKS.* n. s. pl. [Fr. catacoustique, from Gr. κατα and ἀκουω.] The science of reflected sounds; or that part of acousticks, which considers the properties of echoes. Chambers.

We will not be out-braved thus.

Beaum. and Fl. Bonduca.

CA'TARACT.† n. s. [old Fr. cataracte, Cotgrave; from the Gr. καταρακτη, which is from καταῤῥασσω, to fall with force. The word was considered new, and as requiring explanation, by Sylvester Du Bart. 1620, p. 657.] A fall of water from on high; a shoot of water; a cascade.

Blow, winds, and crack your cheeks; rage, blow!
You cataracts and hurricanos spout,
Till you have drench'd our steeples. Shakspeare.

What if all
Her stores were open'd, and this firmament
Of hell should spout her cataracts of fire?

No sooner he, with them of man and beast
Select for life, shall in the ark be lodg'd,
And shelter'd round; but all the cataracts
Of heav'n set open, on the earth shall pour
Rain day and night. Milton, P. L.

Torrents and loud impetuous cataracts,
Through roads abrupt, and rude unfashion'd tracts,
Run down the lofty mountain's channel'd sides,
And to the vale convey their foaming tides.

Blackmore.

CA'TARACT. [In medicine.] A suffusion of the eye, when little clouds, motes, and flies, seem to float about in the air; when confirmed, the pupil of the eye is either wholly, or in part, covered, and shut up with a little thin skin, so that the light has no admittance. Quincy.

Saladine hath a yellow milk, which hath likewise much acrimony; for it cleanseth the eyes; it is good also for cataracts. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

CATA'RRH.† n. s. [old Fr. catarrhe, from the Gr. καλαῤῥέω, defluo.] A defluxion of a sharp serum from the glands about the head and throat, generally occasioned by a diminution of insensible perspiration, or cold, wherein what should pass by the skin, ouzes out upon those glands, and occasions irritations. The causes are whatsoever occasions too great a quantity of serum; whatsoever hinders the discharge by urine, and the pores of the skin. Quincy.

All fev'rous kinds,
Convulsions, epilepsies, fierce catarrhs.

Milton, P. L.

Others to catch the breeze of breathing air,
To Tusculum or Algido repair. Addison on Italy.

3. To seize any thing by pursuit.
I saw him run after a gilded butterfly, and, when he caught it, he let it go again; and after it again; and over and over he comes, and up again; and caught it again. Shakspeare, Coriol.

4. To stop any thing falling; to intercept falling.
A shepherd diverted himself with tossing up eggs, and catching them again. Spectator.

5. To ensnare; to entangle in a snare; to take or hold in a trap.
And they sent unto him certain of the Pharisees and of the Herodians, to catch him in his words.
St. Mark, xii. 13.
Catch'd with a trick? well, I must bear it patiently. Beaum. and Fl. Hum. Lieut.
These artificial methods of reasoning are more adapted to catch and entangle the mind, than to instruct and inform the understanding. Locke.

6. To receive suddenly.
The curling smoke mounts heavy from the fires,
At length it catches flame, and in a blaze expires.
Dryden.
But stopp'd for fear, thus violently driv'n,
The sparks should catch his axletree of heav'n.
Dryden.

7. To fasten suddenly upon; to seize.
The mule went under the thick boughs of a great oak, and his head caught hold of the oak.
2 Sam. xviii. 19.

Decay of Piety.

8. To seize unexpectedly.
To catch something out of his mouth, that they might accuse him. Luke, xi. 54.

9. To seize eagerly.
They have caught up every thing greedily, with that busy minute curiosity, and unsatisfactory inquisitiveness, which Seneca calls the disease of the Greeks. Pope.
I've perus'd her well;
Beauty and honour in her are so mingled,
That they have caught the king.
Shaksp. Henry VIII.

10. To please; to seize the affections; to charm.
For I am young, a novice in the trade,
The fool of love, unpractis'd to persuade,
And want the soothing arts that catch the fair.
But, caught myself, lie struggling in the snare.
Dryden.

11. To receive any contagion or disease.
I cannot name the disease, and it is caught
Of you that yet are well. Shaksp. Winter Tale.
Those measles,
Which we disdain should tetter us, yet seek
The very way to catch them. Shaksp. Coriol.
In sooth I know not why I am so sad:
It wearies me; you say it wearies you;
But how I caught it, found it, or came by it,
I am to learn. Shaksp. Merch. of Ven.
The softest of our British ladies expose their necks and arms to the open air, which the men could not do, without catching cold for want of being accustomed to it. Addison, Guardian.
Or call the winds through long arcades to roar,
Proud to catch cold at a Venetian door. Pope.

12. To catch at. To endeavour suddenly to lay hold on.
Saucy lictors
Will catch at us like strumpets, and scald rhimers
Ballad us out of tune. Shaks. Ant. and Cleop.
Make them catch at all opportunities of subverting the state. Addison, State of the War.

13. To catch as catch may. To seize indiscriminately.
Mine, or thine be nothing, all things equal,
And catch as catch may, be proclaim'd.
Beaum. and Fl. Loyal Subject.

14. To catch up. To snatch.
He was caught up into paradise, and heard unspeakable words. 2 Cor. xii. 4.
Sometimes they thought he might be only shewn,
And for a time caught up to God, as once
Moses was in the mount, and missing long.
Milton, P. R. ii. 14.

15. To catch a Tartar. To be caught in the trap one has laid for another; instead of taking an enemy, to be taken by him. The phrase is probably owing to some particular story.
In this defeat they lost about 5000 men, besides those that were taken prisoners: — so that, instead of catching the Tartar, they were catched themselves. Life of the Duke of Tyrconnel, 1689.

To CATCH. v. n.

1. To be contagious; to spread infection, or mischief.
'Tis time to give them physick, their diseases
Are grown so catching. Shaksp. Henry VIII.
Sickness is catching; oh, were favour so!
Yours would I catch, fair Hermia, ere I go.
Shakspeare.
Considering it with all its malignity and catching nature, it may be enumerated with the worst of epidemicks. Harvey.
The palace of Deiphobus ascends
In smoaky flames, and catches on his friends.
Dryden.
Does the sedition catch from man to man,
And run among the ranks? Addison, Cato.

2. To lay hold suddenly: as, the hook catches.
When the yellow hair in flame should fall,
The catching fire might burn the golden cawl.
Dryden.

CATCH. n. s. [from the verb.]

1. Seizure; the act of seizing any thing that flies, or hides.
Taught by his open eye,
His eye, that ev'n did mark her trodden grass,
That she would fain the catch of Strephon fly.
Sidney.

2. Watch; the posture of seizing.
Both of them lay upon the catch for a great action; it is no wonder, therefore, that they were often engaged on one subject.
Addison on Ancient Medals.

3. An advantage taken; hold laid on, as in haste.
All which notions are but ignorant catches of a few things, which are most obvious to men's observations. Bacon.
The motion is but a catch of the wit upon a few instances; as the manner is in the philosophy received. Bacon.
Fate of empires, and the fall of kings,
Should turn on flying hours, and catch of moments. Dryden.

4. The act of taking quickly from another.
Several quires, placed one over against another; and taking the voice by catches anthemn-wise, give great pleasure. Bacon.

5. A song sung in succession, where one catches it from another.
This is the tune of our catch, play'd by the picture of nobody. Shakspeare, Tempest.
Far be from thence the glutton parasite,
Singing his drunken catches all the night.
Dryden, jun.
The meat was serv'd, the bowls were crown'd,
Catches were sung and healths went round. Prior.

6. The thing caught; profit; advantage.
Hector shall have a great catch, if he knock out your brains; he were as good crack a fusty nut with no kernel. Shaks. Tr. and Cressida.

7. A snatch; a short interval of action.
It has been writ by catches, with many intervals. Locke.

8. A taint; a slight contagion.

CA'TCHPENNY.* n. s. [from catch and penny.] A worthless pamphlet, merely calculated to gain a little money.

CA'TCHPOLL.† n. s. [catch and poll, Dr. Johnson says; that is, seizing a person by the poll or neck. The Welsh have ceispwl for this word. The old French language "cachereau, un bailiff." Lacombe; and "chacepol, sergent préposé à la levée des impots." Roquefort. Catchpoll, though now it be used as a word of contempt, yet, in ancient times, seems to have been used without reproach, for such as we now call serjeants of the mace, or any other that uses to arrest men upon any cause. Cowel.] A serjeant; a bumbailiff.
When day was come, the magestratis senten cacchepollis, and seiden, delyvere thou the men.
Wicliffe, Acts xvi.
They call all temporal businesses undersheriffries, as if they were but matters for undersheriffs and catchpolls; though many times those undersheriffries do more good than their high speculations. Bacon, Essays.
One drop of blood
Shed from this arme is recompence enough
Though you had cut the throats of all the Catchpoles
In France, nay in the world.
Beaum. and Fl. Honest Man's Fortune.

Another monster,
Sullen of aspect, by the vulgar call'd
A catchpoll, whose polluted hands the gods,
With force incredible and magick charms,
Erst have endu'd, if he his ample palm
Should haply on ill-fated shoulder lay
Of debtor. Philips.

CA'TCHUP.* n. s. sometimes written, improperly, ketchup. A poignant liquour made from boiled mushrooms, mixed with salt; used in cookery to add a pleasant flavour to sauces.

CATE.† n. s. Food; something to be eaten. This is scarcely read in the singular, Dr. Johnson says. It is, however, to be found on good authority. See CATES.

Even the Christmas pye, which in its very nature is a kind of consecrated cate, and a badge of distinction, is often forbidden to the druid of the family. Tatler, No. 255.

We'll see what cates you have,
For soldiers stomachs always serve them well.
Shakspeare.

CATECHE'TICAL. adj. [from καθηχέω.] Consisting of questions and answers.

Socrates introduced a catachetical method of arguing; he would ask his adversary question upon question, till he convinced him out of his own mouth, that his opinions were wrong. Addison, Spectator.

CATECHE'TICALLY. adv. [from catechetical.] In the way of question and answer.

CATECHE'TICK.* adj. Catechetical.

He communicated his Practical Catechism, which for his private use he had drawn up out of those materials which he had made use of in the catechetick institution of the youth of his parish. Fell, Life of Hammond, § 1.

To CA'TECHISE.† v. a. [Gr. καθηχέω.]

1. To instruct by asking questions, and correcting the answers.

I will catechise the world for him; that is, make questions, and bid them answer. Shakspeare, Othello.

Κατηχέω is derived from ἦχω, and signifieth originally and properly catechizing, or such a kind of teaching wherein the principles of religion, or of any art or science, are often inculcated, and by sounding and resounding beat into the ears of children or novices; but yet it is taken in Holy Scripture in a larger sense, not only for catechizing of children, but instructing men of riper years in the doctrine of salvation. Featley, Dippers Dipt, p. 36.

Had those three thousand souls been catechised by our modern casuists, we had seen a wide difference. Decay of Piety.

2. To question; to interrogate; to examine; to try by interrogatories.

Why then I suck my teeth, and catechise
My piked man of countries. Shaks. K. John.

Catechise gross ignorance; purge Italy of luxury and riot. Burton, Anat. of Mel. To the Reader, p. 59.

There flies about a strange report,
Of some express arriv'd at court;
I'm stopp'd by all the fools I meet,
And catechis'd in every street. Swift.

CA'TECHISER.† n. s. [from To catechise.] One who catechises.

He that is a reader, preacher, or catechiser, Con. and Can. Eccl. § 56.

This is an admirable way of teaching, wherein the catechised will at length find delight, and by which the catechiser, if he once get the skill of it, will draw out of ignorant and silly souls even the dark and deep points of religion. Herbert, Country Parson, ch. 21.

Hark you, good Maria,
Have you got a good catechiser here? Beaum. and Fl. Tamer tamed.

CA'TECHISING.* n. s. [from the verb.] Interrogation; examination.

You must hear long-winded exercises, singings, and catechisings, which you are not given to. B. Jonson, Epicœne.

CA'TECHISM. n. s. [from κατηχίζω.] A form of instruction by means of questions and answers, concerning religion.

Ways of teaching there have been sundry always usual in God's church; for the first introduction of youth to the knowledge of God, the Jews, even till this day, have their catechisms. Hooker.

He had no catechism but the creation, needed no study but reflection, and read no book but the volume of the world. South.

CA'TECHIST. n. s. [κατηχιστής.] One whose charge is to instruct by questions, or to question the uninstructed concerning religion.

None of years and knowledge was admitted, who had not been instructed by the catechist in this foundation, which the catechist received from the bishop. Hammond, Fundam.

CATECHI'STICAL.* adj. [from catechist.] Instructing by question and answer.

S. Cyril—was the authour of those catechistical sermons or institutions which are mentioned by S. Jerome. Bp. Cosin, Canon of Scripture, § 58.

All these are short pieces; some of them are in the catechistical method. Burke, Abr. of Eng. Hist. ii. 2.

CATECHI'STICALLY.* adv. [from catechistical.] In a catechistical manner.

The principles of Christianity, briefly and catechistically taught them, is enough to save their souls. South, Serm. vii. 100.

CATECHU'MEN.† n. s. [old Fr. catechumene, from the Gr. κατηχέμενος.]

1. One who is yet in the first rudiments of christianity; the lowest order of christians in the primitive church.

The prayers of the church did not begin in St. Austin's time, till the catechumens were dismissed. Stillingfleet.

2. Generally, one who is in the first rudiments of any profession.

The same language is still held to the catechumens in Jacobitism. Bolingbroke to Windham.

CATECHUME'NICAL. adj. [from catechumen.] Belonging to the catechumens. Dict.

CATECHU'MENIST.* n. s. The same as catechumen.

Hence their forenamed authors assume, that the children of the faithfull dying without baptisme, may be thought to receive the baptisme of the spirit, as well as those catechumenists spoken of, &c. Bp. Morton, Catholick Appeale, p. 248.

CATEGO'RICAL.† adj. [from category, old Fr. categorique. Cotgrave.] Absolute; adequate; positive; equal to the thing to be expressed.

The king's commissioners desired to know whether the parliament's commissioners did believe, that bishops were unlawful? They could never obtain a categorical answer. Clarendon.

A single proposition, which is also categorical, may be divided again into simple and complex. Watts, Logick.

CATEGO'RICALLY.† adv. [from categorical.]

1. Directly; expressly.

We must not look, from them, for either discourses, or demonstrations, or positions, directly and categorically to this purpose. Fotherby, Atheom. p. 295.

2. Positively; plainly.

I dare affirm, and that categorically, in all parts where-ever trade is great, and continues so, that trade must be nationally profitable, Child's Discourses of Trade.

CA'TEGORY. n. s. [Gr. καθηγορία.] A class; a rank: an order of ideas; a predicament.

The absolute infinitude, in a manner, quite changes the nature of beings, and exalts them into a different category. Cheyne.

CATENA'RIAN. adj. [from catena, Lat.] Relating to a chain; resembling a chain.

In geometry, the catenarian curve is formed by a rope or chain, hanging freely between two points of suspension. Harris.

The back is bent after the manner of the catenarian curve, by which it obtains that curvature that is safest for the included marrow. Cheyne, Philosophical Principles.

To CA'TENATE.† v. a. [from catena, Lat.] To chain. Cockeram.

CATENA'TION. n. s. [from catena, Lat.] Link; regular connexion.

This catenation, or conserving union, whenever his pleasure shall divide, let go, or separate, they shall fall from their existence. Brown, Vulg. Err.

To CA'TER. v. n. [from cate.] To provide food; to buy in victuals.

He that doth the ravens feed,
Yea providently caters for the sparrow,
Be comfort to my age. Shakspeare, As you like it.

CA'TER.† n. s. [from the verb.] Provider; collector of provisions, or victuals: misprinted perhaps for caterer, Dr. Johnson says; and abbreviated from acater, old English, according to Mr. Mason. Both are mistaken. There are few substantives more frequent in our ancient language than cater. "A cater, or purveyor of victuals," Huloet's Dict. "Cater, a steward, manciple, provider of meats," Barret's Alv. "A cater, Fr. despenseur," Sherwood's Fr. and Eng. Dict.

We call to witness of their fastings, and great pains they take for the church, their faces and bellies, their katers, butlers, and cooks. Harmar, Tr. of Beza's Serm. p. 377.

Your meat should be both neat, and cleanly handled.
See, Sweet, I am cook myself, and mine own cater. Beaum. and Fl. Women pleas'd.

A lady's dainty hand,
Th' ambitious cater of her own delight,
Had curiously rais'd an antick band
Of banquet powers. Beaumont's Psyche, iv. 127.

The servant for employment; the cater for the provision, and the cook of the provision. Austin's Hæc Homo, p. 116.

The oysters dredged in this Lyner, find a welcomer acceptance, where the taste is cater for the stomach, than those of the Tamar. Carew, Survey of Cornwall.

CA'TER. n. s. [quatre, Fr.] The four of cards and dice.

CA'TER-COUSIN. n. s. A corruption of quatre-cousin, from the ridiculousness of calling cousin or relation to so remote a degree.

His master and he, saving your worship's reverence, are scarce cater-cousins.
Shakspeare, Merch. of Ven.

Poetry and reason, how come these to be cater-cousins? Rymer, Tragedies of the last Age.

CA'TERER. n. s. [from cater.] One employed to select and buy in provisions for the family; the providore or purveyor.

Let no scent offensive the chamber infest;
Let fancy, not cost, prepare all our dishes;
Let the caterer mind the taste of each guest,
And the cook, in his dressing, comply with their wishes. B. Jonson, Tavern Academy.

He made the greedy ravens to be Elias's caterers, and bring him food. King Charles.

Seldom shall one see in cities or courts that athletick vigour which is seen in poor houses, where nature is their cook, and necessity their caterer. South.

CA'TERESS. n. s. [from cater.] A woman employed to cater, or provide victuals.

Impostor! do not charge most innocent nature,
As if she would her children should be riotous
With her abundance! she, good cateress,
Means her provision only to the good.
Milton, Comus.

CA'TERPILLAR. n. s. [This word Skinner and Minsheu are inclined to derive from chatte peluse, a weasel; it seems easily deducible from cates, food, and piller, Fr. to rob; the animal that eats up the fruits of the earth.]

1. A worm, which, when it gets wings, is sustained by leaves and fruits.

The caterpillar breedeth of dew and leaves; for we see infinite caterpillars breed upon trees and hedges, by which the leaves of the trees or hedges are consumed. Bacon.

Auster is drawn with a pot pouring forth water, with which descend grasshoppers, caterpillars, and creatures bred by moisture. Peacham on Drawing.

2. Any thing voracious and useless.

CA'TERPILLAR. [n. s. [scorpioides, Lat.] The name of a plant. Miller.

To CA'TERWAUL.† v. n. [from cat and wawl, to howl. Formerly written caterwaw by Chaucer, and revived by Pope.]

1. To make a noise as cats in rutting time.

She licks her fair round face, and frisks abroad,
To shew her fur, and to be caterwaw'd. Pope.

2. To make any offensive or odious noise.

What a caterwauling do you keep here? If my lady has not called up her steward Malvolio, and bid him turn you out of doors, never trust me.
Shakspeare, Tw. Night.

Was no dispute between
The caterwauling brethren. Hudibras.

CA'TERY.* n. s. The depository of victuals purchased. "Serjeaunt de l'acaterie, serjeant of the catery."
Kelham, Norm. Dict.

CATES.† n. s. [Skinner imagines it may be corrupted from delicate; which is not likely, because Junius observes that the Dutch have kater in the same sense with our cater. It has no singular, Dr. Johnson says. I have shewn that it has. And the etymology is rather from the old Fr. acat. See ACATES.] Viands; food; dish of meat: generally employed to signify nice and luxurious food.

The fair acceptance, Sir, creates
The entertainment perfect, not the cates.
B. Jonson.

O wasteful riot, never well content
With low priz'd fare; hunger ambitious
Of cates by land and sea far fetcht and sent. Ralegh.

Alas, how simple to these cates compar'd
Was that crude apple that diverted Eve!
Milton, P. L.

They by th' alluring odour drawn in haste
Fly to the dulcet cates, and crouding sip
Their palatable bane. Philips.

With costly cates she stain'd her frugal board,
Then with ill-gotten wealth she bought a lord.
Arbuthnot.

CA'TFISH. n. s. The name of a sea-fish in the West Indies; so called from its round head and large glaring eyes, by which they are discovered in hollow rocks. Philips.

CA'TGUT.* n. s.

1. A string for fiddles and other instruments, made of the intestines of animals.
2. A species of linen or canvass with wide interstices.

CA'THARIST.* n. s. [from the Gr. καθαρος, pure.] One who holds himself more pure than others; one whom Coles denominates a puritan. It is indeed a name that has been usurped by sectarists at various periods.

They whom they called in ancient times Catharists as also the Donatists,—make good proof hereof. Harmar, Tr. of Beza's Serm. p. 88.

Catharists—deny children baptism, affirming that they have no original sin, and pretending themselves to be pure and without sin.
Pagitt's Heresiography, p. 28.

CA'THARPINGS. n. s. Small ropes in a ship, running in little blocks from one side of the shrouds to the other, near the deck; they belong only to the main shrouds; and their use is to force the shrouds tight, for the ease and safety of the masts, when the ship rolls. Harris.

CATHA'RTICAL.† adj. [Fr. cathartique, from the Gr. καθαρτικὸς.] Purgative.

Quicksilver precipitated either with gold, or without addition, into a powder, is wont to be strongly enough cathartical, though the chymists have not proved, that either gold or mercury hath any salt, much less any that is purgative.
Boyle, Sceptical Chemistry.

CATHA'RTICALNESS. n. s. [from cathartical.] Purging quality.

CATHA'RTICK.* adj. Purgative.

CATHA'RTICKS. n. s. Purging medicines. The vermicular or peristaltick motion of the guts continually helps on their contents from the pylorus to the rectum: and every irritation either quickens that motion in its natural order, or occasions some little inversions in it. In both, what but slightly adheres to the coats will be loosened, and they will be more agitated, and thus rendered more fluid. By this only it is manifest, how a cathartick hastens and increases the discharges by stool; but where the force of the stimulus is great, all the appendages of the bowels, and all the viscera in the abdomen, will be twitched; by which a great deal will be drained back into the intestines, and made a part of what they discharge. Quincy.

Lustrations and catharticks of the mind were sought for, and all endeavour used to calm and regulate the fury of the passions. Decay of Piety.

The piercing causticks ply their spiteful power,
Emeticks ranch, and keen catharticks scour.
Garth.

Plato has called mathematical demonstrations the catharticks or purgatives of the soul.
Addison, Spectator.

CA'THEAD. n. s. A kind of fossil.

The nodules with leaves in them, called catheads, seem to consist of a sort of iron stone, not unlike that which is found in the rocks near Whitehaven in Cumberland, where they call them catscaups.
Woodward on Fossils.

CA'THEAD. n. s. [In a ship.] A piece of timber with two shivers at one end, having a rope and a block, to which is fastened a great iron hook, to trice up the anchor from the hawse to the top of the forecastle. Sea Dict.

CATHE'DRAL.† adj. [from the Gr. καθέδρα; whence the Lat. cathedra, a chair of authority; an epicopal see; Fr. cathedrale.]

1. Episcopal; containing the see of a bishop.

A cathedral church is that wherein there are two or more persons, with a bishop at the head of them, that do make as it were one body politick.
Ayliffe, Parergon.

Methought I sat in seat of majesty
In the cathedral church of Westminster.
Shakspeare, Hen. VI.

2. Belonging to an episcopal church.

His constant and regular assisting at the cathedral service was never interrupted by the sharpness of weather. Locke.

3. In low phrase, antique; venerable; old. This seems to be the meaning in the following lines of Pope, Dr. Johnson says; but cathedral here perhaps, as in the second example from Blackstone, means resembling the aisles of a cathedral, in allusion to the Gothick style of building.

Here aged trees cathedral walks compose,
And mount the hill in venerable rows;
There the green infants in their beds are laid.
Pope.

And aged elms with awful bend
In long cathedral walks extend.
Sir W. Blackstone, Law. Farew. to his Muse.

4. Having authority; displaying authority.

Since rulers now do by counsel their great actions, and assume others to advise with them, their personal errours are drowned in their cathedral abilities, which can neither do, nor ought to receive wrong.
Waterhouse's Apol. for Learning, 1653, p. 11.

CATHE'DRAL. n. s. The head church of a diocese.

There is nothing in Leghorn so extraordinary as the cathedral, which a man may view with pleasure, after he has seen St. Peter's.
Addison on Italy.

CA'THEDRATED.* adj. [from the Lat. cathedra.] Relating to the authority of the chair, or office, of a teacher. In Spain, a cathedratick doctor [catedratico] is a well-known phrase.

If his reproof be private, or with the cathedrated authority of a prælector or publick reader.
Whitlock, Manners of the Eng. p. 385.

CA'THERINE PEAR. See PEAR.

For streaks of red were mingled there,
Such as are on a Catherine pear,
The side that's next the sun. Suckling.

CA'THETER.† n. s. [Gr. καθετὴρ, from καθίημι, to introduce.] A hollow and somewhat crooked instrument, to thrust into the bladder, to assist in bringing away the urine, when the passage is stopped by a stone or gravel.

A large clyster, suddenly injected, hath frequently forced the urine out of the bladder; but if it fail, a catheter must help you.

Wiseman's Surgery.

CA'THOLES. n. s. [In a ship.] Two little holes astern above the gun-room ports, to bring in a cable or hawser through them to the capstain, when there is occasion to heave the ship astern.

Sea Dict.

CATHO'LICAL.* adj. [Gr. καθόλικος, Lat. catholicus.] General.

These catholical nativities were so much believed by the ancient kings, saith Haly, that they enquired into the genitures of the principal nati under their dominions. Gregory's Works, p. 31.

Thou the head shalt be o'er all:
Have I not sworn thee king, true king catholicall?

More, Song of the Soul, i. 37.

CATHO'LICISM.† n. s. [Fr. catholicisme.]

1. Adherence to the catholick church. This is all which Dr. Johnson offers on this sense of the word, without any example. Adherence to a part of the catholick church is shewn in the following example.

Though they conform to the Roman catholick mode of worship, they are looked upon in the light of unbelievers; but — all the gipsies I have conversed with, assured me of their sound catholicism.

Swinburne, Travels through Spain, Lett. 29.

2. Universality, or the orthodox faith of the whole church, called catholick, that is, universal.

There is a church which is holy, and which is catholick; and I understand that church alone, which is both catholick and holy; and, being this holiness and catholicism are but affections of this church which I believe, I must first declare what is the nature and notion of the church, &c.

Pearson on the Creed, Art. 9.

Near akin to their notion of church-authority, is that of catholicism. — A particular church, indeed, may be catholick in one sense, i. e. true, sound, and pure, and holding the catholick doctrine; but not catholick, i. e. universal. To say Roman-Catholick therefore, as they [the Papists] mean it, is to say part-whole; which is a contradiction. The church of Rome, notwithstanding her boasts, is but a part of the catholick church.

Trapp, Popery truly stated, i. § 2.

To CATHO'LICISE.* v. n. To catholicise it; to play the catholick; to become a catholick. Cotgrave in V. Catholizer.

CA'THOLICK.† adj. [catholique, Fr. καθόλικος, universal or general.]

1. The church of Jesus Christ is called catholick, because it extends throughout the world, and is not limited by time.

Catholick signifieth not the Romish church: it signifieth the consent of all true teaching churches of all times, and all ages.

Rogers, in Foxe's Acts and Monuments, 1555.

2. Some truths are said to be catholick, because they are received by all the faithful.

3. Catholick is often set in opposition to heretick or sectary, and to schismatick.

4. Catholick, or canonical epistles, are seven in number; that of St. James, two of St. Peter, three of St. John, and that of St. Jude. They are called catholick, because they are directed to all the faithful, and not to any particular church; and canonical, because they contain excellent rules of faith and morality. Calmet.

5. General, in the common sense.

We observe the Fathers to use the word catholick for nothing else but general or universal, in the ordinary or vulgar sense; as the catholick resurrection is the resurrection of all men; the catholick opinion, the opinion of all men.

Pearson on the Creed, Art. 9.

Doubtless the success of those your great and catholick endeavours will promote the empire of man over nature, and bring plentiful accession of glory to your nation. Glanville, Scepsis.

Those systems undertake to give an account of the formation of the universe, by mechanical hypotheses of matter, moved either uncertainly, or according to some catholick laws. Ray.

CA'THOLICK.* n. s. Usually applied to a papist; a Roman Catholick.

What two or three as good catholicks as the other deny. Bp. Taylor, Diss. against Popery, ch. 1. § 1.

The unceasing and undisguised efforts of the catholicks to prejudice Reformed Religion.

Bp. Huntingford, Charge.

CA'THOLICKLY.* adv. [from catholick.] Generally.

No druggist of the soul bestow'd on all
So catholickly a curing cordiall.

Sir L. Cary, Elegy on the death of Donne.

CA'THOLICKNESS.* n. s. [from catholick.] Universality.

One may judge of the catholickness, which Romanists brag of, and challenge on two accounts.

Brevint, Saul and Samuel at Endor, p. 10.

CATHO'LICON. n. s. [from catholick, καθόλικον ἰαμα.] An universal medicine.

Preservation against that sin, is the contemplation of the last judgment. This is indeed a catholicon against all; but we find it particularly applied by St. Paul to judging and despising our brethren. Government of the Tongue.

CA'TILINISM.* n. s. An old substantive in our language for conspiracy, from Catiline the conspirator against his own country. [Fr. catilinisme.]

Cotgrave, and Coles.

CA'TKINS. n. s. [kattekens, Dutch. In botany.] An assemblage of imperfect flowers hanging from trees, in manner of a rope or cat's tail; serving as male blossoms, or flowers of the trees, by which they are produced. Chambers.

CA'TLIKE. adj. [from cat and like.] Like a cat.

A lioness, with udders all drawn dry,
Lay couching head on ground, with catlike watch.

Shakspeare.

CA'TLING. n. s.

1. A dismembering knife, used by surgeons. Harris.

2. It seems to be used by Shakspeare for catgut; the materials of fiddle strings.

What musick there will be in him after Hector has knocked out his brains, I know not. But, I am sure, none; unless the fidler Apollo get his sinews to make catlings of. Shakspeare.

3. The down or moss growing about walnut trees, resembling the hair of a cat. Harris.

CA'TMINT.† n. s. [Sax. cattermint, cataria, Lat.] The name of a plant. Miller.

CATO'NIAN.* adj. [An old English adjective, meaning what resembles the manners of Cato. Fr. Catonien. Cotgrave.] Grave; severe. Dict.

CATO'PTER.* } n. s. [Gr. κάτοπτρον.] A
CATO'PTRON. } kind of optick glass; an optical instrument. Dict.

CATO'PTRICAL. adj. [from catoptricks.] Relating to catoptricks, or vision by reflection.

A catoptrical or dioptrical heat is superior to any, vitrifying the hardest substances.

Arbuthnot on Air.

CATO'PTRICKS.† n. s. [Fr. catoptrique, from the Gr. κατοπτρον, a looking glass.] That part of opticks which treats of vision by reflection.

To see strange uncouth sights by catoptricks.

Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 210.

CA'TPIPE. n. s. [from cat and pipe.] The same with catcal; an instrument that makes a squeaking noise.

Some songsters can no more sing in any chamber but their own, than some clerks can read in any book but their own; put them out of their road once, and they are mere catpipes and dunces.

L'Estrange.

CAT'S-EYE. n. s. A stone.

Cat's-eye is of a glistering grey, interchanged with a straw colour. Woodward on Fossils.

CAT'S-FOOT. n. s. An herb; the same with alehoof, or ground-ivy; which see.

CAT'S-HEAD. n. s. A kind of apple.

Cat's-head, by some called the go-no-further, is a very large apple, and a good bearer.

Mortimer's Husbandry.

CA'TSILVER. n. s. A kind of fossile.

Catsilver is composed of plates that are generally plain and parallel, and that are flexible and elastick; and is of three sorts, the yellow or golden, the white or silvery, and the black.

Woodward on Fossils.

CATS-TAIL. n. s.

1. A long round substance that grows in winter upon nut trees, pines, &c.

2. A kind of reed which bears a spike like the tail of a cat.

Philips's World of Words.

CA'TSUP. n. s. A kind of Indian pickles, imitated by pickled mushrooms. See CATCHUP.

And for our home-bred British cheer,
Botargo, catsup, and cavier. Swift.

CA'TTLE.† n. s. [a word of very common use, but of doubtful or unknown etymology. It is derived by Skinner, Menage, and Spelman, from capitalia, quæ ad caput pertinent; personal goods: in which sense chattels is yet used in our law. Mandeville uses catele for price. The old Fr. catal means moveables of any kind. Kelham, Norm. Dict. But see CHATTEL. A learned friend informs me, that chattail is a provincial term about Lyons in France for all the beasts of every kind that are on an estate.]

1. Beasts of pasture; not wild nor domestick.

Make poor men's cattle break their necks.

Shakspeare.

And God made the beast of the earth after his kind, and cattle after their kind, and every thing that creepeth upon the earth after his kind.

Gen. i. 25.

2. It is used in reproach of human beings.

Boys and women are for the most part cattle of this colour. Shakspeare, As you like it.

CAVALCA'DE.† n. s. [old Fr. cavalcade, "a riding or a road of horse, whence faire la cavalcade, to course or range up and down on horseback." Cotgrave. It is from the Ital. cavalcare; low Lat. caballicare, from caballus; whence also the Span. cabalgar.] A procession on horseback.

Your cavalcade the fair spectators view,
From their high standings, yet look up to you:
From your brave train each singles out a ray,
And longs to date a conquest from your day.
Dryden.

How must the heart of the old man rejoice, when he saw such a numerous cavalcade of his own raising? Addison.

CAVALI'ER.† n. s. [cavalier, Fr.]

1. A horseman; a knight.

It is reported, that Taliacotius had at one time in his house twelve German counts, nineteen French marquesses, and a hundred Spanish cavaliers. Tatler, No. 260.

2. A gay sprightly military man.

For who is he, whose chin is but enrich'd
With one appearing hair, that will not follow
These cull'd and choice drawn cavaliers to France?
Shakspeare, Henry VIII.

Sedition cometh of tyranny, insolency, or mutinous disposition of certain captains, cavaliers, or ringleaders of the people.
Ralegh, Arts of Empire, p. 101.

3. The appellation of the party of King Charles the First; so called from the gaiety which they affected in opposition to the sour faction of the parliament.

Each party grows proud of that appellation, which their adversaries at first intend as a reproach: of this sort were the Guelfs and Gibelines, Huguenots and Cavaliers. Swift.

4. In fortification, a mount or elevation of earth, raised in a fortress, to lodge cannon for scouring the field, and to overlook and command all around the place.

Our casemates, cavaliers, and counterscarps,
Are well survey'd by all our engineers.
Heywood's Four P. Reed's Old Plays.

CAVALI'ER. adj. [from the substantive.]

1. Gay; sprightly; warlike.

2. Generous; brave.

The people are naturally not valiant, and not much cavalier. Now it is the nature of cowards to hurt, where they can receive none. Suckling.

3. Disdainful; haughty.

CAVALI'ERLY.† adv. [from cavalier.] Haughtily; arrogantly; disdainfully.

Several writers, who profess to believe the Christian religion, treat Moses and his dispensation so cavalierly, that one would suspect they thought the abandoning him could have no consequences destructive of Christianity. Warburton, Alliance of Ch. and State, (1st edit.) p. 157.

He [Warburton] very cavalierly tells us, that these notes were among the amusements of his younger years.
Edwards, Canons of Criticism, Pref. p. 9.

CAVALI'ERNESS.* n. s. [from cavalier.] Haughty or disdainful conduct.

CA'VALRY.† n. s. [cavalerie, Fr. Formerly written, like the French word, in four syllables. "These regiments and cavallery were contented to enter Holland," Sir R. Williams, Actions of the Low Countries, p. 113.] Horse troops; bodies of men furnished with horses for war.

If a state run most to gentlemen, and the husbandmen and plowmen be but as their workfolks, you may have a good cavalry, but never good stable bands of foot. Bacon, Henry VII.

Their cavalry, in the battle of Blenheim, could not sustain the shock of the British horse.
Addison on the War.

To CA'VATE. v. a. [cavo, Lat.] To hollow out; to dig into a hollow.

CAVA'ZION. n. s. [from cavo, Lat. In architecture.] The hollowing or underdigging of the earth for cellarage; allowed to be the sixth part of the height of the whole building. Phillips.

CA'UDAL.* adj. [from the Lat. cauda.] Relating to the tail of an animal.

The tail, instead of scuta, is furnished with sub-caudal squamæ, which are counted not singly, but by pairs. Russell on Indian Serpents.

CA'UDATE.* } adj. [Lat. caudatus.] Hav-
CAUDA'TED. } ing a tail; tailed.

How comate, caudate, crinite stars are fram'd,
I know. Fairfax, Tasso.

CA'UDEBECK, n. s. A sort of light hats, so called from a town in France where they were first made. Phillips.

CA'UDLE. n. s. [chaudeau, Fr.] A mixture of wine and other ingredients, given to women in childbed, and sick persons.

Ye shall have a hempen caudle then, and the help of a hatchet. Shakspeare, Henry VI.

He had good broths, caudle, and such like; and I believe he did drink some wine.
Wiseman, Surgery.

To CA'UDLE. v. a. [from the noun.] To make caudle; to mix as caudle.

Will the cold brook,
Candied with ice, caudle thy morning toast,
To cure thy o'ernight's surfeit? Shakspeare, Timon.

CAVE.† n. s. [Fr. cave, Lat. cavea, from cavus, hollow; which is from the Gr. χάος, Eolick χαFος, chavus. V. Morin, Etym. Dict. Fr. and Gr.]

1. A cavern; a den; a hole entering horizontally under the ground; a habitation in the earth.

The wrathful skies
Gallow the very wand'rers of the dark,
And make them keep their caves.
Shakspeare, King Lear.

Bid him bring his power
Before sun-rising, lest his son George fall
Into the blind cave of eternal night.
Shakspeare, Rich. III.

They did square, and carve, and polish their stone and marble works, even in the very cave of the quarry. Wotton.

Through this a cave was dug with vast expence,
The work it seem'd of some suspicious prince.
Dryden.

2. Hollow; any hollow place. Not used.

The object of sight doth strike upon the pupil of the eye directly; whereas the cave of the ear doth hold off the sound a little. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

To CAVE. v. n. [from the noun.] To dwell in a cave.

Such as we
Cave here, haunt here, are outlaws. Shaksp.

To CAVE.* v. a. [Fr. caver, to hollow, Cotgrave; from the Lat, cavare.] To make hollow.

Under a steep hill's side it placed was,
There where the mouldred earth had cav'd the bank.
Spenser, F. Q. iv. v. 38.

CA'VEAT. n. s. [caveat, Lat. let him beware.] Intimation of caution.

A caveat is an intimation given to some ordinary or ecclesiastical judge by the act of man, notifying to him, that he ought to beware how he acts in such or such an affair. Ayliffe.

The chiefest caveat in reformation must be to keep out the Scots. Spenser on Ireland.

I am in danger of commencing poet, perhaps laureat; pray desire Mr. Rowe to enter a caveat.
Trumball to Pope.

CA'VERN.† n. s. [old Fr. caverne, from caverna, Lat.] A hollow place in the ground.

Where wilt thou find a cavern dark enough
To mask thy monstrous visage?
Shakspeare, Julius Cæsar.

Monsters of the foaming deep,
From the deep ooze, and gelid cavern rous'd,
They flounce and tremble in unwieldy joy.
Thomson.

CA'VERNED. adj. [from cavern.]

1. Full of caverns; hollow; excavated.

Embattled troops, with flowing banners, pass
Through flow'ry meads, delighted; nor distrust
The smiling surface; whilst the cavern'd ground
Bursts fatal, and involves the hopes of war
In fiery whirles. Philips.

High at his head from out the cavern'd rock,
In living rills a gushing fountain broke.
Pope's Odyssey.

2. Inhabiting a cavern.

No bandit fierce, no tyrant mad with pride,
No cavern'd hermit, rest self-satisfy'd. Pope.

CA'VERNOUS. adj. [from cavern.] Full of caverns.

No great damages are done by earthquakes, except only in those countries which are mountainous, and consequently stony and cavernous underneath. Woodward, Nat. History.

CAVE'SSON. n. s. [Fr. In horsemanship.] A sort of noseband, sometimes made of iron, and sometimes of leather or wood; sometimes flat, and sometimes hollow or twisted; which is put upon the nose of a horse, to forward the suppling and breaking of him.

An iron cavesson saves and spares the mouths of young horses when they are broken; for, by the help of it, they are accustomed to obey the hand, and to bend the neck and shoulders, without hurting their mouths, or spoiling their bars with the bit. Farrier's Dict.

CAUF.† n. s. [perhaps from the Lat. cavus, hollow.] A chest with holes in the top, to keep fish alive in the water.
Phillips, World of Words.

CAUGHT. particip. pass. [from To catch; which see.]

CAVIA'RE.† n. s. [the etymology uncertain, unless it come from garum, Lat. sauce, or pickle, made of fish salted, Dr. Johnson says. It is adopted from the Barb. or Vulg. Græc. καβιάρι, or καυιάρι, which signifies the same thing. In Italian, it is caviale, and in old Fr. cavial.]

Sturgeons, the roe of which makes caviare.
Sir T. Herbert, Trav. p. 187.

There's a fishmonger's boy with Caviar, Sir.
Beaum and Fl. Elder Brother.

He doth learn to make strange sauces, to eat anchovies, maccaroni, and caviare, because he loves 'em. B. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels.

Certain of our merchants having seized upon a hundred butts of caviare in the vessel called the Swallow, riding in the downs.
Milton, State-Letters.

The eggs of a sturgeon being salted, and made up into a mass, were first brought from Constantinople by the Italians, and called caviare.
Grew, Museum.

CAVI'ER. n. s. A corruption of caviare. See CATSUP.

To CA'VIL.† v. n. [caviller, Fr. cavillari, Lat.] To raise captious and frivolous objections. Formerly to mock, or scoff. Huloet's Dict. See CAVILLATION.

I'll give thrice so much land
To any well deserving friend;
But, in the way of bargain, mark ye me,
I'll cavil on the ninth part of a hair.
Shakspeare, Henry IV.

My lord, you do not well, in obstinacy
To cavil in the course of this contract.
Shakspeare, Henry VI.

He cavils first at the poet's insisting so much upon the effects of Achilles's rage.
Pope, Notes on the Iliad.

To CA'VIL. v. a. To receive or treat with objections.

Thou didst accept them: wilt thou enjoy the good,
Then cavil the conditions? Milton, P. L.

CA'VIL. n. s. [from the verb.] False or frivolous objections.

Wiser men consider how subject the best things have been unto cavil, when wits, possessed with disdain, have set them up as their mark to shoot at. Hooker.

Several divines, in order to answer the cavils of those adversaries to truth and morality, began to find out farther explanations. Swift.

CAVILLA'TION.† n. s. [old Fr. cavillation, or cavellation, "finesse, ruse, subtilité, adresse." Lacombe; and in our old language, it formerly meant a merry taunt, a subtile forged tale. Huloet's Dict. Lat. cavillatio.] The disposition to make captious objections; the practice of objecting.

It is now necessary to make answere to the subtyll persuasions and sophisticall cavillations of the Papistes. Abp. Cranmer, Doct. of the Sacrament, (1550), fol. 112.

They shall not thereby picke any matter of cavillation against us.
Martin, Marriage of Priests, (1554,) S. i.

Persuading themselves, by cavillations and sophistications, to excuse the impiety of their false oaths. Ralegh, Arts of Empire, p. 69.

I am resolved, when I come to my answer, not to trick my innocency (as I writ to the lords) by cavillations or voidances. Bacon, to K. James I.

I might add so much concerning the large odds between the case of the eldest churches, in regard of heathens, and ours, in respect of the church of Rome, that very cavillation itself should be satisfied. Hooker.

CA'VILLER.† n. s. [cavillator, Lat.] Formerly a mocker. See CAVILLATION. One fond of making objections; an unfair adversary; a captious disputant.

Socrates held all philosophers, cavillers and madmen. Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 167.

The candour which Horace shews, is that which distinguishes a critick from a caviller; he declares, that he is not offended at little faults, which may be imputed to inadvertency. Addison, Guardian.

There is, I grant, room still left for a caviller to misrepresent my meaning.
Atterbury, Pref. to his Sermons.

CA'VILLING.* n. s. [from cavil.] Dispute; captious objection.

These, many times, instead of convincing the judgements of sober persons, fall to cavillings and menacings. Bp. Taylor, Artif. Handsom. p. 66.

CA'VILLINGLY.† adv. [from cavilling.] In a cavilling manner. Sherwood.

CA'VILLINGNESS.* n. s. [from cavilling.] The disposition to cavil.

CA'VILLOUS.† adj. [old Fr. cavilleux.] Unfair in argument; full of objections.

Those persons are said to be cavillous and unfaithful advocates, by whose fraud and iniquity justice is destroyed. Ayliffe.

CA'VILLOUSLY.* adv. [from cavillous.] In a cavillous manner.

Since that so cavillously is urged against us.
Milton, Art. of Peace between the E. of Orm. and the Irish.

CA'VIN. n. s. [French. In the military art.] A natural hollow, fit to cover a body of troops, and consequently facilitate their approach to a place. Dict.

CA'VITY.† n. s. [old Fr. cavité, from cavitas, Latin.] Hollowness; hollow; hollow place.

The vowels are made by a free passage of breath, vocalized through the cavity of the mouth; the said cavity being differently shaped by the postures of the throat, tongue, and lips.
Holder, Elements of Speech.

There is nothing to be left void in a firm building; even the cavities ought not to be filled with rubbish, which is of a perishing kind.
Dryden, Dedication to Æneid.

Materials packed together with wonderful art in the several cavities of the scull.
Addison, Spectator.

An instrument with a small cavity, like a small spoon, dipt in oil, may fetch out the stone.
Arbuthnot on Diet.

If the atmosphere was reduced into water, it would not make an orb above thirty-two feet deep, which would soon be swallowed up by the cavity of the sea, and the depressed parts of the earth.
Bentley.

CAUK. n. s. A coarse talky spar.
Woodward.

CA'UKY. adj. [from cauk.] A white, opaque, cauky spar, shot or pointed.
Woodward on Fossils.

CAUL.† n. s. [of uncertain etymology.]

1. The net in which women inclose their hair; the hinder part of a woman's cap.

Ne spared they to strip her naked all,
Then when they had despoil'd her tire and caul,
Such as she was, their eyes might her behold.
Spenser.

Her head with ringlets of her hair is crown'd,
And in a golden caul the curls are bound.
Dryden's Æneid.

2. Any kind of small net.

An Indian mantle of feathers, and the feathers wrought into a caul of packthread. Grew, Musæum.

3. The omentum; the integument in which the guts are inclosed.

The caul serves for the warming the lower belly, like an apron or piece of woollen cloth. Hence a certain gladiatour, whose caul Galen cut out, was so liable to suffer cold, that he kept his belly constantly covered with wool. Ray.

The beast they then divide, and disunite
The ribs and limbs, observant of the rite:
On these, in double cauls involv'd with art,
The choicest morsels lay. Pope's Odyssey.

4. The little membrane found on some children, encompassing the head, when born; esteemed an infallible preservative against drowning, and also medical in some diseases! It is thought a good omen to the child itself; and the vulgar belief is, that whoever obtains it by purchase will be fortunate. It is an old superstition, which keeps its ground to this day; for, while this account was passing my eye, I observed more than one advertisement of cauls to be sold in the newspapers. The credulous seamen are yet said to be purchasers!

You were born with a caul on your head.
B. Jonson, Alchymist.

If a child be borne with a cawle on his head, he shall be very fortunate.
Melton's Astrologaster, p. 45.

A person possessed of a caul, may know the state of health of the party who was born with it: if alive and well, it is firm and crisp; if dead or sick, relaxed and flaccid!
Grose's Popular Superstitions.

CA'ULET.* n. s. [Celt. and old Fr. caul; old Fr. caulet also, a kind of cabbage; Lat. caulis.] Colewort, pronounced in many places collet; as cauliflower is colliflower. See COLE and COLEWORT.

CAULI'FEROUS. adj. [from caulis, a stalk, and fero, to bear, Lat.] A term in botany for such plants as have a true stalk, which a great many have not.

CA'ULIFLOWER.† n. s. [from caulis, Lat. the stalk of a plant. So Dr. Johnson says; and under colliflower observes, that cauliflower is the right word. But see COLLIFLOWER.] A species of cabbage.

Towards the end of the month, earth up your winter plants and salad herbs; and plant forth your cauliflowers and cabbage, which were sown in August. Evelyn's Kalendar.

To CAULK. See To CALK.

To CA'UPONATE. v. n. [cauponor, Lat.] To keep a victualling-house; to sell wine or victuals. Dict.

To CA'UPONISE.* v. n. [from the Lat. cauponor.] To sell wine or victuals.

I call your virtues unaccountable, as I do the wealth of our rich rogues, who cauponised to the armies in Germany in this last war.
Warburton to Hurd, Lett. 171.

CA'USABLE. adj. [from causo, low Lat.] That may be caused, or effected by a cause.

That may be miraculously effected in one, which is naturally causable in another.
Brown, Vulgar Errours.

CA'USAL. adj. [causalis, low Lat.] Relating to causes; implying or containing causes.

Every motion owning a dependence on prerequired motors, we can have no true knowledge of any, except we would distinctly pry into the whole method of causal concatenations.
Glanville, Scepsis Scientifica.

Causal propositions are, where two propositions are joined by causal particles; as, houses were not built, that they might be destroyed; Rehoboam was unhappy, because he followed evil counsel.
Watts's Logick.

CAUSA'LITY. n. s. [causalitas, low Latin.] The agency of a cause; the quality of causing.

As he created all things, so is he beyond and in them all, in his very essence, as being the soul of their causalities, and the essential cause of their existences. Brown, Vulgar Errours.

By an unadvised transiliency from the effect to the remotest cause, we observe not the connection, through the interposal of more immediate causalities. Glanville, Scepsis.

CA'USALLY. adv. [from causal.] According to the order or series of causes.

Thus may it more be causally made out, what Hippocrates affirmeth. Brown, Vulgar Errours.

CAUSA'TION. n. s. [from causo, low Lat.] The act or power of causing.

Thus doth he sometimes delude us in the conceits of stars and meteors, besides their allowable actions, ascribing effects thereunto of independent causation. Brown, Vulgar Errours.

CA'USATIVE.† adj.

1. [A term in grammar.] That expresses a cause or reason.

Let any Hebrew reader judge whether pihel can properly be said, in general, to augment the signification, or hiphel to be causative.

Student, ii. 308.

2. That effects as an agent.
It appeareth to be one of the essential forms of things, as that, that is causative in nature of a number of effects. Bacon on Learning.
The notion of a Deity doth expressly signify a being or nature of infinite perfection; of a nature or being which consisteth in this, that it be absolutely, and essentially necessary, an actual being of itself; and potential or causative of all beings beside itself; independent from any other, upon which all things depend, and by which all things else are governed. Pearson, on the Creed, Art. I.

CA'USATIVELY.* adv. [from causative.] In a causative manner. Sherwood.
Several conjugations are used very indiscriminately; and whether they are to be taken actively, passively, causatively, or absolutely, must be determined by the context. Student, ii. 308.

CAUSA'TOR. n. s. [from causo, low Lat.] A causer: author of any effect.
Demonstratively understanding the simplicity of perfection, and the invisible condition of the first causator, it was out of the power of earth, or the areopagy of hell, to work them from it.
Brown, Vulgar Errours.

CAUSE. n. s. [causa, Lat.]
1. That which produces or effects any thing; the efficient.
The wise and learned amongst the very heathens themselves, have all acknowledged some first cause, whereupon originally the being of all things dependeth; neither have they otherwise spoken of that cause, than as an agent, which, knowing what and why it worketh, observeth, in working, a most exact order or law. Hooker.
Butterflies, and other flies, revive easily when they seem dead, being brought to the sun or fire; the cause whereof is the diffusion of the vital spirit, and the dilating of it by a little heat.
Bacon, Nat. Hist.
Cause is a substance exerting its power into act, to make one thing begin to be. Locke.

2. The reason; motive to any thing.
The rest shall bear some other fight,
As cause will be obey'd. Shakspeare.
So great, so constant, and so general a practice, must needs have not only a cause, but also a great, a constant, and a general cause, every way commensurate to such an effect. South.
Thus, royal sir! to see you landed here,
Was cause enough of triumph for a year. Dryden.
Æneas wond'ring stood: then ask'd the cause,
Which to the stream the crouding people draws.
Dryden.
Even he,
Lamenting that there had been cause of enmity,
Will often wish fate had ordain'd you friends.
Rowe.

3. Reason of debate; subject of litigation.
O madness of discourse!
That cause sets up with and against thyself!
Bifold authority. Shakspeare.
Hear the causes between your brethren, and judge righteously between every man and his brother, and the stranger that is with him. Deut.

4. Side; party; ground or principle of action or opposition.
Ere to thy cause, and thee, my heart inclin'd,
Or love to party had seduc'd my mind. Tickell.

To CAUSE. v. a. [from the noun.] To effect as an agent; to produce.
Never was man whose apprehensions are sober, and by a pensive inspection advised, but hath found by an irresistible necessity one everlasting being, all for ever causing and all for ever sustaining. Ralegh.
It is necessary in such a chain of causes to ascend to and terminate in some first, which should be the original of motion, and the cause of all other things; but itself be caused by none. South.
She weeping ask'd, in these her blooming years,
What unforeseen misfortune caus'd her care
To loath her life, and languish in despair?
Dryden, Fables.
Things that move so swift, as not to affect the senses distinctly, and so cause not any train of ideas in the mind, are not perceived to move. Locke.

To CAUSE.* v. n. [old Fr. causer, "to babble, to talk idly, to reason foolishly, to use much speech to little purpose." Cotgrave.] To assign insufficient cause or reason. Not now in use.
But he, to shifte their curious request,
Gan causen why she could not come in place;
Her crased health, her late recourse to rest,
And humid evening ill for sick folks' case;
But none of these excuses could take place.
Spenser, F. Q. iii. ix. 26.

CA'USELESS. adj. [from cause.]
1. Having no cause; original in itself.
Reach th' Almighty's sacred throne,
And make his causeless pow'r, the cause of all things, known. Blackmore's Creation.

2. Wanting just ground or motive.
Yet is my truth yplight,
And love avow'd to other lady late,
That, to remove the same, I have no might;
To change love causeless, is reproach to warlike knight. Spenser, F. Q.
And me and mine, threats not with war but death;
Thus causeless hatred endless is uneath. Fairfax.
The causeless dislike, which others have conceived, is not sufficient reason for us to forbear in any place. Hooker.
As women yet who apprehend
Some sudden cause of causeless fear,
Although that seeming cause take end,
A shaking through their limbs they find. Waller.
Alas! my fears are causeless and ungrounded,
Fantastick dreams, and melancholy fumes.
Denham.

CA'USELESSLY.† adv. [from causeless.] Without cause; without reason.
They [sin against the ninth commandment] that secretly raise jealousies and suspicion of their neighbour causelessly.
Bp. Taylor, Holy Dying, viii. § 4.
Human laws are not to be broken with scandal, nor at all without reason; for he that does it causelessly, is a despiser of the law, and undervalues its authority. Bp. Taylor, Holy Living.

CA'USELESSNESS.* n. s. [from causeless.] Unjust ground or motive.
Discerning and acknowledging the causelessness of your exceptions. Hammond, Works, i. 196.

CA'USER.† n. s. [from cause, old Fr. causeours, causers, the occasion of. Kelham, Norm. Dict.] One that causes; the agent by which an effect is produced.
His whole oration stood upon a short narration, what was the causer of this metamorphosis. Sidney.
Is not the causer of these timeless deaths,
As blameful as the executioner? Shakspeare.
Abstinence the apostle determines is of no other real value in religion, than as a ministerial causer of moral effects. Rogers.

CA'USEY.† } n. s. [chaussée, Fr. This
CA'USEWAY.† } word, by a false notion of its etymology, has been lately written causeway, Dr. Johnson rightly observes. But he has improperly placed Milton, who writes it causey, among those who have mistaken the word. Causey is referrible also to the Teut. kautsije. In old Fr. it is sometimes written caucé and also calsay. V. Kelham, Norm. Dict. In our own old language, it is calsey. V. Huloet's Dict. low Lat. calceatum. The Irish casan is a path.] A way raised and paved; a way raised above the rest of the ground.
To Shuppim the lot came forth westward by the causey. 1 Chron. xxvi. 16.
The other way Satan went down,
The causey to hell-gate. Milton, P. L.
But that broad causeway will direct your way,
And you may reach the town by noon of day.
Dryden.
Whose causeway parts the vale with shady rows;
Whose seats the weary traveller repose. Pope.

CAUSI'DICAL.* adj. [from the Lat. causidicus, a pleader; and Coles, in his Dict. 1677, gives us the subst. causidick, a pleader of causes: but this is not in use. The adjective, however, is now sometimes used.] Relating to an advocate or pleader.

CA'USTICAL.† } adj. [old Fr. caustique,
CA'USTICK. } from the Gr. καυστικὸς.] Epithets of medicaments which destroy the texture of the part to which they are applied, and eat it away, or burn it into an eschar, which they do by extreme minuteness, asperity, and quantity of motion, that, like those of fire itself, destroy the texture of the solids, and change what they are applied to into a substance like burnt flesh; which, in a little time, with detergent dressing, falls quite off, and leaves a vacuity in the part. Quincy.
If extirpation be safe, the best way will be by caustical medicines or escaroticks.
Wiseman, Surgery.
I proposed eradicating by escaroticks, and began with a caustick stone. Wiseman, Surgery.
Air too hot, cold, and moist, abounding perhaps with caustick, astringent, and coagulating particles. Arbuthnot.

CAUSTI'CITY.* n. s. In chymistry, a quality belonging to several substances, by the acrimony of which the parts of living animals may be corroded and destroyed. Chambers.

CA'USTICK. n. s. A burning application.
It was a tenderness to mankind, that introduced corrosives and causticks, which are indeed but artificial fires. Temple.
The piercing causticks ply their spiteful pow'r,
Emeticks ranch, and keen catharticks scour.
Garth.

CA'USTICKNESS.* n. s. [from caustick.] The quality of being caustick. Scot.

CA'UTEL.† n. s. [old Fr. cautelle, "a wile, cautel or sleight," Cotgrave. Dr. Johnson deduces it from the Lat. cautela, which signifies caution or prudent foresight; and has cited, in proof of this etymology, a passage from Shakspeare, which he has not given accurately, and to the word cautel in which he has assigned the meaning of caution or scruple. But it there means deceit. Such is the definition in our old lexicography, as we have seen in Cotgrave; and as it is in Huloet, "cautels, crafty ways to deceive;" and in Minsheu, "a crafty way to deceive." In Shakspeare's Hamlet, which is the only notice taken of the word by Dr. Johnson, it will hence be seen that cautel is cunning; though cautel for caution may also be found in our old language.]

1. Cunning; subtlety; deceit.

Perhaps, he loves you now;
And now no soil, nor cautel, doth besmirch
The virtue of his will. Shakspeare, Hamlet.

In him a plenitude of subtle matter,
Applied to cautels, all strange forms receives.
Shakspeare, Lover's Complaint.

2. Caution; provision. [Lat. cautela; old Fr. cautels, warnings. Kelh. Norm. Dict.]

This penance, canonical was appointed — for cautele and provision against the like sins.
Fulke against Allen, (1586,) p.418.

CA'UTELOUS. adj. [cauteleux, Fr.]

1. Cautious; wary; provident. Not in use.

Palladio doth wish, like a cautelous artisan, that the inward walls might bear some good share in the burden. Wotton.

2. Wily; cunning; treacherous.

Of themselves, for the most part, they are so cautelous and wily headed, especially being men of so small experience and practice in law matters, that you would wonder whence they borrow such subtilties and sly shifts. Spenser, on Ireland.

Your son
Will or exceed the common, or be caught
With cautelous baits and practice. Shakspeare.

CA'UTELOUSLY. adv. [from cautelous.]

1. Cunningly; slily; treacherously. Not in use.

All pretorian courts, if any of the parties be laid asleep, under pretence of a retirement, and the other party doth cautelously get the start and advantage, yet they will set back all things in statu quo prius. Bacon, War with Spain.

2. Cautiously; warily.

The Jews, not resolved of the sciatica side of Jacob, do cautelously, in their diet, abstain from both. Brown.

CA'UTELOUSNESS.* n. s. [from cautelous.] Cautiousness. Not now in use.

Let it not offend you, if I compare these two great Christian virtues, Cautelousness, Repentance. Hales, Rem. p. 254.

This Christian cautelousness and wariness here commended. Ibid.

CA'UTER.* n. s. [old Fr. cautère, Gr. καυτήριον, from καίω, to burn.] A searing hot iron; or more generally, any thing that is applied to burn, and is burning or boiling hot. Minsheu, and Cotgrave.

CA'UTERISM.* n. s. [from cauterize.] The application of cautery.

Some use the cauterisms on the legs.
Ferrand's Love Melancholy, p.262.

CAUTERIZA'TION.† n. s. [Fr. cauterisation.] The act of burning flesh with hot irons, or caustick medicaments.

They require, after cauterization, no such bandage, as that thereby you need to fear interception of the spirits. Wiseman.

To CA'UTERIZE.† v. a. [cauteriser, Fr.] To burn with the cautery.

No marvel though cantharides have such a corrosive and cauterizing quality; for there is not one other of the insecta, but is bred of a duller matter. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

The design of the cautery is to prevent the canal from closing; but the operators confess, that, in persons cauterized, the tears trickle down ever after. Sharp's Surgery.

CA'UTERIZING.* n. s. [from the verb.] The act of burning with the cautery. The following passage in Shakspeare is corrupted in Dr. Johnson's Dictionary, and so presents the word as a verb.

For each true word a blister! and each false
Be as a caut'rizing to the root o' the tongue,
Consuming it with speaking.
Shakspeare, Timon of Athens.

CA'UTERY. n. s. [καίω, uro.]

Cautery is either actual or potential; the first is burning by a hot iron, and the latter with caustick medicines. The actual cautery is generally used to stop mortification, by burning the dead parts to the quick; or to stop the effusion of blood, by searing up the vessels. Quincy.

In heat of fight it will be necessary to have your actual cautery always ready; for that will secure the bleeding arteries in a moment.
Wiseman's Surgery.

CA'UTION. n. s. [caution, Fr. cautio, Lat.]

1. Prudence, as it respects danger; foresight; provident care; wariness against evil.

2. Security for.

Such conditions, and cautions of the condition, as might assure with as much assurance as worldly matters bear. Sidney.

The Cedar, upon this new acquest, gave him part of Baccharia for caution for his disbursements. Howell.

The parliament would yet give his majesty sufficient caution that the war should be prosecuted.
Clarendon.

He that objects any crime, ought to give caution by the means of sureties, that he will persevere in the prosecution of such crimes.
Ayliffe, Parergon.

3. Provision or security against.

In despite of all the rules and cautions of government, the most dangerous and mortal of vices will come off. L'Estrange.

4. Provisionary precept.

Attention to the forementioned symptoms afford the best cautions and rules of diet, by way of prevention. Arbuthnot.

5. Warning.

To CA'UTION. v. a. [from the noun.] To warn; to give notice of a danger.

How shall our thought avoid the various snare?
Or wisdom to our caution'd soul declare
The diff'rent shapes thou pleasest to employ,
When bent to hurt, and certain to destroy? Prior.

You caution'd me against their charms,
But never gave me equal arms. Swift.

CA'UTIONARY.† adj. [from caution.]

1. Given as a pledge, or in security.

I am made the cautionary pledge,
The gage and hostage of your keeping it.
Southerne.

Is there no security for the island of Britain? Has the enemy no cautionary towns and sea-ports, to give us for securing trade? Swift.

2. Warning.

Of old, the Jews wrote the entrances of their synagogues with devout and cautionary sentences.
L. Addison, State of the Jews, p. 90.

Too servile an adherence to the letter — requires a cautionary or explanatory note.
Waterland, Script. Vind. P.iii. 64.

CA'UTIOUS. adj. [from cautus, Lat.] Wary; watchful.

Be cautious of him; for he is sometimes an inconstant lover, because he hath a great advantage.
Swift.

CA'UTIOUSLY. adv. [from cautious.] In an attentive, wary manner; warily.

They know how fickle common lovers are:
Their oaths and vows are cautiously believ'd;
For few there are but have been once deceiv'd.
Dryden.

CA'UTIOUSNESS. n. s. [from cautious.] Watchfulness; vigilance; circumspection; provident care; prudence with respect to danger.

I could not but approve their generous constancy and cautiousness. King Charles.

We should always act with great cautiousness and circumspection, in points where it is not impossible that we may be deceived. Addison, Spect.

To CAW. v. n. [taken from the sound.] To cry as the rook, raven, or crow.

Russet-pated choughs, many in sort,
Rising and cawing at the gun's report. Shaksp.

A walk of aged elms, so very high, that the rooks and crows upon the tops seem to be cawing in another region. Addison.

The rook, who high amid the boughs,
In early spring, his airy city builds,
And ceaseless caws. Thomson, Spring.

CA'XON.* n. s. A cant expression for a wig. Dr. Ash's Dictionary presents caxon for caxou, a technical word among miners.

CA'XOU.* n. s. In metallurgy, a chest of ores of silver, or any other metal, that has been burnt, ground, and washed, and is ready to be refined. Chambers.

CAYE'NNE *Pepper. A powder brought from the West Indies under that name, the basis of which is a species of the piper Indicum, called in the West Indies bird-pepper. It is used principally in sauces.

CAZI'QUE.* n. s. A title given by the Spaniards to the petty kings, and chiefs, of several countries in America.

The principal cazique of the island came to visit Cortes, with a numerous but ill-appointed equipage. Townsend, Conq. of Mexico, i. 15.

To CEASE.† v. n. [cesser, Fr. cesso, Lat.]

1. To leave off; to stop; to give over; to desist; with from before a noun.

The lives of all, who cease from combat, spare;
My brother's be your most peculiar care. Dryden.

2. Without from.

Yet not the more
Cease I to wander, where the Muses haunt
Clear spring, or shady grove, or sunny hill,
Smit with the love of sacred song. Milton, P. L.

3. To fail; to be extinct; to pass away.

The poor shall never cease out of the land.
Deut. xv. 11.

The soul being removed, the faculties and operations of life, sense, and intellection, cease from that moles corporea, and are no longer in it.
Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

4. To be at an end.

But now the wonder ceases, since I see
She kept them only, Tityrus, for thee. Dryden.

5. To rest.

The ministers of Christ have ceased from their labours. Sprat.

To CEASE. v. a. To put a stop to; to put an end to.

Importune him for my monies; be not ceas'd
With slight denial. Shakspeare, Tim. of Athens.

You may sooner, by imagination, quicken or slack a motion, than raise or cease it; as it is easier to make a dog go slower, than to make him stand still. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

Cease then this impious rage. Milton, P. L.

But he, her fears to cease,
Sent down the meek-ey'd peace. Milton, Ode.

The discord is complete, nor can they cease
The dire debate, nor yet command the peace.
Dryden.

CEASE. n. s. [from the verb.] Extinction; failure: perhaps for decease.

The cease of majesty
Dies not alone, but, like a gulph, withdraws
What's near it, with it. Shakspeare.

CE'ASELESS. adj. [from cease.] Incessant; perpetual; continual; without pause; without stop; without end.

My guiltless blood must quench the ceaseless fire,
On which my endless tears were bootless spent. Fairfax.

All these, with ceaseless praise his works behold,
Both day and night. Milton, P. L.

Like an oak
That stands secure, though all the winds employ
Their ceaseless roar, and only sheds its leaves,
Or mast, which the revolving spring restores. Philips.

CE'ASELESSLY.* adv. [from ceaseless.] Incessantly; perpetually.

This universal quire —
Prays ceaselessly. Donne, Poems, p. 341.

CECCHI'N.* n. s. [old Fr. cechin. We now write it chequin.] A coin of Italy, and also of Barbary.

See, Mosca, look,
Here I have brought a bag of bright cecchines,
Will quite weigh down his plate. B. Jonson, Fox.

CE'CITY.† n. s. [old Fr. cecité, from cæcitas, Lat.] Blindness; privation of sight.

They are not blind, nor yet distinctly see; there is in them no cecity, yet more than a cecutiency; they have sight enough to discern the light, though not perhaps to distinguish objects or colours. Brown, Vulg. Err.

CECU'TIENCY. n. s. [cæcutio, Lat.] Tendency to blindness, cloudiness of sight.

There is in them no cecity, yet more than a cecutiency. Brown, Vulg. Err.

CE'DAR†. n. s. [ceber, Sax. cedre, Fr. cedrus, Lat. from the Gr. κέδρος.] A tree.

It is evergreen; the leaves are much narrower than those of the pine tree, and many of them produced out of one tubercle, resembling a painter's pencil; it hath male flowers, or katkins, produced at remote distances from the fruit on the same tree. The seeds are produced in large cones, squamose and turbinated. The extension of the branches is very regular in cedar trees; the ends of the shoots declining, and thereby shewing their upper surface, which is constantly cloathed with green leaves, so regularly as to appear at a distance like a green carpet, and, in waving about, makes an agreeable prospect. It is surprising that this tree has not been more cultivated in England; for it would be a great ornament to barren bleak mountains, even in Scotland, where few other trees would grow; it being a native of Mount Libanus, where the snow continues most part of the year. Maundrel, in his Travels, says, he measured one of the largest cedars on Mount Libanus, and found it to be twelve yards six inches in circumference, and sound. At about five or six yards from the ground, it was divided into five limbs, each of which was equal to a great tree. The wood of this famous tree is accounted proof against the putrefaction of animal bodies. The saw dust is thought to be one of the secrets used by the mountebanks, who pretend to have the embalming mystery. This wood is also said to yield an oil, which is famous for preserving books and writings, and the wood is thought by Bacon to continue above a thousand years sound. Miller.

I must yield my body to the earth:
Thus yields the cedar to the axe's edge,
Whose arms gave shelter to the princely eagle;
Under whose shade the ramping lion slept,
Whose top branch overpeer'd Jove's spreading tree.
And kept low shrubs from winter's powerful wind. Shakspeare.

CE'DARLIKE.* adj. [from cedar and like.] Resembling a cedar tree.

His tall
And growing gravity, so cedar-like. B. Jonson, New Inn.

CE'DARN.* adj. [from cedar.] Of or belonging to the cedar tree.

West winds, with musky wing,
About the cedarn alleys fling
Nard and Cassia's balmy smells. Milton, Comus.

To CEDE.* v. n. [Fr. ceder, Lat. cedo.] To submit; to yield.

This fertile glebe, this fair domain,
Had well nigh ceded to the slothful hands
Of monks libidinous. Shenstone, Ruin'd Abbey.

To CEDE.* v. a. [This verb, whether as an active or neuter, is perhaps of no great age in our language. It has been hitherto unnoticed.] To resign; to give up.

That honour was entirely ceded to the Pathian royal race. Drummond's Travels, (1754,) p. 256.

By the peace of Paris in 1763, it [Dominica] was ceded in express terms to the English. Guthrie, Geogr.

CE'DRINE. adj. [cedrinus, Lat.] Of or belonging to the cedar tree.

CE'DRY.* adj. [Lat. cedrinus.] Resembling the colour of cedar.

That which comes from Bergen being long, strait, and clear, and of a yellow or more cedry colour, is esteemed much before the white. Evelyn, ii. 3. § 2.

CE'DULE.* n. s. [old Fr. cédule. Our elder word for schedule, which see.] A scroll, or writing; also, an additional written instrument. Cotgrave.

CE'DUOUS.* adj. [Lat. ceduus.] Fit to be felled.

These we shall divide into the greater and more ceduous fruticant, and shrubby. Evelyn, Sylv. Introd. § 3.

To CEIL. v. a. [cælo, Lat.] To overlay, or cover the inner roof of a building.

And the greater house he ceiled with fir-tree, which he overlaid with fine gold. 2 Chron.

How will he, from his house ceiled with cedar, be content with his Saviour's lot, not to have where to lay his head? Decay of Piety.

CE'ILING.† n. s. [from ceil, Dr. Johnson says; but perhaps it might be ceiling, as some still write it, from ciel, Fr. cielo, Ital. the heavens. In reference to this etymology, Richardson supposes Milton to have employed the word. Our old word is cielure.]

1. The inner roof.

Varnish makes ceilings not only shine, but last. Bacon.

And now the thicken'd sky
Like a dark ceiling stood; down rush'd the rain
Impetuous. Milton, P. L.

So when the sun by day, or moon by night,
Strike on the polish'd brass their trembling light,
The glittering species here and there divide,
And cast their dubious beams from side to side:
Now on the walls, now on the pavement play,
And to the ceiling flash the glaring day. Dryden.

2. In sea language, the inside planks of a ship. Chambers.

CE'LANDINE. n. s. [chelidoneum, Lat.] A plant.

The swallows use celandine, the linnet euphrasia. More.

CE'LATURE.† n. s. [cælatura, Lat. celature, old French.] The art of engraving or cutting in figures; figures; the thing engraved.

These celatures in their drinking cups were so framed, that they might put them on or take them off at pleasure, and were therefore called emblemata. Hakewill on Providence, p. 372.

To CE'LEBRATE. v. a. [celebro, Lat.]

1. To praise; to commend; to give praise to; to make famous.

The songs of Sion were psalms and pieces of poetry, that adored or celebrated the supreme Being. Addison.

I would have him read over the celebrated works of antiquity, which have stood the test of so many different ages. Addison.

2. To distinguish by solemn rites; to perform solemnly.

He slew all them that were gone to celebrate the sabbath. 2 Maccab.

On the feast day the father cometh forth, after divine service, into a large room, where the feast is celebrated. Bacon.

3. To mention in a set or solemn manner, whether of joy or sorrow.

This pause of pow'r, 'tis Ireland's hour to mourn;
While England celebrates your safe return. Dryden.

CELEBRA'TION. n. s. [from celebrate.]

1. Solemn performance; solemn remembrance.

He laboured to drive sorrow from her, and to hasten the celebration of their marriage. Sidney.

He shall conceal it,
While you are willing it shall come to note;
What time we will our celebration keep,
According to my birth. Shakspeare.

During the celebration of this holy sacrament, you attend earnestly to what is done by the priest. Taylor.

2. Praise; renown; memorial.

No more shall be added in this place, his memory deserving a particular celebration, than that his learning, piety and virtue, have been attained by few. Clarendon.

Some of the ancients may be thought sometimes to have used a less number of letters, by the celebration of those who have added to their alphabet. Holder, Elements of Speech.

CE'LEBRATOR.* n. s. [Lat. celebrator.] One who celebrates or praises.

It [Scripture] has, among the wits, as well celebrators, and admirers, as disregarders. Boyle's Style of H. Script. p. 174.

CELE'BRIOUS.† adj. [old Fr. celebre, from celeber, Lat.] Famous; renowned; noted. Not in use.

The Jews, Jerusalem, and the Temple, having been always so celebrious; yet when, after their captivities, they were despoiled of their glory, even then, the Assyrians, Greeks, and Romans, honoured, with sacrifices, the most high God, whom that nation worshipped. Grew.

CELE'BRIOUSLY. adv. [from celebrious.] In a famous manner.

CELE'BRIOUSNESS. n. s. [from celebrious.] Renown; fame.

CELE'BRITY.† n. s. [old Fr. celebrité, from celebritas, Lat.] Publick and splendid transaction.

The manner of her receiving, and the celebrity of the marriage, were performed with great magnificence. Bacon.

CELE'RIACK. n. s. A species of parsley; it is also called turnip rooted celery.

CELE'RITY.† n. s. [Fr. celerité, from the Lat. celeritas.] Swiftness; speed; velocity.

We very well see in them, who thus plead, a wonderful celerity of discourse; for, perceiving at the first but only some cause of suspicion, and fear lest it should be evil, they are presently, in one and the self-same breath, resolved, that what beginning soever it had, there is no possibility it should be good. Hooker.

His former custom and practice was ever full of forwardness and celerity, to make head against them. Bacon.

Thus, with imagin'd wings, our swift scene flies,
In motion with no less celerity
Than that of thought. Shakspeare.

Three things concur to make a percussion great; the bigness, the density, and the celerity of the body moved. Digby.

Whatever encreaseth the density of the blood, even without encreasing its celerity, heats, because a denser body is hotter than a rarer. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

CE'LERY. n. s. A species of parsley; which see.

CELE'STIAL. adj. [celestis, Lat.]

1. Heavenly; relating to the superiour regions.

There stay, until the twelve celestial signs
Have brought about their annual reckoning. Shakspeare.

The ancients commonly applied celestial descriptions of other climes to their own. Brown, Vulg. Errs.

2. Heavenly; relating to the blessed state.

Play that sad note
I nam'd my knell; whilst I sit meditating
On that celestial harmony I go to. Shakspeare.

3. Heavenly, with respect to excellence.

Canst thou pretend desire, whom zeal inflam'd
To worship, and a pow'r celestial nam'd? Dryden.

Telemachus, his bloomy face
Glowing celestial sweet, with godlike grace. Pope.

CELE'STIAL. n. s. [from the adj.] An inhabitant of heaven.

Thus affable and mild, the prince precedes,
And to the dome th' unknown celestial leads. Pope.

CELE'STIALLY. adv. [from celestial.] In a heavenly manner.

To CELE'STIFY. v. a. [from celestis, Lat.] To give something of heavenly nature to any thing. Not used.

We should affirm, that all things were in all things, that heaven were but earth terrestrified, and earth but heaven celestified, or that each part above had influence upon its affinity below. Brown, Vulg. Errs.

CE'LIACK.† adj. [old Fr. céliaque, or coeliaque, from the Gr. κοιλία, the belly.] Relating to the lower belly.

The blood moving slowly through the celiack and mesenterick arteries, produces complaints. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

CE'LIBACY. n. s. [from cœlebs, Latin.] Single life; unmarried state.

I can attribute their numbers to nothing but their frequent marriages; for they look on celibacy as an accursed state, and generally are married before twenty. Spectator.

By teaching them how to carry themselves in their relations of husbands and wives, parents and children, they have, without question, adorned the gospel, glorified God, and benefited man, much more than they could have done in the devoutest and strictest celibacy. Atterbury.

CE'LIBATE.† n. s. [old Fr. celibat, Cotgrave. Lat. cœlibatus, from cœlebs; which has been derived from the Gr. κοίτη, a bed, and λείπω, to leave; i. e. he who declines the nuptial bed, or he who has never entered it. Scaliger. V. Morin.] Single life.

The forced celibate of the English clergy is of greater antiquity than these his saints. Bp. Hall, Honour of the Married Clergy, p. 312.

No divine law then, he grants, hath injoined this celibate, but an ecclesiastical. Bp. Hall, Honour of the Married Clergy, p. 123.

Celibate, like the fly in the heart of an apple, dwells in a perpetual sweetness, but sits alone. Bp. Taylor, Serm. i. 223.

If any persons, convict of this unchastity, are in the state of celibate, they are only chastised with scourges. L. Addison, West Barbary, p. 172.

The males oblige themselves to celibate, and then multiplication is hindered. Graunt.

CELL.† n. s. [cella, Lat. Dryden has used this word in an extraordinary manner; converting Chaucer's word dale into cell, in his fable of the Cock and Fox, "Deep in a cell her cottage lonely stood;" where the original is her "cottage standing in a dale;" which is very plain; but standing in a cell, is not so; and as this mistake, if I may so call it, in this great master of our language, has hitherto been unnoticed, it seems right to remark it here.]

1. A small cavity or hollow place.

The brain contains ten thousand cells,
In each some active fancy dwells. Prior.

How bees for ever, though a monarch reign,
Their separate cells and properties maintain. Pope.

2. The cave or little habitation of a religious person.

Besides she did intend confession
At Patrick's cell this even; and there she was not. Shakspeare.

Then did religion in a lazy cell,
In empty, airy contemplations dwell. Denham.

3. A small and close apartment in a prison.

When Jeremiah was entered into the dungeon, and into the cabins, [in the margin, cells.] Jerem. xxxvii. 16.

4. Any small place of residence; a cottage.

Mine eyes he clos'd, but open left the cell
Of fancy, my internal sight. Milton, P. L.

For ever in this humble cell
Let thee and I together dwell. Prior.

In cottages and lowly cells,
True piety neglected dwells,
Till call'd to heaven, its native seat,
Where the good man alone is great. Somerville.

5. A religious house, subordinate to some great abbey. Tanner.

As loud as doth the chapell belle,
There as this lord was keeper of the celle. Chaucer, C. T. Prol.

6. Little bags or bladders, where fluids, or matter of different sorts are lodged; common both to animals and plants. Quincy.

CE'LLAR.† n. s. [cellarium, Lat. from cella; Græco-barb. κελλάριον, a place where provisions are kept. V. Meursii Gloss.] A place under ground, where stores and liquours are reposited.

If this fellow had lived in the time of Cato, he would, for his punishment, have been confined to the bottom of a cellar during his life. Peacham, on Drawing.

CE'LLARAGE. n. s. [from cellar.] The part of the building which makes the cellars.

Come on, you hear this fellow in the cellarage. Shakspeare.

A good ascent makes a house wholesome, and gives opportunity for cellarage. Mortimer's Husbandry.

CE'LLARER, or CE'LLERER.* n. s. [Lat. cellarius, and cellerarius.] The officer in a monastery who had the care of provisions; and generally, a butler. Huloet.

Upon my faith, thou art some officer,
Some worthy sextein, or some celerer. Chaucer, Monk's Prologue.

CE'LLARIST. n. s. [cellarius, Lat.] The butler in a religious house. Dict.

CE'LLULAR. adj. [cellula, Lat.] Consisting of little cells or cavities.

The urine, insinuating itself amongst the neighbouring muscles, and cellular membranes, destroyed four. Sharp's Surgery.

CE'LLULE.* n. s. [Lat. cellula.] A little cell or cavity.

CEL'SITUDE.† n. s. [celsitudo, Lat.] Height. Dict.

Honour to thee, celestial and cleare
Goddess of Love, and to thy celsitude! Chaucer, Test. of Love, 611.

CE'MENT.† n. s. [old Fr. cement, from the Lat. cæmentum.]

1. The matter with which two bodies are made to cohere; as, mortar or glue.

Your temples burned in their cement, and your franchises confined into an augre's bore. Shakspeare.

There is a cement compounded of flower, whites of eggs, and stones powdered, that becometh hard as marble. Bacon.

You may see divers pebbles, and a crust of cement or stone between them, as hard as the pebbles themselves. Bacon.

The foundation was made of rough stone, joined together with a most firm cement; upon this was laid another layer, consisting of small stones and cement. Arbuthnot on Coins.

2. Bond of union in friendship.

Let not the piece of virtue which is set
Betwixt us, as the cement of our love,
To keep it builded, be the ram to batter. Shakspeare.

What cement should unite heaven and earth, light and darkness? Glanville.

Look over the whole creation, and you shall see, that the band of cement, that holds together all the parts of this great and glorious fabrick, is gratitude. South.

To CEME'NT.† v. a. [from the noun.] Dr. Johnson places the accent on the second syllable in this verb, but, in the example which he brings from Shakspeare, it is on the first; and Dryden, as also Beaumont and Fletcher, have so accented it. The distinction between the verb and the substantive, however, is now generally observed, by the first being accented on the last syllable, and the last on the first.] To unite by means of something interposed.

But how the fear of us
May cement their divisions, and bind up
The petty difference, we yet not know. Shaksp.

Liquid bodies have nothing to cement them; they are all loose and incoherent, and in a perpetual flux: even an heap of sand, or fine powder, will suffer no hollowness within them, though they be dry substances. Burnet, Theory of the Earth.

Love with white lead cements his wings;
White lead was sent us to repair
Two brightest, brittlest earthly things,
A lady's face, and china ware. Swift.

To CEME'NT. v. n. To come into conjunction; to cohere.

When a wound is recent, and the parts of it are divided by a sharp instrument, they will if held in close contact for some time, reunite by inosculation, and cement like one branch of a tree ingrafted on another. Sharp's Surgery.

CEMENTA'TION. n. s. [from cement.] The act of cementing, or uniting with cement.

CEME'NTER.† n. s. [old Fr. cementers, bricklayers, masons. Kelham, Norm. Dict.] A person or thing that unites in society.

God having designed man for a sociable creature, furnished him with language which was to be the great instrument and cementer of society. Locke.

CE'METERY.† n. s. [old Fr. cemeterie, Gr. κοιμητήριον, from κοιμάω, to sleep. "For this cause the Greeks do call theyr buryinge places coemeterium, that is to say, a dorter or sleping-place," &c. Huntinge of Purgatory, 1561, fol. xxxi.] A place where the dead are reposited.

The souls of the dead appear frequently in cemeteries, and hover about the places where their bodies are buried, as still hankering about their old brutal pleasures, and desiring again to enter the body. Addison.

CEN, and CIN, denote kinsfolk; so Cinulph is a help to his kindred; Cinehelm, a protector of his kinsfolk; Cinburg, the defence of his kindred; Cinric, powerful in kindred. Gibson.

CE'NATORY. adj. [from ceno, to sup, Lat.] Relating to supper.

The Romans washed, were anointed, and wore a cenatory garment; and the same was practised by the Jews. Brown, Vulgar Errours.

CENOBI'TICAL.† adj. [Fr. cénobitique, from κοινός and βίος.] Living in community.

They have multitudes of religious orders, black and gray, eremitical and cenobitical, and nuns. Stilling fleet.

CE'NOBY.* n. s. [from the Gr. κοινός and βίος.] The place where persons live in community.

His arms are yet to be seen in the ruins of the hospital of St. John's near Smithfield, and in the church of Allhallows at the upper end of Lumbard Street, which was repaired and enlarged with the stones brought from that cenoby.
Sir G. Buck, Hist. of Rich. III. p. 68.

CE'NOTAPH.† n. s. [old Fr. cénotaphe, from κενός and τάφος. Pythagoras, for any that had forsaken his school, had a κενοτάφιον, an empty coffin, set in his place, to signify him to be morally dead." Hammond on St. Luke, xv. 24.] A monument for one buried elsewhere.

Priam, to whom the story was unknown,
As dead, deplor'd his metamorphos'd son;
A cenotaph his name and title kept,
And Hector round the tomb with all his brothers wept. Dryden, Fab.

The Athenians, when they lost any men at sea, raised a cenotaph, or empty monument.
Notes on Odyssey.

CENSE.† n. s. [cense, old Fr. census, Lat.]
1. Publick rate.

We see what floods of treasure have flowed into Europe by that action; so that the cense, or rates of Christendom, are raised since ten times, yea twenty times told. Bacon.

2. Condition; rank.

If you write to a man, whose estate and cense—you are familiar with, you may the bolder venture on a knot. B. Jonson, Discoveries.

To CENSE.† v. a. [encenser, Fr.] To perfume with odours; contracted from incense.

In his hand he bore a golden censer, with perfume; and censing about the altar, having first kindled his fire on the top, is interrupted by the genius.
B. Jonson, Part of K. James's Entertainment.

The Salii sing, and cense his altars round
With Saban smoke, their heads with poplar bound.
Dryden.

Grineus was near, and cast a furious look
On the side altar, cens'd with sacred smoke,
And bright with flaming fires. Dryden.

CE'NSER. n. s. [encensoir, Fr.]
1. The pan or vessel in which incense is burned.

Antonius gave piety in his money, like a lady with a censer before an altar.
Peacham on Drawing.

Of incense clouds,
Fuming from golden censers, hid the mount.
Milton, P. L.

2. A pan in which any thing is burned; fire-pan.

Here's snip, and nip, and cut, and slish, and slash,
Like to a censer in a barber's shop.
Shakspeare, Tam. of the Shrew.

CE'NSION. n. s. [censio, Lat.] A rate, an assessment.

God intended this censien only for the blessed Virgin and her Son, that Christ might be born where he should. Joseph Hall.

CE'NSOR.† n. s. [censor, Lat.]
1. An officer of Rome, who had the power of correcting manners; "a high constable, judge, or reformer of manners." Huloet.

I reflected that it was the proper office of the magistrate to punish only knaves, and that we had a censor of Great Britain, for people of another denomination. Tatler, No. 212.

These characters were forwarded by proper officers—till they arrived at length into the hands of the censor, an officer of great fame in the Roman government.
Harris on the 53d chap. of Isaiah.

2. One who is given to censure and exprobation.

Ill-natur'd censors of the present age,
And fond of all the follies of the past. Roscommon.

The most severe censor cannot but be pleased with the prodigality of his wit, though, at the same time, he could have wished, that the master of it had been a better manager. Dryden.

CENSO'RIAL.* adj. [from censor.] Full of censure; severe.

The moral gravity and the censorial declamation of Juvenal.
Warton, Hist. of Eng. Poetry, iv. 6.

CENSO'RIAN. adj. [from censor.] Relating to the censor.

As the chancery had the pretorian power for equity, so the star-chamber had the censorian power for offences under the degree of capital. Bacon.

CENSO'RIOUS.† adj. [from censor.]
1. Addicted to censure; severe; full of invectives.

Sometimes animating the subject by censorious exauthorizing the prince.
Selden on Drayton's Polyolb. S. 17.

Do not too many believe no religion to be pure, but what is intemperately rigid? no zeal to be spiritual, but what is censorious, or vindicative? Spratt.

O! let my presence make my travels light,
And potent Venus shall exalt my name
Above the rumours of censorious fame. Prior.

2. Sometimes it has of before the object of reproach.

A dogmatical spirit inclines a man to be censorious of his neighbours. Watts on the Mind.

3. Sometimes on.

He treated all his inferiours of the clergy with a most sanctified pride; was rigorously and universally censorious upon all his brethren of the gown. Swift.

CENSO'RIOUSLY.† adv. [from censorious.] In a severe reflecting manner.

If it be suspected, that this great hatred of the Christians moved this Gentile to animadvert too censoriously upon their carriage, then it will be reasonable to enquire what others have delivered in this matter.
L. Addison, Life of Mahomet, p. 128.

CENSO'RIOUSNESS.† n. s. [from censorious.] Disposition to reproach; habit of reproaching.

Some silly souls are prone to place much piety in their mawkingly plainness, and in their censoriousness of others, who use more comely and costly curiosities. Bp. Taylor, Artif. Handsom. p. 87.

Sourness of disposition, and rudeness of behaviour, censoriousness and sinister interpretation of things, all cross and distasteful humours, render the conversation of men grievous and uneasy to one another. Tillotson.

CE'NSORLIKE.* adj. [from censor and like.] Censorious; austere.
Cotgrave in V. Censorin.

CE'NSORSHIP.† n. s. [from censor.]
1. The office of a censor.

In his own phrase, he [Smith] whitened himself, having a desire to obtain the censorship, an office of honour and some profit in the college.
Jonson, Life of Smith.

2. The time in which the office of censor is born.

It was brought to Rome in the censorship of Claudius. Brown, Vulg. Err.

CE'NSUAL.* adj. [old Fr. censuel, from the Lat. census.] Relating to the census or Roman register.

He sent commissioners into all the several counties of the whole realm, who took an exact survey, and described in a censual roll or book, all the lands, titles, and tenures, throughout the whole kingdom.
Temple, Introduct. to the Hist. of Eng. p. 255.

CE'NSURABLE. adj. [from censure.] Worthy of censure; blameable; culpable.

A small mistake may leave upon the mind the lasting memory of having been taunted for something censurable. Locke.

CE'NSURABLENESS.† n. s. [from censurable.] Blameableness; fitness to be censured.

This, and divers others, are alike in their censurableness by the unskilful, be it divinity, physick, poetry, &c.
Whitlock, Manners of the Eng. p. 493.

CE'NSURABLY.* adv. [from censurable.] In a blame-worthy manner.

CE'NSURE.† n. s. [censure, old Fr. censura, Lat.]
1. Blame; reprimand: reproach.

Enough for half the greatest of these days,
To 'scape my censure, not expect my praise. Pope.

2. Judgement; opinion; determination.

Madam, and you, my sister, will you go
To give your censures in this weighty business?
Shakspeare.

'Twas said they saw but one; and no discerner
Durst wag his tongue in censure.
Shakspeare, K. Hen. VIII.

3. Judicial sentence.
To you, lord governour,
Remains the censure of this hellish villain.
Shakspeare.

4. A spiritual punishment inflicted by some ecclesiastical judge.
Ayliffe's Parergon.
Upon the unsuccessfulness of milder medicaments, use that stronger physick, the censures of the church. Hammond.

To CE'NSURE.† v.a. [censurer, Fr.]

1. To blame; to brand publickly.
Men may censure thine [weakness]
The gentler, if severely thou exact not
More strength from me, than in thyself was found.
Milton, S. A.

2. To condemn by a judicial sentence.
Has censur'd him
Already, and, as I hear the provost hath
A warrant for his execution.
Shakspeare, Meas. for Meas.

3. To judge; to estimate.
The onset and retire
Of both your armies; whose equality
By our best eyes cannot be censured.
Shakspeare, K. John.
Should I say more, you well might censure me
(what yet I never was) a flatterer.
Beaum. and Fl. Elder Brother.

To CE'NSURE.* v.n. To judge; to give an opinion.
'Tis a passing shame,
That I, unworthy body as I am,
Should censure thus on lovely gentlemen.
Shakspeare, Two Gent. of Verona.
Bearing my words and doings to the lords
To gloss upon, and, censuring, frown or smile!
Milton, S. A.

CE'NSURER. n.s. [from censure.] One that blames; one that reproaches.
We must not stint
Our necessary actions, in the fear
To cope malicious censurers. Shaks. Hen. VIII.
A statesman, who is possest of real merit, should look upon his political censurers with the same neglect, that a good writer regards his criticks. Addison.

CE'NSURING.* n.s. [from censure.] Reproach; blame.
The like censurings and despisings have embittered the spirits, and wetted both the tongues and pens, of learned men one against another.
Sanderson.

CE'NSUS.* n.s. [Lat.] A declaration, among the Romans, made by the several subjects of the empire, of their names and places of abode, before the censors; by whom the declarations were registered.
This is manifest from the history of the Jewish nation, from the account of the Roman census, and registers of our own country, where the proportion of births to burials is found upon observation to be yearly as fifty to forty.
Bentley, Serm. p. 107.
I shall say little here of the census of the Romans, it being a thing so well known; and shall only stay to remark, that there were, in their books or registers, not only the condition and quality of all people, but also their characters.
Harris on the 53d chap. of Isaiah.

CENT.† n.s. [centum, Lat. a hundred.] A hundred; as five per cent, that is, five in the hundred.
The demon makes his full descent
In one abundant shower of cent per cent. Pope.

CE'NTAGE.* n.s. [from cent.] The payment of cents.

CE'NTAUR. n.s. [centaupe, Sax. centaurus, Lat.]

1. A poetical being, supposed to be compounded of a man and a horse.
Down from the waste they are centaurs, though women all above. Shakspeare.
The idea of a centaur has no more falsehood in it, than the name centaur. Locke.

2. The archer in the zodiack.
The cheerless empire of the sky,
To Capricorn, the Centaur archer yield.
Thomson.

CE'NTAURLIKE.* adj. [from centaur and like.] Having the appearance and skill, as it were, of a centaur, in managing a horse.
You remember the ship we saw once, when the sea went high upon the coast of Argos; so went the beast. But he, [Dametas,] as if centaurlike he had been one piece with the horse, was no more moved than one is with the going of his own legs; and in effect so did he command him, as his own limbs. Sidney, Arcad. b. 2.

2. Vacation, suspension.

There had been a mighty confusion of things, an interruption and perturbation of the ordinary course, and a cessation and suspension of the laws of nature. Woodward, Nat. Hist.

The rising of a parliament is a kind of cessation from politicks. Addison, Freeholder.

3. End of action; the state of ceasing to act.

The serum, which is mixed with an alkali, being poured out to that which is mixed with an acid, raiseth an effervescence; at the cessation of which, the salts of which the acid was composed, will be regenerated. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

4. A pause of hostility, without peace.

When the succours of the poor Protestants in Ireland were diverted, I was intreated to get them some respite, by a cessation. King Charles.

CESSA'VIT. n. s. [Latin.]

A writ that lies upon this general ground, that the person, against whom it is brought, hath, for two years, omitted to perform such service, or pay such rent, as he is obliged by his tenure, and hath not, upon his land or tenement, sufficent goods or chattels to be distrained. Cowel.

CESSIBI'LITY. n. s. [from cedo, cessum, Lat.] The quality of receding, or giving way, without resistance.

If the subject strucken be of a proportionate cessibility, it seems to dull and deaden the stroke; whereas if the thing strucken be hard, the stroke seems to lose no force, but to work a greater effect. Digby on the Soul.

CE'SSIBLE. adj. [from cedo, cessum. Lat.] Easy to give way.

If the parts of the strucken body be so easily cessible, as without difficulty the stroke can divide them, then it enters into such a body, till it has spent its force. Digby on the Soul.

CE'SSION.† n. s. [cession, Fr. cessio, Lat.]

1. Retreat; the act of giving way.

Sound is not produced without some resistance either in the air or the body percussed; for if there be a mere yielding or cession, it produceth no sound. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

2. Resignation; the act of yielding up or quitting to another.

A parity in their council would make and secure the best peace they can with France, by a cession of Flanders to that crown, in exchange for other provinces. Temple.

3. A manner of vacating or voiding an ecclesiastical benefice; that kind of resignation which is understood, and requires no form, where the Clerk takes some benefice which may not be consistent with what he already possesses.

CE'SSIONARY.† adj. [old Fr. cessionnaire. V. Cotgrave in Cession des biens, who makes cessionary also a substantive.] As, a cessionary bankrupt, one who has delivered up all his effects. Martin.

CE'SSMENT. n. s. [from cess.] An assessment or tax. Dict.

CE'SSOR.† n. s. [from cesso, Lat.

1. In law, he that ceaseth or neglecteth so long to perform a duty belonging to him, as that by his cess, or cessing, he incurreth the danger of law, and hath, or may have the writ cessavit brought against him. Where it is said the tenant cesseth, such phrase is to be understood, as if it were said, the tenant cesseth to do that which he ought, or is bound to do by his land or tenement. Cowel.

2. A taxer. Sherwood.

Some [faults] there be of that nature, that though they be in private men, yet their evil reacheth to a general hurt; as the extortion of sheriffs, and their sub-sheriffs, and bayliffes; the corruption of victuallers, cessors, and purveyors. Spenser on Ireland.

CEST.* n. s. [old Fr. ceste, Lat. cestus, Gr. κεστὸς.] The girdle of a lady.

Young Fancy thus, to me divinest name!
To whom, prepar'd and bath'd in heaven,
The cest of amplest power is given.
Collins, Ode on the Poetical Character.

CE'STUS.† n. s. [Latin.] The girdle of Venus.

She [sickness] pulls off the light and fantastick summer-robe of lust and wanton appetite; and as soon as that cestus, that lascivious girdle is thrown away, then the reins chasten us. Bp. Taylor, Holy Dying, iii. § 6.

Venus, without any ornament but her own beauties, not so much as her own cestus. Addison, Spectator.

CETA'CEOUS.† adj. [old Fr. cetacé; "poisson cetacée, of the kind of whales." Cotgrave. Lat. cete, Gr. κῆτος.] Of the whale kind.

Such fishes as have lungs or respiration, are not without the wezzon, as whales and cetaceous animals. Brown, Vulg. Err.

He hath created variety of these cetaceous fishes, which converse chiefly in the northern seas, whose whole body being encompassed round with a copious fat or blubber, it is enabled to abide the greatest cold of the sea-water. Ray on the Creation.

CE'TERACH.* n. s. [old Fr. ceterach.] A plant; the scale-fern, stone-fern, finger-fern, miltewast. Cotgrave.

CE'SURE.* n. s. See CÆSURA. The close of a verse; the pause in a sentence.

Vulgar languages that want
Words and sweetness, and be scant
Of true measure;

Tyrant rhyme hath so abused,
That they long since have refused
Other cessure. B. Jonson, Underwoods.

C FA UT. A note in the scale of musick.
Gamut I am, the ground of all accord,
A re, to plead Hortensio's passion!
B mi Bianca, take him for thy lord,
C fa ut, that loves with all affection. Shakspeare.

CH has, in words purely English, or fully naturalized, the sound of tsh; a peculiar pronunciation, which it is hard to describe in words. In some words, derived from the French, it has the sound of sh, as chaise; and, in some derived from the Greek, the sound of k as cholerick.

CHACE. See CHASE.

CHACO'ON.* n. s. [Span. chacona.] A dance, like a saraband, borrowed from the Spaniards, and by them from the Moors. The measure of it is said to have been always triple time. See Gloss. Ang. Nov. 1707.

CHAD. n. s. A sort of fish.
Of round fish there are brit, sprat, whiting, chad, eels, congar, millet.
Carew, Survey of Cornwall.

To CHAFE.† v. a. [echauffer, Fr. perhaps from the Lat. calefacere, to make warm.]

1. To warm with rubbing.
They laid him upon some of their garments, and fell to rub and chafe him, till they brought him to recover both breath, the servant, and warmth, the companion of living. Sidney.
At last, recovering heart, he does begin
To rub her temples, and to chafe her skin.
Spenser, F. Q.
First to chafe and prepare the wax to receive the seal; then, as officers, to set to that seal.
Montagu, App. to Cæsar, p. 318.
Soft, and more soft, at ev'ry touch it grew;
Like pliant wax, when chafing hands reduce
The former mass to form, and frame to use.
Dryden.

2. To heat by rage or hurry.
Have I not heard the sea, puff'd up with winds,
Rage like an angry boar, chafed with sweat?
Shakspeare.
Why do you
Chafe yourself so? Beaum. and Fl. Philaster.

3. To perfume.
Lilies more white than snow,
New fall'n from heav'n, with violets mix'd, did grow;
Whose scent so chaf'd the neighbour air, that you
Would surely swear Arabick spices grow.
Suckling.

4. To make angry; to enflame passion.
Her intercession chaf'd him so,
When she for thy repeal was suppliant,
That to close prison he commanded her. Shaksp.
An offer of pardon more chafed the rage of those, who were resolved to live or die together.
Sir John Hayward.
For all that he was inwardly chafed with the heat of youth and indignation, against his own people as well as the Rhodians, he moderated himself betwixt his own rage, and the offence of his soldiers. Knolles, Hist. of the Turks.
This chaf'd the boar, his nostrils flames expire,
And his red eyeballs roll with living fire. Dryden.

To CHAFE. v. n.

1. To rage; to fret; to fume; to rave; to boil.
Therewith he 'gan full terribly to roar,
And chaf'd at that indignity right sore.
Spenser, Hub. Tale.
He will not rejoice so much at the abuse of Falstaff, as he will chafe at the doctor's marrying my daughter. Shakspeare.
Be lion mettled, proud, and take no care,
Who chafes, who frets, or where conspirers are.
Shakspeare.
How did they fume, and stamp, and roar, and chafe,
And swear! not Addison himself was safe. Pope.

2. To fret against any thing.
Once upon a raw and gusty day,
The troubled Tyber chafing with his shores.
Shakspeare, Jul. Cæs.
The murmuring surge,
That on th' unnumber'd idle pebbles chafes,
Cannot be heard so high. Shakspeare, K. Lear.

CHAFE. n. s. [from the verb.] A heat; a rage; a fury; a passion; a fume; a pett; a fret; a storm.
When Sir Thomas More was speaker of the parliament, with his wisdom and eloquence, he so crossed a purpose of cardinal Wolsey's, that the cardinal in a chafe, sent for him to Whitehall.
Camden, Remains.
At this the knight grew high in chafe,
And staring furiously on Ralph,
He trembled. Hudibras.

CHAFE-WAX. n. s. An officer belonging to the lord chancellor, who prepares the wax for the sealing of writs. Harris.

CHA'FER.† n. s. [ceapop, Sax. kever, Dutch.] An insect; a sort of yellow beetle.
Round ancient elms, with humming noise,
Full loud the chafer swarms rejoice.
T. Warton, Ode XI.

CHA'FERY. n. s.. A forge in an iron mill, where the iron is wrought into complete bars, and brought to perfection. Phillips.

CHAFF.† n. s. [ceaf, Sax. kaf, Dutch. Perhaps from the Sax. caf, swift; or the Gr. κηφος, light.]

1. The husks of corn that are separated by threshing and winnowing.
We shall be winnow'd with so rough a wind,
That ev'n our corn shall seem as light as chaff,
And good from bad find no partition.
Shakspeare, Hen. IV.
Pleasure with instruction should be join'd;
So take the corn, and leave the chaff behind.
Dryden.
He set before him a sack of wheat, as it had been just threshed out of the sheaf; he then bid him pick out the chaff from among the corn, and lay it aside by itself. Spectator.

2. It is used for any thing worthless.
Not meddling with the dirt and chaff of nature, that makes the spirit of the mind mud too.
Beaum. and Fl. Elder Brother.

To CHA'FFER.† v. n. [kauffen, Germ. to buy, Dr. Johnson says. But "exchange is the sense of the Hebrew word capher, and as all merchandises, amongst the ancients, were generally managed by exchanges of goods for goods; that word capher has travelled very far into our northern languages: thus we have in our English language the word to chaffer or make a bargain. Hence came the name of our Cheap-side in London." Harris on the 53d Chap. of Isaiah, p. 53. Chaffering is, in our old language, chepefaring, that is going to market, trading, bargaining.] To treat about a bargain; to haggle; to bargain.
That no man overgo, neither deceyve his brother in chaffering. Wicliffe, 1 Thess. iv.
Nor rode himself to Paul's, the publick fair,
To chaffer for preferments with his gold,
Where bishopricks and sinecures are sold.
Dryden, Fab.
The chaffering with dissenters, and dodging about this or t'other ceremony, is but like opening a few wickets, and leaving them a-jar. Swift.
In disputes with chairmen, when your master sends you to chaffer with them, take pity, and tell your master that they will not take a farthing less.
Swift.

To CHA'FFER. v. a. [The active sense is obsolete.]

1. To buy.
He chaffer'd chairs in which churchmen were set,
And breach of laws to privy farm did let.
Spenser, Hub. Tale.

2. To exchange.
Approaching nigh, he never staid to greet,
Ne chaffer words, proud courage to provoke.
Spenser, F. Q.

CHA'FFER.* n. s. [from the verb.] Merchandize; ware. The word perhaps is not wholly out of use.
Small chaffer doth ease.
Skelton's Poems, p. 132.
Deintes for damosels, chaffer far fet.
Ibid. p. 96.
The chief chaffer and merchandise of England.
Abp. Sandys, Serm. fol. 20.

CHA'FFERER. n. s. [from chaffer.] A buyer; bargainer; purchaser.

CHA'FFERN. n. s. [from eschauffer, Fr. to heat.] A vessel for heating water.
Dict.

CHA'FFERY. n. s. [from chaffer.] Traffick; the practice of buying and selling.
The third is, merchandize and chaffery, that is, buying and selling. Spenser, State of Ireland.

CHA'FFINCH. n. s. [from chaff and finch.] A bird so called, because it delights in chaff, and is by some much admired for its song. Phillips's World of Words. But Phillips is mistaken in saying that this bird is admired for its song.
The chaffinch and other small birds are injurious to some fruits. Mortimer's Husbandry.

CHA'FFLESS. adj. [from chaff.] Without chaff.
The love I bear him,
Made me to fan you thus; but the gods made you,
Unlike all others, chaffless. Shaks. Cymbeline.

CHA'FFWEED. n. s. [gnaphalium, Lat.] An herb; the same with cudweed; which see.

CHA'FFY.† adj. [from chaff] Like chaff; full of chaff; light.
If the straws be light and chaffy, and held at a reasonable distance, they will not rise unto the middle. Brown, Vulg. Err.
A very thief in love, a chaffy lord,
Nor worth the name of villain.
Beaum and Fl. Two Noble Kinsmen.
The most slight and chaffy opinion, if at a great remove from the present age, contracts a veneration. Glanville.

CHA'FINGDISH. n. s. [from chafe and dish.] A vessel to make any thing hot in; a portable grate for coals.
Make proof of the incorporation of silver and tin in equal quantities, whether it will endure the ordinary fire which belongeth to chafingdishes, posnets, and such other silver vessels.
Bacon, Physical Remains.

CHAGRI'N.† n. s. [from chagrin, Fr. which may have been formed from the Lat. acritas, sourness.] Ill humour; vexation; fretfulness; peevishness. It is pronounced shagreen.

Hear me, and touch Belinda with chagrin;
That single act gives half the world the spleen.
Pope.

I grieve with the old, for so many additional inconveniences and chagrins, more than their small remain of life seemed destined to undergo.
Pope, Letters.

To CHAGRI'N. v. a. [chagriner, Fr.] To vex; to put out of temper; to teaze; to make uneasy.

CHAIN. n. s. [chaine, Fr.]

1. A series of links fastened one within another.

And Pharaoh took off his ring, and put it upon Joseph's hand, and put a gold chain about his neck. Gen. xli. 42.

2. A bond; a manacle; a fetter; something with which prisoners are bound.

Still in constraint your suff'ring sex remains,
Or bound in formal, or in real chains. Pope.

3. A line of links with which land is measured.

A surveyor may as soon, with his chain, measure out infinite space, as a philosopher, by the quickest flight of mind, reach it, or, by thinking, comprehend it. Locke.

4. A series linked together; as, of causes, or thoughts; a succession; a subordination.

Those so mistake the Christian religion, as to think it is only a chain of fatal decrees, to deny all liberty of man's choice toward good or evil.
Hammond.

As there is pleasure in the right exercise of any faculty, so especially in that of right reasoning; which is still the greater, by how much the consequences are more clear, and the chains of them more long. Burnet, Theory of the Earth.

To CHAIN.† v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To fasten or bind with a chain.

They repeal daily any wholesome act established against the rich, and provide more piercing statutes daily to chain up and restrain the poor.
Shakspeare, Coriolanus.

The mariners he chained in his own gallies for slaves. Knolles.

Or, march'd I chain'd behind the hostile car,
The victor's pastime, and the sport of war!
Prior.

They, with joint force oppression chaining, set
Imperial justice at the helm. Thomson.

2. To enslave; to keep in slavery.

The monarch was ador'd, the people chain'd.
Prior.

This world, 'tis true,
Was made for Cæsar, but for Titus too:
And which more blest? who chain'd his country, say,
Or he, whose virtue sigh'd to lose a day? Pope.

3. To keep by a chain.

The admiral seeing the mouth of the haven chained, and the castles full of ordnance, and strongly manned, durst not attempt to enter.
Knolles, Hist. of the Turks.

4. To unite.

O Warwick, I do bend my knee with thine,
And in this vow do chain my soul with thine.
Shakspeare.

CHA'INPUMP. n. s. [from chain and pump.] A pump used in large English vessels, which is double, so that one rises as the other falls. It yields a great quantity of water, works easily, and is easily mended, but takes up a great deal of room, and makes a disagreeable noise. Chambers.

It is not long since the striking of the topmast, a wonderful great ease to great ships both at sea and in harbour, hath been devised, together with the chainpump, which takes up twice as much water as the ordinary did; and we have lately added the bonnet and the drabble.
Ralegh, Essays.

CHA'INSHOT. n. s. [from chain and shot.] Two bullets or half bullets, fastened together by a chain, which, when they fly open, cut away whatever is before them.

In sea fights oftentimes, a buttock, the brawn of the thigh, and the calf of the leg, are torn off by the chainshot, and splinters.
Wiseman, Surgery.

CHA'INWORK. n. s. [from chain and work.] Work with open spaces like the links of a chain.

Nets of chequerwork, and wreaths of chainwork, for the chapiters which were upon the tops of the pillars. 1 Kings, vii. 17.

CHAIR.† n. s. [chair, Fr. from cathedra, Lat. καθέδρα, Gr.]

1. A moveable seat.

Whether thou choose Cervantes' serious air,
Or laugh and shake in Rab'lais' easy chair,
Or praise the court, or magnify mankind,
Or thy griev'd country's copper chains unbind.
Pope.

If a chair be defined a seat for a single person, with a back belonging to it, then a stool is a seat for a single person, without a back.
Watts, Logick.

2. A seat of justice, or of authority.

He makes for England, here to claim the crown. —
— Is the chair empty? Is the sword unsway'd?
Is the king dead? Shaksp. Rich. III.

If thou be that princely eagle's bird,
Shew thy descent by gazing 'gainst the sun;
For chair and dukedom, throne and kingdom say;
Either that's thine, or else thou wert not his.
Shakspeare.

The honour'd gods
Keep Rome in safety, and the chairs of justice
Supply with worthy men. Shaksp. Coriol.

Her grace sat down to rest a while,
In a rich chair of state. Shaksp. Hen. VIII.

The committee of the commons appointed Mr. Pym to take the chair. Clarendon.

In this high temple, on a chair of state,
The seat of audience, old Latinus sate.
Dryden, Æneid.

3. A vehicle born by men; a sedan.

Think what an equipage thou hast in air,
And view with scorn two pages and a chair.
Pope.

4. A vehicle drawn by one horse.

E'en kings might quit their state to share
Contentment and a one-horse chair.
T. Warton, Phaeton and the One-Horse Chair.

CHA'IRMAN. n. s. [from chair and man.]

1. The president of an assembly.

In assemblies generally one person is chosen chairman or moderator, to keep the several speakers to the rules of order. Watts.

2. One whose trade it is to carry a chair.

One elbows him, one justles in the shole,
A rafter breaks his head, or chairman's pole.
Dryden.

Troy chairmen bore the wooden steed,
Pregnant with Greeks, impatient to be freed;
Those bully Greeks, who, as the moderns do,
Instead of paying chairmen, run them through.
Swift.

CHAISE.† n. s. [chaise, Fr.]

1. A carriage of pleasure drawn by one horse, Dr. Johnson says; which was the case formerly, before post-chaises were in request.

Instead of the chariot he might have said the chaise of government; for a chaise is driven by the person that sits in it. Addison.

[They] run,
They know not whither, in a chaise and one.
Pope, Imit. of Horace.

2. A chaise and pair; a chaise and four; the term of later days for a light vehicle, with four wheels, drawn by two or four horses.

CHA'LCEDONY.* See CALCEDONY.

CHALCO'GRAPHER. n. s. [χαλκογράφος, of χαλκὸς, brass, and γράφω, to write or engrave.] An engraver in brass.

CHALCO'GRAPHY. n. s. [χαλκογραφία.] Engraving in brass. See CALCOGRAPHY.

CHALDE'E.* adj. Denoting or relating to the language of Chaldea.

The names of the points or accents are all of a late original, all Chaldee, not any Hebrew.
Br. Walton, Considerator Considered, p. 247.

CHA'LDER.† } CHA'LDRON. } CHA'UDRON. } n. s. A dry English measure of coals, consisting of thirty-six bushels heaped up, according to the sealed bushel kept at Guildhall, London. The chaldron should weigh two thousand pounds. Chambers.

Mr. Malone observes, that the preceding notice of the weight must be a mistake or a misprint. A ton of coals weighs twenty hundred pounds; a chaldron should weigh 2800; so that a chaldron is to a ton, as seven to five. Mr. Malone means a London chaldron, which on an average weighs 28½ cwt. But a Newcastle chaldron, 53 cwt.

CHA'LICE. n. s. [calic, Sax. calice, Fr. calix, Lat.]

1. A cup; a bowl.

When in your motion you are hot,
And, that he calls for drink, I'll have prepar'd him
A chalice for the nonce. Shakspeare.

2. It is generally used for a cup used in acts of worship.

All the church at that time did not think emblematical figures unlawful ornaments of cups or chalices. Stillingfleet.

CHA'LICED. adj. [from calix, Lat. the cup of a flower.] Having a cell or cup: applied by Shakspeare to a flower, but now obsolete.

Hark, hark! the lark at heav'n's gate sings,
And Phœbus 'gins arise,
His steeds to water at these springs,
On chalic'd flowers that lies. Shaksp.

CHALK.† n. s. [cealc, Sax. calck, Welch; calch, Gael. cal or kal, Celt, soft stone.] Chalk is a white fossile, usually reckoned a stone, but by some ranked among the boles. It is used in medicine as an absorbent, and is celebrated for curing the heartburn. Chambers.

Chalk is of two sorts; the hard, dry, strong chalk, which is best for lime; and a soft, unctuous chalk, which is best for lands, because it easily dissolves with rain and frost. Mortimer.

With chalk I first describe a circle here,
Where these ethereal spirits must appear. Dryden.

CHALK for cheese. A very old expression, not yet disused, for the imposition practised by those who would substitute an inferiour thing for what is good.

Lo! how they feignen chalke for cheese.
Gower, Conf. Am. Prol.

To CHALK. v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To rub with chalk.
The beastly rabble then came down
From all the garrets in the town,
And stalls and shopboards in vast swarms,
With new chalk'd bills and rusty arms. Hudibras.
2. To manure with chalk.
Land that is chalked, if it is not well dunged, will receive but little benefit from a second chalking. Mortimer.
3. To mark or trace out as with chalk.
Being not propt by ancestry, whose grace
Chalks successours their way. Shakspeare.
His own mind chalked out to him the just proportions and measures of behaviour to his fellow-creatures. South.
With these helps I might at least have chalked out a way for others, to amend my errours in a like design. Dryden.
The time falls within the compass here chalked out by nature, very punctually.
Woodward, Nat. Hist.

CHALK-CUTTER. n. s. [from chalk and cut.] A man that digs chalk.
Shells, by the seamen called chalk-eggs, are dug up commonly in the chalk-pits, where the chalk-cutters drive a great trade with them.
Woodward.

CHALK-PIT. n. s. [from chalk and pit.] A pit in which chalk is dug. See CHALK-CUTTER.

CHALK-STONE.* n. s. [Sax. cealc-ꞇan.] A small piece of chalk.
He maketh all the stones of the altar as chalk-stones that are beaten asunder. Isaiah, xxvii. 9.

CHA'LKY. adj. [from chalk.]
1. Consisting of chalk; white with chalk.
As far as I could ken the chalky cliffs,
When from the shore the tempest beat us back,
I stood upon the hatches in the storm. Shaks.
That bellowing beats on Dover's chalky cliff.
Rowe.
2. Impregnated with chalk.
Chalky water towards the top of earth is too fretting. Bacon.

To CHA'LLENGE.† v. a. [old Fr. challenger, to claim.] Kelham, Norm. Dict. chalonger, to dispute, to contest, Lacombe. Calenger, calonger, "calomnier, accuser, disputer," Roquefort; and thus our old lexicography terms "chalenge or chalenging, a crafty and false accusation, calumnia." Huloet. One of the oldest meanings of challenge which I find, is the legal one of objecting to a witness, viz. in the tenth century. See CHALLENGE.
1. To call another to answer for an offence by combat.
The Prince of Wales stept forth before the king,
And, nephew, challeng'd you to single fight.
Shakspeare.
2. To call to a contest.
Thus form'd for speed, he challenges the wind,
And leaves the Scythian arrow far behind.
Dryden.
I challenge any man to make any pretence to power by right of fatherhood, either intelligible or possible. Locke.
3. To accuse.
Many of them be such losels and scatterlings, as that they cannot easily by any sheriff be gotten, when they are challenged for any such fact.
Spenser on Ireland.
Were the grac'd person of our Banquo present,
Whom I may rather challenge for unkindness.
Shakspeare.
4. [In law.] To object to the impartiality of any one. [See the noun.]
Though only twelve are sworn, yet twenty-four are to be returned, to supply the defects or want of appearance of those that are challeng'd off, or make default. Hale.
5. To claim as due.
That divine order, whereby the pre-eminence of chiefest acceptation is by the best things worthily challenged. Hooker.
Which of you, shall we say, doth love us most?
That we our largest bounty may extend,
Where nature doth with merit challenge.
Shakspeare.
And so much duty as my mother shew'd
To you, preferring you before her father;
So much I challenge that I may profess
Due to the Moor, my lord. Shakspeare.
Had you not been their father, these white flakes
Did challenge pity of them. Shakspeare.
So when a tyger sucks the bullock's blood,
A famish'd lion, issuing from the wood,
Roars loudly fierce, and challenges the food.
Dryden.
Hast thou yet drawn o'er young Juba?
That still would recommend thee more to Cæsar,
And challenge better terms. Addison.
6. To call any one to the performance of conditions.
I will now challenge you of your promise, to give me certain rules as to the principles of blazonry. Peacham on Drawing.

CHA'LLENGE.† n. s. [old Fr. chalunge, a claim. Kelham, Norm. Dict. "Challenge, moyens par lesquels on rejette le témoignage des jureurs. 930." Lacombe.]
1. A summons to combat.
I never in my life
Did hear a challenge urg'd more modestly.
Shakspeare.
2. A demand of something as due.
And he seide to hem, smyte ye no man wrongfully, nether make ye fals chalenge, and be ye apayed with your sondis. Wicliffe, St. Luke, iii.
Taking for his younglings cark,
Lest greedy eyes to them might challenge lay,
Busy with oker did the shoulders mark. Sidney.
There must be no challenge of superiority, or discountenancing of freedom.
Collier of Friendship.
3. [In law.] An exception taken either against persons or things; persons, as in assize to the jurours, or any one or more of them, by the prisoner at the bar. Challenge made to the jurours, is either made to the array, or to the polls: challenge made to the array is, when the whole number is excepted against, as partially empanelled: challenge to or by the poll, is when some one or more are excepted against, as not indifferent: challenge to the jurours is divided into challenge principal, and challenge for cause: challenge principal is that which the law allows without cause alleged, or farther examination; as a prisoner at the bar, arraigned upon felony, may peremptorily challenge to the number of twenty, one after another, of the jury empanelled upon him, alleging no cause.
Cowel.
You are mine enemy, I make my challenge,
You shall not be my judge. Shakspeare.

CHA'LLENGEABLE.* adj. [from challenge.] That may be called to account; liable to challenge.
How lords are challengeable by their vassals; and how homage may be dissolved, and adjudged by combat.
Sadler's Rights of the Kingdom, (1649,) p. 30.
God now uses his Majesty to succeed and suppress persons lately in power, highly challengeable for the want of mercy and truth.
Spencer's Righteous Ruler, (1660,) p. 47.

CHA'LLENGER.† n. s. [from challenge, old Fr. "les chalejurs, the challengers." Kelham, Norm. Dict.]
1. One that defies or summons another to combat.
Young man, have you challenged Charles the wrestler? —
No, fair princess; he is the general challenger.
Shakspeare.
Death was denounc'd;
He took the summons, void of fear,
And unconcernedly cast his eyes around,
As if to find and dare the griesly challenger.
Dryden.
2. One that claims superiority.
Whose worth
Stood challenger on mount of all the age,
For her perfections. Shakspeare.
3. A claimant; one that requires something as of right.
Earnest challengers there are of trial, by some publick disputation. Hooker.

CHALY'BEAN.* adj. [old Fr. chalibé, steeled, done over with steel; from the Lat. chalybes, men who were famous among the ancients for their iron works; chalybs, iron or steel.] Relating to steel well wrought or tempered.
The hammer'd cuirass,
Chalybean temper'd steel, and frock of mail

CHALY'BEATE. adj. [from chalybs, Lat. steel.] Impregnated with iron or steel; having the qualities of steel.
The diet ought to strengthen the solids, allowing spices and wine, and the use of chalybeate waters. Arbuthnot on Diet.

*CHAM. n. s. [Pers.] The sovereign prince of Tartary, by way of distinction; a lord of the Persian court, or a governour of a Persian province.
I will fetch you a toothpicker now from the farthest nich of Asia; bring you the length of Prester John's foot; fetch you a hair off the great Cham's beard. Shaks. Much Ado, &c. ii. 1.

CHAMA'DE.† n. s. [French.] The beat of the drum which declares a surrender, Dr. Johnson says. This, however, is the more modern acceptation of the word. It was formerly the sound of the trumpet; whence "sonner la chamade, to sound a parley; also, to summon, challenge, call on." Cotgrave. Menage derives the word from the Ital. chiamata, Lat. clamare, to cry out.
Several French battalions made a shew of resistance; but, upon our preparing to fill up a little fossé, in order to attack them, they beat the chamade, and sent us charte blanche. Addison.

CHA'MBER.† n. s. [chambre, Fr. siambr, Welch; cambre, Celt. low Lat. cambra, Gr. καμάρα.]
1. An apartment in a house; generally used for those appropriated to lodging.
Bid them come forth and hear me,
Or at their chamber door I'll beat the drum,
Till it cry, Sleep to death. Shakspeare.
When we have mark'd with blood those sleepy two,
Of his own chamber. Shakspeare.
A natural cave in a rock may have something not much unlike to parlours or chambers.
Bentley.
2. Any retired room.

The dark caves of death, and chambers of the grave. Prior.

3. Any cavity or hollow.

Petit has, from an examination of the figure of the eye, argued against the possibility of a film's existence in the posteriour chamber. Sharp.

4. A court of justice.

In the Imperial chamber this vulgar answer is not admitted, viz. I do not believe it, as the matter is propounded and alleged. Ayliffe, Parergon.

5. The lower part of a gun where the charge is lodged.

6. A species of cannon; a small piece of ordnance. "A chamber is a gun which stands erect on its breech. Such are used only on occasions of rejoicing, and are so contrived as to carry great charges, and thereby to make a noise more than proportioned to their bulk. They are called chambers because they are mere chambers to lodge powder; a chamber being the technical term for that cavity in a piece of ordnance which contains the combustibles. Some of them are still fired in the Park, and at the places opposite to the Parliament-house when the king goes thither." Note on Shakspeare, K. Hen. IV. ed. Steevens.

Names given them, as cannons, demi-cannons, chambers, arquebuse, musket, &c. Camden, Rem.

To come off the breach with his pike bent bravely, and to surgery bravely; to venture upon the charged chambers bravely. Shakspeare, K. Hen. IV. P. II.

7. The cavity where the powder is lodged in a mine.

CHAMBER *of London. The city of London obtained the title of Camera Regis, some centuries since; and was addressed by this appellation in our authors of elder times.

Welcome, sweet prince, to London, to your chamber. Shakspeare, K. Rich. III.

His majesty's triumphant passage from the Tower through his honourable city and chamber of London, being the 15th of March, 1603. Dekker's Entertainment given to K. James.

To CHA'MBER.† v. n. [from the noun.] To be wanton; to intrigue. See CHAMBERING.

Their chambering fortitude they did descry
By their soft maiden voice, and flickering eye. Niccols's Cuckow, 1607.

To CHA'MBER.* v. a. To shut up as in a chamber. The example from Shakspeare is given by Dr. Johnson, under the verb neuter.

To prove myself a loyal gentleman
Even in the best blood chamber'd in his bosom. Shakspeare, K. Rich. II.

A beggarly drunkard is haled to the stocks, whiles the rich is chambered up to sleep out his surfeit. Bp. Hall, Contempt. b. 4.

I that have now been chamber'd here alone,
Barr'd of my guardian, or of any else,
Am not for nothing at an instant freed
To fresh access. Ford, Trag. 'Tis Pity She's a Whore.

CHA'MBER-COUNCIL.* n. s. Private or secret council; confidential communication.

I have trusted thee, Camillo,
With all the nearest things to my heart, as well
My chamber-councils. Shaks. Winter's Tale, i. 2.

CHA'MBER-COUNSEL.* n. s. A counsellor who delivers his private opinion, but does not plead in the court of law. See CHAMBER-PRACTICE.

CHA'MBER-HANGING.* n. s. [from chamber and hang.] The tapestry or other furniture of a chamber.

Of chamber-hanging, pictures, &c. Shakspeare, Cymbeline.

CHA'MBER-LIE.* n. s. [from chamber and lie. See LIE.] Stale urine.

Your chamber-lie breeds fleas like a loach. Shakspeare, Hen. IV. P. I.

CHA'MBER-PRACTICE.* n. s. The practice of lawyers, who give their advice privately, without appearing in court.

Chamber-practice, and even private conveyancing, the most voluntary agency, are prohibited to them. Burke, on the Popery Laws.

CHA'MBERER.† n. s. [from chamber.]

1. A man of intrigue.

I have not those soft parts of conversation,
That chamberers have. Shakspeare.

2. A chamberlain; "a groom of a chamber." Huloet. Our old authors use it also for a chamber-maid. [old Fr. chambriere, f. g. Cotgrave. chambrier, m. g. camérier, Lat. camerarius.]

I ne held me never digne in no manere
To be your wife, ne yet your chamberere. Chaucer, Clerk's Tale.

Ladies faire with their gentilwomen chamberers also and lavenders. Arnold's Chronicle, fol. 193.

She [Q. Catharine Howard] had gotten also into her privy chamber, to be one of her chamberers, one of the women which had before lyen in the bed with her. Lord Herbert, Hist. of King Hen. VIII.

CHA'MBERFELLOW. n. s. [from chamber and fellow.] One that lies in the same chamber.

It is my fortune to have a chamberfellow, with whom I agree very well in many sentiments. Spectator.

CHA'MBERING.* n. s. [from chamber.] Intrigue; wantonness. It is a noun, both in the original, and in the translation, of the N. Test., but has been given as an example of the verb neuter. The passage is rendered by Wicliffe, "not in beddis and unchastitees."

Let us walk honestly as in the day, not in rioting and drunkenness, not in chambering and wantonness. Rom. xiii. 13.

News, &c. that chambering is counted a civiler quality, than playing at tables in the hall, though serving-men use both. Overbury's Charact. ed. 1627, sign. S. 8. b.

CHA'MBERLAIN.† n. s. [old Fr. camberlane, chamberlan.]

1. Lord great chamberlain of England is the sixth officer of the crown; a considerable part of his function is at a coronation; to him belongs the provision of every thing in the house of lords; he disposes of the sword of state; under him are the gentleman usher of the black rod, yeomen ushers, and door keepers. To this office the duke of Ancaster makes an hereditary claim. Chambers.

2. Lord chamberlain of the household has the oversight of all officers belonging to the king's chambers, except the precinct of the bedchamber. Chambers.

Humbly complaining to her deity,
Got my lord chamberlain his liberty. Shakspeare.

He was made lord steward, that the staff of chamberlain might be put into the hands of his brother. Clarendon.

A patriot is a fool in every age,
Whom all lord chamberlains allow the stage. Pope.

3. A servant who has the care of the chambers.

Think'st thou,
That the bleak air, thy boisterous chamberlain,
Will put thy shirt on warm. Shakspeare.
When Duncan is asleep,—
——————his two chamberlains
Will I with wine and wassel so convince. Shakspeare.

He serv'd at first Æmilia's chamberlain. Dryden, Fables.

4. A receiver of rents and revenues; as, chamberlain of the exchequer, of Chester, of the city of London. Chambers.

CHA'MBERMAID. n. s. [from chamber and maid.] A maid whose business is to dress a lady, and wait in her chamber.

Men will not hiss,
The chambermaid was named Ciss. B. Jonson.

Some coarse country wench, almost decay'd,
Trudges to town, and first turns chambermaid. Pope.

When he doubted whether a word were intelligible or no, he used to consult one of his lady's chambermaids. Swift.

If these nurses ever presume to entertain the girls with the common follies practised by chambermaids among us, they are publickly whipped. Swift.

CHA'MBLET.* } n. s. [from camelot. See
CHA'MELOT. } CAMELOT and CHAMLET.] Variegated stuff.

And wav'd upon like water-chamelot. Spenser, F. Q. iv. xi. 45.

Your cold water-chamblets, or your paintings
Spitted with copper. Beaum. and Fl. Philaster.

To CHA'MBLET. v. a. [from camelot. See CAMELOT.] To vary; to variegate.

Some have the veins more varied and chambleted; as oak, whereof wainscot is made. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

CHA'MBREL of a Horse. The joint or bending of the upper part of the hinder legs. Farrier's Dict.

CHAME'LEON. n. s. [χαμαιλεων.]

The chameleon has four feet, and on each foot three claws. Its tail is long; with this, as well as with its feet, it fastens itself to the branches of trees. Its tail is flat, its nose long, ending in an obtuse point; its back is sharp, its skin plaited, and jagged like a saw from the neck to the last joint of the tail, and upon its head it has something like a comb; like a fish it has no neck. Some have asserted, that it lives only upon air; but it has been observed to feed on flies catched with its tongue, which is about ten inches long, and three thick; made of white flesh, round, but flat at the end; or hollow and open, resembling an elephant's trunk. It also shrinks, and grows longer. This animal is said to assume the colour of those things to which it is applied; but our modern observers assure us, that its natural colour, when at rest and in the shade, is a bluish grey; though some are yellow, and others green, but both of a smaller kind. When it is exposed to the sun, the grey changes into a darker grey, inclining to a dun colour, and its parts, which have least of the light upon them, are changed into spots of different colours. The grain of its skin, when the light doth not shine upon it, is like cloth mixed with many colours. Sometimes when it is handled, it seems speckled with dark spots, inclining to green. If it be put upon a black hat, it appears to be of a violet colour; and sometimes if it be wrapped up in linen, it is white; but it changes colour only in some parts of the body. Calmet.

A chameleon is a creature about the bigness of an ordinary lizard; his head unproportionably big, and his eyes great; he moveth his head without writhing of his neck, which is inflexible, as a hog doth; his back crooked, his skin spotted with little tumours, less eminent nearer the belly; his tail slender and long; on each foot he hath five fingers, three on the outside, and two on the inside; his tongue of a marvellous length in respect of his body, and hollow at the end, which he will launch out to prey upon flies; of colour green, and of a dusky yellow, brighter and whiter towards the belly; yet spotted with blue, white, and red. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

I can add colours ev'n to the chameleon;
Change shapes with Proteus, for advantage.
Shakspeare.

One part devours the other, and leaves not so much as a mouthful of that popular air, which the chameleons gasp after. Decay of Piety.

The thin chameleon, fed with air, receives
The colour of the thing to which he cleaves.
Dryden.

As the chameleon, which is known
To have no colours of his own,
But borrows from his neighbour's hue
His white, or black, his green, or blue. Prior.

To CHAME'LEONIZE.* v. a. [from chameleon.] To change into many colours. Dict.

To CHA'MFER.† v. a. [written chanfer in our old lexicography: "chanfering in stone or timber," Barret. Old Fr. "chanfrain, a chanfering, or a channel, furrow, or streak, in stone-work," Cotgrave. But Sherwood, Cotgrave's contemporary, writes it "chamfret, to slope the edge of a stone."]

1. To channel; to make furrows or gutters upon a column.
2. To wrinkle.

Comes the breme winter with chamfred brows,
Full of wrinkles and frosty furrows.
Spenser, Shep. Cal. Feb.

CHA'MFER. } n. s. [from To CHAMFER.]
CHA'MFRET. } A small furrow or gutter on a column.

CHA'MLET. n. s. [See CAMELOT.] Stuff made originally of camel's hair.

To make a chamlet, draw five lines, waved overthwart, if your diapering consist of a double line. Peacham on Drawing.

CHA'MOIS. n. s. [chamois, Fr.] An animal of the goat kind, whose skin is made into soft leather, called among us shammy.

These are the beasts which you shall eat, the ox, the sheep, and wild ox, and the chamois. Deut. xiv. 5.

CHA'MOMILE. n. s. [χαμαιμῆλον. See CAMOMILE.] An odoriferous plant.

Cool violets, and orpine growing still,
Embathed balm, and cheerful galingale,
Fresh costmary, and breathful chamomile,
Dull poppy, and drink quick'ning setuale.
Spenser.

For though the chamomile, the more it is trodden on the faster it grows; yet youth, the more it is wasted, the sooner it wears. Shakspeare.

Posset drink with chamomile flowers.
Floyer on the Humours.

To CHAMP. v. a. [champayer, Fr.]

1. To bite with a frequent action of the teeth.

Coffee and opium are taken down, tobacco but in smoke, and betel is but champed in the mouth with a little lime. Bacon.

The fiend reply'd not, overcome with rage;
But, like a proud steed rein'd, went haughty on,
Champing his iron curb. Milton, P.L.

At his command,
The steeds caparison'd with purple stand,
And champ betwixt their teeth the foaming gold.
Dryden.

2. To devour, with violent action of the teeth.

A tobacco pipe happened to break in my mouth, and the pieces left such a delicious roughness on my tongue, that I champed up the remaining part. Spectator.

To CHAMP. v. n. To perform frequently the action of biting.

Muttering and champing as though his cud had troubled him, he gave occasion to Musidoris to come near him. Sidney.

They began to repent of that they had done, and irefully to champ upon the bit they had taken into their mouths. Hooker.

His jaws did not answer equally to one another; but by his frequent motion and champing with them, it was evident they were neither luxated nor fractured. Wiseman.

CHAMPA'GNE.* n. s. [from the province of Champagne in France.] Wine so called.

Quick,
As is the wit it gives, the gay champagne.
Thomson, Autumn.

CHA'MPAIGN.† n. s. [campagne, Fr. Our word was formerly written champion, and champian; and, in later times, champain; as in Milton's own editions of his poetry. See the adjective.] A flat open country.

In the abuses of the customs, meseems you have a fair champaign laid open to you, in which you may at large stretch out your discourse. Spenser, State of Ireland.

The Canaanites which dwell in the champaign over against Gilgal. Deut. xi. 30.

There were very many in the open valley, [in the margin champaign.] Ezek. xxxvii. 2.

Of all these bounds,
With shadowy forest and with champaigns rich'd,
We make thee lady, Shakspeare.

If two bordering princes have their territory meeting on an open champaign, the more mighty will continually seek occasion to extend his limits unto the further border thereof. Ralegh.

Sir John Norris maintained a retreat without disarray, by the space of some miles, part of the way champaign, unto the city of Gaunt, with less loss of men than the enemy. Bacon.

From his side two rivers flow'd,
The one winding, the other straight, and left between
Fair champaign, with less rivers interven'd.
Milton, P.L.

CHA'MPAIGN, or CHA'MPAIN.* adj. [from the substantive.] Open, or flat.

Thee all the champion fields aboute, both hill and vale doe crie;
And all the pasture grounds.
Turbervile, Mant. Ecl. 26.

The champain head
Of a steep wilderness. Milton, P.L.

CHA'MPER.* n. s. [from To champ.] A biter or nibbler; facetiously introduced into the Spectator, but a serious word of elder times; for a horse is "a bridle-champer." Sherwood.

Damsels, whether dignified or distinguished under some or all of the following denominations, to wit, trash-eaters, oatmeal-chewers, pipe-champers. Spectator, No. 431.

CHA'MPERTORS.† n. s. [old Fr. champarteur, from champart; which is from the Lat. campi pars. Our word should be written champartors. Such as move suits, or cause them to be moved, either by their own or others procurement, and pursue, at their proper costs, to have part of the land in contest, or part of the gains. Cowel.

CHA'MPERTY.† n. s. [champart, Fr. See CHAMPERTOR.] A maintenance of any man in his suit while depending, upon condition to have part of the thing when it is recovered. Cowel.

They bring grace to his good cheer, but no peace or benediction else to his house; these made the champarty, he contributed the law, and both joined in the divinity. Milton, Colasterion.

He thought himself in duty and in conscience bound to clear those points from errour which he delivered, lest sacred authority might come in for maintenance and champerty, as they would have it. Montagu, App. to Cæs. p. 5.

CHAMPI'GNON. n. s. [champignon, Fr.] A kind of mushroom.

He viler friends with doubtful mushrooms treats,
Secure for you, himself champignons eats. Dryden.

It has the resemblance of a large champignon before it is opened, branching out into a large round knob. Woodward.

CHA'MPION.† n. s. [champion, Fr. campione, Ital. campio, low Lat. campus, Lat. a field; kamp, old Goth. a battle; Sax. campian to fight; Germ. kampen. Serenius adduces the Goth. kampe, or kappe, pugil. a champion.]

1. A man who undertakes a cause in single combat.

In many armies, the matter should be tried by duel between two champions. Bacon.

For hot, cold, moist, and dry, four champions fierce,
Strive here for mast'ry, and to battle bring
Their embryon atoms. Milton, P.L.

O light of Trojans, and support of Troy,
Thy father's champion, and thy country's joy!
Dryden.

At length the adverse admirals appear,
The two bold champions of each country's right.
Dryden.

2. A hero; a stout warriour; one bold in contest.

A stouter champion never handled sword.
Shakspeare.

This makes you incapable of conviction, and they applaud themselves as zealous champions for truth, when indeed they are contending for errour. Locke.

3. In law.

In our common law, champion is taken no less for him that trieth the combat in his own case, than for him that fighteth in the case of another. Cowel.

To CHA'MPION. v. a. [from the noun.] To challenge to the combat.

The seed of Banquo, kings!
Rather than so, come fate, into the list,
And champion me to the utterance. Shakspeare.

CHA'MPIONESS.* n. s. [from champion.] A female warriour.

The championess he thought he saw and knew. Fairfax, Tasso.

The championess had harnessed her peacocks to go for Samos. Dryden, Amphitryon.

CHANCE.† n. s. [chance, Fr. from the Lat. cadentia.]

1. Fortune; the cause of fortuitous events.

As the unthought accident is guilty
Of what we wildly do, so we profess
Ourselves to be the slaves of chance, and flies
Of every wind that blows. Shakspeare.

The only man, of all that chance could bring
To meet my arms, was worth the conquering. Dryden.

Chance is but a mere name, and really nothing in itself; a conception of our minds, and only a compendious way of speaking, whereby we would express, that such effects as are commonly attributed to chance, were verily produced by their true and proper causes, but without their design to produce them. Bentley.

2. Fortune; the act of fortune; what fortune may bring: applied to persons.

These things are commonly not observed, but left to take their chance. Bacon's Essays.

3. Accident; casual occurrence; fortuitous event.

The race is not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong; nor bread to the wise, nor riches to men of understanding; nor yet favour to men of skill: but time and chance happeneth to them all. Eccles. ix. 11. The meaning is, that the success of these outward things is not always carried by desert; but by chance in regard of us, though by PROVIDENCE in regard of God. Hakewill on Providence, p. 451.

To say a thing is a chance or casualty, as it relates to second causes, is not profaneness, but a great truth; as signifying no more, than that there are some events besides the knowledge and power of second agents. South.

The beauty I beheld, has struck me dead;
Unknowingly she strikes, and kills by chance;
Poison is in her eyes, and death in ev'ry glance. Dryden.

All nature is but art unknown to thee;
All chance direction, which thou canst not see. Pope.

4. Event; success; luck: applied to things.

Now we'll together, and the chance of goodness
Be like our warranted quarrel! Shakspeare.

5. Misfortune; unlucky accident.

You were us'd
To say, extremity was the trier of spirits,
That common chances common men could bear. Shakspeare.

6. Possibility of any occurrence.

A chance, but chance may lead, where I may meet
Some wand'ring spirit of heav'n, by fountain side,
Or in thick shade retir'd. Milton, P. L.

Then your ladyship might have a chance to escape this address. Swift.

CHANCE.† adj. Happening by chance.

Now should they part, malicious tongues would say,
They met like chance companions on the way. Dryden.

I would not take the gift,
Which, like a toy dropt from the hands of fortune,
Lay for the next chance comer. Dryden.

Besides these there were five chance auditors. Swift.

CHANCE.* adv. By chance; perchance.

If chance by lowly contemplation led,
Some kindred spirit shall enquire thy fate. Gray's Elegy.

To CHANCE. v. n. [from the noun.] To happen; to fall out; to fortune.

Think what a chance thou chancest on; but think;—
Thou hast thy mistress still. Shakspeare.

How chance thou art not with the prince thy brother? Shakspeare.

Ay, Casca, tell us what hath chanc'd to-day,
That Cæsar looks so sad? Shakspeare.

He chanced upon divers of the Turks victuallers, whom he easily took. Knolles, Hist. of the Turks.

I chose the safer sea, and chanc'd to find
A river's mouth impervious to the wind. Pope, Odyssey.

CHA'NCEFUL. adj. [chance and full.] Hazardous. Out of use.

Myself would offer you to accompany
In this adventurous chanceful jeopardy. Spenser.

CHANCE-MEDLEY.† n. s. [from chance and medley, Dr. Johnson says. Some have considered it as a corruption of the Fr. chaude meslée, a fault committed in a sudden tumult; and Coles, in his English vocabulary, gives chaud-melle, with this meaning. The Scotch also have the expression chaud-melle, for a sudden quarrel. Kelham, in his Norman dictionary, says, that chaud-melle "is a hot or sudden debate, corruptly called chance-medley." Fr. chaud, hot; and melle, an affray.] In law.

The casual slaughter of a man, not altogether without the fault of the slayer, when ignorance or negligence is joined with the chance; as if a man lop trees by an highway side, by which many usually travel, and cast down a bough, not giving warning to take heed thereof, by which bough one passing by is slain: in this case he offends, because he gave no warning, that the party might have taken heed to himself. Cowel.

If such an one should have the ill hap, at any time, to strike a man dead with a smart saying, it ought, in all reason and conscience, to be judged but a chance-medley. South.

CHA'NCEABLE. adj. [from chance.] Accidental.

The trial thereof was cut off by the chanceable coming thither of the king of Iberia. Sidney.

CHA'NCEL.† n. s. [from cancelli, Lat. lattices, with which the chancel was inclosed. κάγγελα, κάγγελοι, vox Græco-barb. Cancelli. "Ita vocantur in templis sacra adyta, velis, cancellis, et fenestratis januis obvelata, quibus ab accessu indigni arcentur." V. Meursii Gloss. et Critopuli Emend. in Meurs. p. 39.] The eastern part of the church, in which the altar is placed.

Whether it be allowable or no, that the minister should say service in the chancel. Hooker.

The chancel of this church is vaulted with a single stone of four feet in thickness, and an hundred and fourteen in circumference. Addison on Italy.

CHA'NCELLOR.† n. s. [cancellarius, Lat. chancellier, Fr. from cancellare, literas vel scriptum linea per medium ducta damnare, and seemeth of itself likewise to be derived à cancellis, which signify all one with κιγκλίδες, a lattice; that is, a thing made of wood or iron bars, laid crossways one over another, so that a man may see through them in and out. It may be thought that judgement seats were compassed in with bars, to defend the judges and other officers from the press of the multitude, and yet not to hinder any man's view, Dr. Johnson says: Cassiodorus, deducing the name from cancelli, adds that "chancellors examined matters within places severed apart, enclosed with partitions of such cross bars. Regard, saith he to the chancellor, what name you bear; it cannot be hidden, which you do within lattesses; for you keep your grates lightsome, your bars open, and your doors as transparent as windows. Whereby it is evident, that he sate within grates, where he was to be seen on every side; and thereof it may be thought he took his name," Jus Sigilli, or the law of England, 1673, p. 7. Others derive it from his power of cancelling writings. See To CANCEL.

Quæsitus regni tibi cancellarius Angli,
Primus solliciti mente petendus erit.
Hic est, qui regni leges cancellat iniquas,
Et mandata pii principis æqua facit.

Verses of Nigel de Wetekre to the Bishop of Ely, chancellor to Richard I.

Our word was formerly written chanceller; so Lord Bacon, in the original editions of his works, repeatedly writes it; and perhaps it should be so, when we consider the derivation chancellier.]

1. The highest judge of the law.

Cancellarius, at the first, signified the registers or actuaries in court; grapharios, scil. qui conscribendis & excipiendis judicum actis dant operam. But this name is greatly advanced, and not only in other kingdoms but in this, is given to him that is the chief judge in causes of property; for the chancellor hath power to moderate and temper the written law, and subjecteth himself only to the law of nature and conscience. Cowel.

Turn out, you rogue, how like a beast you lie:
Go, buckle to the law: Is this an hour
To stretch your limbs? you'll ne'er be chancellor. Dryden, jun.

Aristides was a person of the strictest justice, and best acquainted with the laws, as well as forms of their government; so that he was in a manner chancellor of Athens. Swift.

2. CHANCELLOR in the Ecclesiastical Court. A bishop's lawyer; a man trained up in the civil and canon law, to direct the bishops in matters of judgment, relating as well to criminal as to civil affairs in the church. Ayliffe's Parergon.

3. CHANCELLOR of a Cathedral. A dignitary; whose office it is to superintend the regular exercise of devotion.

4. CHANCELLOR of the Exchequer. An officer who sits in that court, and in the exchequer chamber. He has power, with others, to compound for forfeitures on penal statutes, bonds and recognizances entered into by the king. He has great authority in managing the royal revenue, and in matters of first fruits. The court of equity is in the exchequer chamber, and is held before the lord treasurer, chancellor, and barons, as that of common law before the barons only. Cowel. Chamb.

5. CHANCELLOR of an University. The principal magistrate, who, at Oxford, holds his office during life, but, at Cambridge, he may be elected every three years.

6. CHANCELLOR of the Order of the Garter, and other military orders, is an officer who seals the commissions and mandates of the chapter and assembly of the knights, keeps the register of their deliberations, and delivers their acts under the seal of the order. Chambers.

CHA'NCELLORSHIP. n. s. The office of chancellor.

The Sunday after More gave up his chancellorship of England, he came himself to his wife's pew, and used the usual words of his gentleman-usher, Madam, my lord is gone. Camden.

CHA'NCERY.† n. s. [from chancellor; probably chancellery; then shortened.] The court of equity and conscience, moderating the rigour of other courts, that are tied to the letter of the law; whereof the lord chancellor of England is the chief judge, or the lord keeper of the great seal. Cowel.

The contumacy and contempt of the party must be signified in the court of chancery, by the bishops letters under the seal episcopal. Ayliffe's Parergon.

The mercy, and the pardon, and the huge moderation of that court, [the Gospel,] though it hath mollified the strict law into never so much chancery, will not proceed further, and mollify obedience into libertinism. Hammond, Serm. vi.

CHA'NCRE. n. s. [chancre, Fr.] An ulcer usually arising from venereal maladies.

It is possible he was not well cured, and would have relapsed with a chancre. Wiseman.

CHA'NCROUS. adj. [from chancre.] Having the qualities of a chancre; ulcerous.

You may think I am too strict in giving so many internals in the cure of so small an ulcer as a chancre, or rather a chancrous callus. Wiseman.

CHANDELI'ER.† n. s. [chandelier, Fr.] A branch for candles.

Lamps, branches, or chandeliers, (as we now modishly call them,) were adorned with the flowers then most in season.

Stukeley, Palæogr. Sacra, (1736,) p. 69.

CHA'NDLER.† n. s. [chandelier, Fr.]

1. An artisan whose trade it is to make candles, or a person who sells them.

The sack that thou hast drunken me, would have bought me lights as good cheap at the dearest chandlers in Europe. Shakspeare.

But whether black or lighter dies are worn,
The chandler's basket, on his shoulder born,
With tallow spots thy coat. Gay.

2. Formerly, a candlestick. Ray's North Country Words, p. 14. It is still employed in this sense in Scotland. It is an abbreviation of the Fr. chandelier; a word which our ancestors disdained to adopt; for Stukeley sneers at the modish introduction of it, in 1736. See CHANDELIER.

3. A corn-chandler, a seller of corn. See CORN-CHANDLER.

CHA'NDLERLY.* adj. [from chandler.] Like a chandler.

To be sconced our head money, our twopences in their chandlerly shopbook of Easter.

Milton, of Ref. in Eng. B. 2.

CHA'NDLERY.* n. s. [from chandler.] The articles sold by a chandler.

CHA'NDRY.* n. s. [low Lat. eschanderia.] The place where the candles are kept. Blount.

To mistake six torches from the chandry, and give them one. B. Jonson, Masques.

CHA'NFRIN. n. s. [old French.] The forepart of the head of a horse, which extends from under the ears, along the interval between the eyebrows, down to his nose. Farrier's Dict.

To CHANGE. v. a. [changer, Fr. cambia, Lat.]

1. To put one thing in the place of another.

He that cannot look into his own estate, had need choose well whom he employeth, and change them often; for new are more timorous, and less subtile. Bacon's Essays.

2. To quit any thing for the sake of another: with for before the thing taken or received.

Persons grown up in the belief of any religion, cannot change that for another, without applying their understanding duly to consider and compare both. South.

The French and we still change; but here's the curse,
They change for better, and we change for worse!
Dryden.

3. To give and take reciprocally: with the particle with before the person to whom we give, and from whom we take.

To secure thy content, look upon those thousands, with whom thou wouldst not, for any interest, change thy fortune and condition.

Bp. Taylor, Rule of Living Holy.

4. To alter; to make other than it was.

Thou shalt not see me blush,
Nor change my countenance for this arrest;
A heart unspotted is not easily daunted. Shaks.

Whatsoever is brought upon thee, take chearfully, and be patient when thou art changed to a low estate. Eccles. ii. 4.

For the elements were changed in themselves by a kind of harmony, like as in psaltery notes change the name of the tune, and yet are always sounds. Wisdom, xix. 18.

5. To mend the disposition or mind.

I would she were in heaven, so she could
Intreat some pow'r to change this currish Jew.
Shakspeare.

6. To discount a larger piece of money into several smaller.

A shopkeeper might be able to change a guinea, or a moidore, when a customer comes for a crown's worth of goods. Swift.

7. To change a horse, or to change hand, is to turn or bear the horse's head from one hand to the other, from the left to the right, or from the right to the left. Farrier's Dict.

To CHANGE. v. n.

1. To undergo change; to suffer alteration: as, his fortune may soon change, though he is now so secure.

One Julia, that his changing thought forgot,
Would better fit his chamber. Shakspeare.

2. To change, as the moon; to begin a new monthly revolution.

I am weary of this moon; would he would change. Shakspeare.

CHANGE.† n. s. [from the verb.]

1. An alteration of the state of any thing.

All the days of my appointed time will I wait, till my change come. Job, xiv. 14.

Since I saw you last,
There is a change upon you. Shakspeare.

2. A succession of one thing in the place of another.

O wonderous changes of a fatal scene,
Still varying to the last! Dryden.

Nothing can cure this part of ill breeding, but change and variety of company, and that of persons above us. Locke.

Empires by various turns shall rise and set;
While thy abandon'd tribes shall only know
A different master, and a change of time. Prior.

Hear how Timotheus' various lays surprize,
And bid alternate passions fall and rise!
While, at each change, the son of Libyan Jove
Now burns with glory, and then melts with love.
Pope.

3. The time of the moon in which it begins a new monthly revolution.

Take seeds or roots, and set some of them immediately after the change, and others of the same kind immediately after the full.

Bacon, Natural History.

4. Novelty; a state different from the former.

The hearts
Of all his people shall revolt from him,
And kiss the lips of unacquainted change.
Shakspeare.

Our fathers did, for change, to France repair,
And they, for change, will try our English air.
Dryden.

5. [In ringing.] An alteration of the order in which a set of bells is sounded.

Four bells admit twenty-four changes in ringing, and five bells one hundred and twenty.

Holder, Elements of Speech.

Easy it may be to contrive new postures, and ring other changes upon the same bells. Norris.

6. That which makes a variety; that which may be used for another of the same kind.

I will now put forth a riddle unto you; if you can find it out, then I will give you thirty sheets, and thirty change of garments. Judges, xiv. 12.

7. Small money, which may be given for larger pieces.

Wood buys up our old halfpence, and from thence the present want of change arises; but supposing not one farthing of change in the nation, five and twenty thousand pounds would be sufficient. Swift.

8. Change for exchange; a place where persons meet to traffick and transact mercantile affairs. [old Fr. change, place de commerce, Roquef. cambium, Lat.]

The bar, the bench, the change, the schools, and pulpit, are full of quacks, jugglers, and plagiaries. L'Estrange.

CHA'NGEABLE. adj. [from change.]

1. Subject to change; fickle; inconstant.

A steady mind will admit steady methods and counsels; there is no measure to be taken of a changeable humour. L'Estrange.

As I am a man, I must be changeable; and sometimes the gravest of us all are so, even upon ridiculous accidents. Dryden.

2. Possible to be changed.

The fibrous or vascular parts of vegetables seem scarce changeable in the alimentary duct.

Arbuthnot on Aliments.

3. Having the quality of exhibiting different appearances.

Now the taylor make thy doublet of changeable taffata; for thy mind is a very opal. Shakspeare.

CHA'NGEABLENESS. n. s. [from changeable.]

1. Inconstancy; fickleness.

At length he betrothed himself to one worthy to be liked, if any worthiness might excuse so unworthy a changeableness. Sidney.

There is no temper of mind more unmanly than that changeableness with which we are too justly branded by all our neighbours.
Addison, Freeholder.

2. Susceptibility of change.
If how long they are to continue in force, be no where expressed, then have we no light to direct our judgment concerning the changeableness or immutability of them, but considering the nature and quality of such laws. Hooker.

CHA'NGEABLY. adv. [from changeable.] Inconstantly.

CHA'NGEFUL. adj. [from change and full.] Full of change; inconstant; uncertain; mutable; subject to variation; fickle.
Unsound plots, and changeful orders, are daily devised for her good, yet never effectually prosecuted. Spenser on Ireland.
Britain, changeful as a child at play,
Now calls in princes, and now turns away. Pope.

CHA'NGELESS.* adj. [from change and less.] Without change; constant; not subject to variation.
Thus for each change my changeless heart I fortify. Sidney, Arcad. b. 2.
To teach each hollow grove, and shrubby hill,
Each murmuring brook, and solitary vale,
To sound our love, and to our song accord,
Wearying echo with one changeless word.
Bp. Hall, Defiance to Envy.

CHA'NGELING. n. s. [from change; the word arises from an odd superstitious opinion, that the fairies steal away children, and put others that are ugly and stupid in their places.]

1. A child left or taken in the place of another.
And her base elfin breed there for thee left:
Such men do changelings call, so chang'd by fairies theft. Spenser, F. Q.
She, as her attendant, hath
A lovely boy stol'n from an Indian king;
She never had so sweet a changeling. Shakspeare.

2. An idiot; a fool; a natural.
Changelings and fools of heav'n, and thence shut out,
Wildly we roam in discontent about. Dryden.
Would any one be a changeling, because he is less determined by wise considerations than a wise man? Locke.

3. One apt to change; a waverer.
Of fickle changelings and poor discontents
That gape and rub the elbow at the news
Of hurly-burly innovation. Shakspeare.
'Twas not long
Before from world to world they swung;
As they had turn'd from side to side.
And as they changelings liv'd, they died. Hudibras.

4. Any thing changed and put in the place of another: in ludicrous speech.
I folded the writ up in form of the other,
Subscrib'd it, gave the impression, plac'd it safely,
The changeling never known. Shakspeare.

CHA'NGER.† n. s. [old Fr. changeor, mod. changeur.]

1. One that is employed in changing or discounting money; money-changer.
He turnede upsidoun the boordis of chaungeris, and the chayeris of men that solden culveris.
Wicliffe, St. Matt. xxi. 12.
The changers of money sitting. St. John, ii. 14.

2. One who alters the form of any thing.
Changer of all things, yet immutable,
Before and after all, the first and last.
G. Fletcher, Christ's Triumph, ii. st. 40.
Effect most strange!
At last the changer shar'd herself the change.
Eusden, Ovid, Met. 4.

3. One who forsakes the cause which he had espoused.
Meddle not with them that are given to change, [in the margin, changers.] Prov. xxiv. 21.

CHA'NNEL.† n. s. [old Fr. chanel; bas Bret. canol; modern Fr. canal; Lat. canalis.]

1. The hollow bed of running waters.
It is not so easy, now that things are grown into an habit, and have their certain course, to change the channel, and turn their streams another way.
Spenser on Ireland.
Draw them to Tyber's bank, and weep your tears
Into the channel, till the lowest stream
Do kiss the most exalted shores of all. Shaks.
So th' injur'd sea, which from her wonted course,
To gain some acres, avarice did force;
If the new banks, neglected once, decay,
No longer will from her old channel stay. Waller.
Had not the said strata been dislocated, some of them elevated, and others depressed, there would have been no cavity or channel to give reception to the water of the sea. Woodward.
The tops of mountains and hills will be continually washed down by the rains, and the channels of rivers abraded by the streams. Bentley.

2. Any cavity drawn longways.
Complaint and hot desires, the lover's hell,
And scalding tears, that wore a channel where they fell. Dryden, Fables.

3. A strait or narrow sea, between two countries: as the British Channel between Britain and France; St. George's Channel between Britain and Ireland.

4. A gutter or furrow of a pillar.

5. A kennel in the street. [old Fr. chenal, a channel or gutter. Cotgrave.]
As if a channel should be call'd the sea.
Shakspeare, K. Henry VI.

To CHA'NNEL. v. a. [from the noun.] To cut any thing in channels.
No more shall trenching war channel her fields,
Nor bruise her flowrets with the armed hoofs
Of hostile paces. Shakspeare.
The body of this column is perpetually channelled, like a thick plaited gown.
Wotton, Architecture.
Torrents, and loud impetuous cataracts,
Roll down the lofty mountain's channell'd sides.
And to the vale convey their foaming tides.
Blackmore.

CHA'NSON.* n. s. [old Fr. chanson.] A song.
The first row of the pious chanson will shew you more, Shakspeare, Hamlet.
These [Christmas carols] were festal chansons for enlivening the merriments of the Christmas celebrity. Warton, Hist. of Eng. Poet. iii. 142.

To CHANT. v. a. [chanter, Fr.]

1. To sing.
Wherein the chearful birds of sundry kind
Do chant sweet musick. Spenser, F. Q.

2. To celebrate by song.
The poets chant it in the theatres, the shepherds in the mountains. Bp. Bramhall.

3. To sing in the cathedral service.

To CHANT. v. n. To sing; to make melody with the voice.
They chant to the sound of the viol, and invent to themselves instruments of musick. Amos, vi. 7.
Heav'n heard his song, and hasten'd his relief;
And chang'd to snowy plumes his hoary hair,
And wing'd his flight, to chant aloft in air.
Dryden.

CHANT.† n. s. [from the verb.]

1. Song; melody.
A pleasant grove,
With chant of tuneful birds resounding loud,
Milton, P. R.

2. A part of cathedral service, both with and without the organ.
I have now taken notice of every musical part of our cathedral service, except that of the unaccompanied chant used in the verses and responses, and that other which is accompanied by the organ in the use of the Psalter.
Mason on Church Musick, p. 154.

CHA'NTER.† n. s. [from chant.]

1. A singer; a songster.
You curious chanters of the wood,
That warble forth dame Nature's lays.
Wotton, Rem. p. 379.
Jove's etherial lays, resistless fire,
The chanter's soul, and raptur'd song inspire,
Instinct divine! nor blame severe his choice,
Warbling the Grecian woes with harp and voice.
Pope.

2. He who, in a cathedral, presides over the choir; or, as Huloet says, who is the chief singer. [Lat. cantor, præcentor.] And simply, the dignitary of a cathedral; and the priest of a chantry.
The chanter chorister is to begin De Sancta Maria, &c. The respond is, Felix namque, &c.
Gregory on the Child-Bishop, Posth. p. 115.
A certain revenue, sufficient for a chanter to one chapel. Aubrey, Berk. iii. 24.
A country gentleman related a famous quarrel that had lately happened, in a little church in his province, between the treasurer and the chantor, the two principal dignitaries of that church.
Dr. Warton, Essay on Pope.
He orders many of them [psalms] to be sung by the rector chori, or chantor, and the quier, or choir, alternately.
Warton, Hist. of Eng. Poetry, iii. 183.

CHA'NTICLEER. n. s. [from chanter and clair, Fr.] The name given to the cock, from the clearness and loudness of his crow.
And chearful chanticleer, with his note shrill,
Had warned once, that Phœbus' fiery car
In haste was climbing up the eastern hill. Spenser.
Hark, hark, I hear
The strain of strutting chanticleer. Shakspeare.
Stay, the chearful chanticleer
Tells you that the time is near. B. Jonson.
These verses were mentioned by Chaucer, in the description of the sudden stir, and panical fear, when Chanticleer the cock was carried away by Reynard the fox. Camden, Remains.
Within this homestead liv'd without a peer,
For crowing loud, the noble chanticleer.
Dryden, Fables.

CHA'NTRESS.† n. s. [old Fr. chanteresse, "a chaunteress, a woman that sings, or sings much." Cotgrave.] A woman singer.
Sweet bird, that shun'st the noise of folly,
Most musical, most melancholy,
Thee, chantress, oft the woods among,
I woo to hear thy even-song. Milton, Il Pens.

CHA'NTRY.† n. s. [old Fr. chanterie.]
Chantry is a church or chapel endowed with lands, or other yearly revenue, for the maintenance of one or more priests, daily to sing mass for the souls of the donors, and such others as they appoint. Cowel.
Now go with me, and with this holy man,
Into the chantry by;
And, underneath that consecrated roof,
Plight me the full assurance of your faith. Shaks.

CHA'OS.† n. s. [chaos, Lat. from the Gr. χάος. This word is very unusual in the plural number; but Donne gives it.]

1. The mass of matter supposed to be in confusion before it was divided by the creation into its proper classes and elements.

The whole universe would have been a confused chaos, without beauty or order. Bentley.

2. Confusion; irregular mixture.

Had I followed the worst, I could not have brought church and state to such a chaos of confusions, as some have done. King Charles.

Their reason sleeps, but mimick fancy wakes,
Supplies her parts, and wild ideas takes
From words and things, ill sorted, and misjoin'd,
The anarchy of thought, and chaos of the mind.
Dryden.

3. Any thing where the parts are undistinguished.

Oft did we grow
To be two chaosses, when we did show
Care to aught else. Donne, Poems, p. 36.

We shall have nothing but darkness and a chaos within, whatever order and light there be in things without us. Locke.

Pleas'd with a work, where nothing's just or fit,
One glaring chaos and wild heap of wit. Pope.

CHAO'TICK. adj. [from chaos.] Resembling chaos; confused.

When the terraqueous globe was in a chaotick state, and the earthy particles subsided, then those several beds were, in all probability, reposited in the earth. Derham.

To CHAP.† v. a. [kappen, Dutch, to cut. This word seems originally the same with chop; nor were they probably distinguished at first, otherwise than by accident; but they have now a meaning something different, though referrible to the same original sense. Such is Dr. Johnson's statement. To chap, however, is more probably a derivative of the Sax. ỳppan, to open. In the Biblioth. Eliotæ, 1559. I find "to chappe, to be opened." See also CHAPT.] To break into hiatus, or gapings.

Neither summer's blaze can scorch, nor winter's blast chap her fair face. Lilly's Endymion, i. 1.

It weakened more and more the arch of the earth, drying it immoderately, and chapping it in sundry places. Burnet.

Then would unbalanc'd heat licentious reign,
Crack the dry hill, and chap the russet plain.
Blackmore.

CHAP. n. s. [from the verb.] A cleft; an aperture; an opening; a gaping; a chink.

What moisture the heat of the summer sucks out of the earth, it is repaid in the rains of the next winter; and what chaps are made in it, are filled up again. Burnet, Theory.

CHAP. n. s. [This is not often used, except by anatomists, in the singular.] The upper or under part of a beast's mouth.

Froth fills his chaps, he sends a grunting sound,
And part he churns, and part befoams the ground.
Dryden.

The nether chap in the male skeleton is half an inch broader than in the female. Grew, Musæum.

To CHAP.* v. n. [Sax. ceapian.] To cheap or cheapen; to bargain or deal for a price. See CHEAP, and CHOP.

CHAP.* n. s. An abbreviation of chapman; still in use among the common people. If the phrase be "a good chap," it implies a dealer to whom credit may be given; if simply, "a chap," it usually designates a person, of whom a contemptuous opinion is entertained.

CHAPE. n. s. [chappe, Fr.]

1. The catch of any thing by which it is held in its place; as the hook of a scabbard by which it sticks in the belt; the point by which a buckle is held to the back strap.

This is Monsieur Parolles, that had the whole theory of the war in the knot of his scarf, and the practice in the chape of his dagger. Shakspeare.

2. A brass or silver tip or case, that strengthens the end of the scabbard of a sword. Phillips's World of Words.

CHA'PEL. n. s. [capella, Lat.]

A chapel is of two sorts, either adjoining to a church, as a parcel of the same, which men of worth build, or else separate from the mother church, where the parish is wide, and is commonly called a chapel of ease, because it is built for the ease of one or more parishioners, that dwell too far from the church, and is served by some inferiour curate, provided for at the charge of the rector, or of such as have benefit by it, as the composition or custom is. Cowel.

She went in among those few trees, so closed in the tops together, as they might seem a little chapel. Sidney.

Will you dispatch us here under this tree, or shall we go with you to your chapel? Shakspeare.

Where truth erecteth her church, he helps errour to rear up a chapel hard by. Howel.

A chapel will I build with large endowment. Dryden.

A free chapel is such as is founded by the King of England. Ayliffe's Parergon.

To CHA'PEL.* v. a. [from the noun.] To deposit in a chapel; to enshrine.

Give us the bones
Of our dead kings, that we may chapel them.
Beaum. and Fl. Two Noble Kinsmen.

CHA'PELESS. adj. [from chape.] Wanting a chape.

An old rusty sword, with a broken hilt, and chapeless, with two broken points. Shakspeare.

CHA'PELLANY. n. s. [from chapel.]

A chapellany is usually said to be that which does not subsist of itself, but is built and founded within some other church, and is dependent thereon. Ayliffe's Parergon.

CHA'PELRY. n. s. [from chapel.] The jurisdiction or bounds of a chapel.

*CHA'PERON.† n. s. [French.] A kind of hood or cap worn by the knights of the garter in their habits, Dr. Johnson says. But it was a cap not confined to them.

I will omit the honourable habiliments, as robes of state, parliament robes, chaperons, and caps of state. Camden.

The executioner stands by, — his head and face covered with a chaperon, out of which there are but two holes to look through.
Howell, Lett. i. v. 42.

To CHA'PERON.* v. a. An affected word, of very recent introduction into our language, to denote a gentleman attending a lady in a publick assembly. The old French verb chaperonner is "to uncover the head before others, or put off the cap to them." Cotgrave.

CHA'PEAU. n. s. [Fr.] A hat; and in heraldry, a cap or coronet. The chapeau de bras is almost an indispensable part of the full dress of a gentleman.

CHA'PFALLEN.† adj. [from chap and fallen.] Having the mouth shrunk.

They be indeed
A couple of chap-fall'n curs. B. Jonson, Poetaster.

Till they be chap-fall'n, and their tongues at peace,
Nail'd in their coffins sure, I'll ne'er believe 'em.
Beaum. and Fl. Wild-goose Chase.

A chapfall'n beaver loosely hanging by
The cloven helm. Dryden, Juv. sat. x.

CHA'PITER. n. s. [chapiteau, Fr.] The upper part or capital of a pillar.

He overlaid their chapiters and their fillets with gold. Exod. xxxvi. 38.

CHA'PLAIN.† n. s. [old Fr. chaipelain, chapelain, from capellanus, Latin.]

1. He that performs divine service in a chapel, and attends the king, or other person, for the instruction of him and his family, to read prayers and preach. Cowel.

Wishing me to permit
John de la Court, my chaplain, a choice hour,
To hear from him a matter of some moment.
Shakspeare.

Chaplain, away! thy priesthood saves thy life.
Shakspeare.

2. One that officiates in domestick worship.

A chief governour can never fail of some worthless illiterate chaplain, fond of a title and precedence. Swift.

CHA'PLAINCY.* n. s. [from chaplain.] The office of a chaplain.

The chaplaincy was refused to me, and given to Dr. Lambert. Swift, Lett.

CHA'PLAINSHIP.† n. s. [from chaplain.]

1. The office or business of a chaplain.

The Bethesda of some knight's chaplainship, where they bring grace to his good cheer.
Milton, Colasterion.

2. The possession or revenue of a chapel.

CHA'PLESS. adj. [from chap.] Without any flesh about the mouth.

Now chapless, and knocked about the muzzard with a sexton's spade. Shakspeare.

Shut me nightly in a charnel-house,
With reeky shanks and yellow chapless bones.
Shakspeare.

CHA'PLET. n. s. [chapelet, Fr.]

1. A garland or wreath to be worn about the head.

Upon old hyems' chin, and icy crown,
An od'rous chaplet of sweet summer's buds,
Is, as in mockery, set. Shakspeare.

I strangely long to know,
Whether they nobler chaplets wear,
Those that their mistress' scorn did bear,
Or those that were us'd kindly. Suckling.

All the quire was grac'd
With chaplets green, upon their foreheads plac'd.
The winding ivy chaplet to invade,
And folded fern, that your fair forehead shade.
Dryden.

They made an humble chaplet for the king. Swift.

2. A string of beads used in the Romish church for keeping an account of the number rehearsed of pater-nosters and ave-marias. A different sort of chaplets is also used by the Mahometans.

3. [In architecture.] A little moulding carved into round beads, pearls, or olives.

4. [In horsemanship.] A couple of stirrup leathers, mounted each of them with a stirrup, and joining at top in a sort of leather buckle, which is called the head of the chaplet, by which they are fastened to the pummel of a saddle, after they have been adjusted to the length and bearing of the rider. Farrier's Dict.

5. A tuft of feathers on the peacock's head.

CHA'PLET.* n. s. [diminut. of chapel.] A small chapel or shrine.

This is in Amos, ch. v. 26. the tabernacle, or soccoth, of your king or Molock; that is, the chaplet, where that image of your false god, called here τύπος, was enshrined or dwelt: so σκηνὴν signifies; and the like seems to be understood by Succoth Benoth, the tabernacle of Venus, some little chapel or shrine where her image was kept and worshipped. Hammond on Acts, vii. 43.

CHA'PMAN.† n. s. [ceapman, Sax.] A cheapner; one that offers as a purchaser; a seller; a marketman.

Fair Diomede, you do as chapmen do,
Dispraise the thing that you intend to buy. Shaks.
Beauty is bought by judgement of the eye,
Not utter'd by base sale of chapmen's tongues.
Shakspeare, Love's L. Lost.

Yet have they seen the maps, and bought 'em too,
And understand 'em as most chapmen do. B. Jons.

There was a collection of certain rare manuscripts, exquisitely written in Arabick; these were upon sale to the Jesuits at Antwerp, liquorish chapmen of such wares. Wotton.

He dressed two, and carried them to Samos, as the likeliest place for a chapman. L'Estrange.

Their chapmen they betray,
Their shops are dens, the buyer is their prey.
Dryden.

CHA'PPY.* adj. [from chap.] Cleft; cut asunder; open; gaping. Cotgrave in V. Fendu.

CHAPS. n. s. [from chap.]

1. The mouth of a beast of prey.

So on the downs we see
A hasten'd hare from greedy greyhound go,
And past all hope, his chaps to frustrate so. Sidney.

Open your mouth; you cannot tell who's your friend; open your chaps again. Shaksp.

Their whelps at home expect the promis'd food,
And long to temper their dry chaps in blood.
Dryden.

2. It is used in contempt for the mouth of a man.

CHAPT. } CHA'PPED. } particip. pass. [from To chap.]

Like a table upon which you may run your finger without rubs, and your nail cannot find a joint; not horrid, rough, wrinkled, gaping, or chapt. B. Jonson.

Cooling ointment made,
Which on their sun-burnt cheeks and their chapt skins they laid. Dryden, Fables.

CHA'PTER. n. s. [chapitre, Fr. from capitulum, Lat.]

1. A division of a book.

The first book we divide into three sections; whereof the first is these three chapters.
Burnet, Theory.

If these mighty men at chapter and verse, can produce then no scripture to overthrow our church ceremonies, I will undertake to produce scripture enough to warrant them. South.

2. From hence comes the proverbial phrase, to the end of the chapter; throughout; to the end.

Money does all things; for it gives and it takes away, it makes honest men and knaves, fools and philosophers; and so forward, mutatis mutandis, to the end of the chapter. L'Estrange.

3. Chapter, from capitulum, signifieth, in our common law, as in the canon law, whence it is borrowed, an assembly of the clergy of a cathedral or collegiate church. Cowel.

The abbot takes the advice and consent of his chapter, before he enters on any matters of importance. Addison on Italy.

4. The place where delinquents receive discipline and correction.
Ayliffe's Parergon.

5. A decretal epistle. Ayliffe's Parergon.

6. Chapter-house; the place in which assemblies of the clergy are held.

Though the canonical constitution does strictly require it to be made in the cathedral, yet it matters not where it be made, either in the choir or chapter-house. Ayliffe's Parergon.

To CHA'PTER.* v. a. [from the noun. See the 4th sense.] To tax; to correct; to take to task.

He more than once arraigns him for the inconstancy of his judgement and chapters even his own Aratus on the same head.
Dryden, Character of Polybius.

CHA'PTREL. n. s. [probably from chapiter.] The capitals of pillars, or pillasters, which support arches, commonly called imposts.

Let the keystone break without the arch, so much as you project over the jaums with the chaptrels. Moxon.

CHAR.† n. s. [of uncertain derivation, Dr. Johnson says. Some derive it from the Sax. cỳpan, to turn, because this fish turneth itself swiftly in the water.] A fish found only in Winander mere in Lancashire, Dr. Johnson says; which is not exactly the case.

There are no char ever taken in these lakes, but plenty in Buttermere water, which lies a little way north of Borrowdale, about Martinmas, which are potted here.
Gray, Letter to Dr. Warton.

To CHAR. v. a. [See CHARCOAL.] To burn wood to a black cinder.

Spraywood, in charring, parts into various cracks. Woodward.

CHAR.† n. s. [cỳppe, work, Sax. Lye. It is derived by Skinner, either from charge, Fr. business, or cape, Sax. care, or keeren, Dutch, to sweep. Mr. H. Tooke deduces it from the Sax. cypan, to turn or return, to turn about. The Goth. kar may not be omitted, which is business or concern: "hwa kara unsis thu witeis," what is that to us, &c. St. Matt. xxvii. 4. "I have a little char for you." Ray's North Country Words. The word is now usually written and pronounced chare; and also in its compounds chare-woman and chare-work. But in Wiltshire it is pronounced cheure, and is sometimes so written in the old editions of Beaumont and Fletcher.] Work done by the day; a single job or task.

No more but e'en a woman, and commanded
By such poor passion, as the maid that milks,
And does the meanest chars.
Shakspeare, Ant. and Cleop.

She, harvest done, to char work did aspire;
Meat, drink, and twopence, were her daily hire.
Dryden, Theocritus.

To CHAR. v. n. [from the noun.] To work at others houses by the day, without being a hired servant.

To CHAR.* v. a. To perform a business.

That char is char'd; that business is dispatched.
Ray's North Country Words.

All's char'd when he is gone.
Beaum. and Fl. Two Noble Kinsmen.

CHAR-WOMAN. n. s. [from char and woman.] A woman hired accidentally for odd work, or single days.

Get three or four char-women to attend you constantly in the kitchen, whom you pay only with the broken meat, a few coals, and all the cinders. Swift.

CHAR-WORK.* See CHAR.

CHA'RACT, or CHA'RECT*. n. s. An inscription; and formerly a charm, or magical inscription, [charact, the inscription, or thing written; characters, the letters in which it is written; charactery, the materials of which characters are composed. Note on Shakspeare. Meas. for Meas. ed. Steevens.]

It was by necromancy,
By carectes and conjuration.
Skelton, Poems, p. 161.

That he use ne hide no charme, ne charecte.
Dugdale, Orig. Jud. p. 81.

Even so may Angelo,
In all his dressings, *charact*s, titles, forms,
Be an arch-villain.
Shakspeare, Measure for Measure.

CHA'RACTER.† n. s. [character, Lat. χαρακτὴρ.]

1. A mark; a stamp; a representation. This is a very ancient acceptation of the word, being used by Wicliffe.

And he schal make alle, smale and greete, — to have a carecter in their right hond either in their forheedis. Wicliffe, Apoc. xiii. 16.

To his own love his loialtie he saved;
Whose character in the adamantine mould
Of his true heart so firmely was engraved,
That no new love's impression ever could
Bereave it thence. Spenser, F. Q. v. vi. 2.

[Titles of] honour are the character of that estimation, which publickly is had of publick estates and callings in the church or commonwealth.
Hooker, 6. vii.

In outward also her resembling less
His image, who made both; and less expressing
The character of that dominion given
O'er other creatures. Milton, P. L.

2. A letter used in writing or printing.

But his neat cookery! ——
He cut our roots in characters. Shaksp.

The purpose is perspicuous even as substance,
Whose grossness little characters sum up. Shaks.

It were much to be wished, that there were throughout the world but one sort of character for each letter, to express it to the eye; and that exactly proportioned to the natural alphabet formed in the mouth. Holder's Elements of Speech.

3. The hand or manner of writing. Formerly with the accent on the second syllable.

And writing strange characters on the ground.
Spenser, F. Q. iii. iii. 14.

I found the letter thrown in at the casement of my closet. —
You know the character to be your brother's.
Shakspeare.

4. A representation of any man as to his personal qualities.

Each drew fair characters, yet none
Of these they feign'd, excels their own. Denham.

Homer has excelled all the heroick poets that ever wrote, in the multitude and variety of his characters; every god that is admitted into his poem, acts a part which would have been suitable to no other deity. Addison.

5. An account of any thing as good or bad.

This subterraneous passage is much mended, since Seneca gave so bad a character of it. Addison on Italy.

6. The person with his assemblage of qualities; a personage.

In a tragedy, or epick poem, the hero of the piece must be advanced foremost to the view of the reader or spectator; he must outshine the rest of all the characters; he must appear the prince of them, like the sun in the Copernican system, encompassed with the less noble planets, Dryden.

7. Personal qualities; particular constitution of the mind.

Nothing so true as what you once let fall,
Most women have no characters at all. Pope.

8. Adventitious qualities impressed by a post or office.

The chief honour of the magistrate consists in maintaining the dignity of his character by suitable actions. Atterbury.

To CHA'RACTER.† v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To inscribe; to engrave. It seems to have had the accent formerly on the second syllable, Dr. Johnson says; which indeed Shakspeare exhibits, as also the accent on the first syllable of this verb. The substantive in Spenser has also the accent on the second syllable. See CHARACTER, 3d sense.

These few precepts in thy memory
See thou character. Shakspeare.
Shew me one scar character'd on thy skin.
Shakspeare.
O Rosalind! these trees shall be my books,
And in their barks my thoughts I'll character.
Shakspeare.
The pleasing poison
The visage quite transforms of him that drinks,
And the inglorious likeness of a beast
Fixes instead, unmoulding reason's mintage,
Character'd in the face. Milton, Comus.
A law not only written by Moses, but character'd in us by nature.
Milton, Doct. and Dis. of Divorce.

2. To describe; to denominate; to characterize.

Being thus character'd,
And challenged, know, I dare appear, and do
To who dares threaten.
Beaum. and Fl. Love's Pilgrimage.
Thuanus, one that writeth truth with a steady hand, thus charactereth the Con-Waldenses: — They used raw pelts clapped about them for their clothes, &c. Fuller, Holy War, p. 145.
The apostle charactereth a lawful magistrate by this spirit, Rom. xiii. 4. He is the minister of God to thee for good.
Spenser, Righteous Ruler, p. 8.

CHA'RACTERISM.* n. s. [from character.] The distinction of character.

The characterism of an honest man: He looks not to what he might do, but what he should.
Bp. Hall, Characters, p. 13.
He [Christ] was described by infallible characterisms which did fit him, and did never fit any but him. Bp. Taylor, Demonst. of the Truth of the Chr. Religion.
So far is our version from preserving this Lucanism, this characterism of an author, that it inverts the thought. Bentley, Phil. Lips. p. 275.

CHARACTERI'STICAL. } adj. [from charac-
CHARACTERI'STICK. } terize.] That constitutes the character, or marks the peculiar properties of any person or thing.

There are several others that I take to have been likewise such, to which yet I have not ventured to prefix that characteristick distinction.
Woodward on Fossils.

The shining quality of an epick hero, his magnanimity, his constancy, his patience, his piety, or whatever characteristical virtue his poet gives him, raises our admiration. Dryden.

CHARACTERI'STICALLY.* adv. [from characteristical.] In a manner which constitutes or distinguishes character.

The title of wise men seems to have been anciently the peculiar addition of prophets, and used characteristically.
Spenser, Vanity of Vulg. Prophecies, p. 36.
Slaying with the sword is very characteristically spoken here in this epistle, of the faithful martyr Antipas. More, Seven Churches, ch. 5.
Henry's hypocrisy is not characteristically nor consistently sustained.
Warton, Hist. of Eng. Poetry, iii. 141.

CHARACTERI'STICALNESS. n. s. [from characteristical.] The quality of being peculiar to a character; marking a character.

CHARACTERI'STICK. n. s. That which constitutes the character; that which distinguishes any thing or person from others.

This vast invention exerts itself in Homer, in a manner superiour to that of any poet; it is the great and peculiar characteristick which distinguishes him from all others. Pope.

CHARACTERI'STICK of a Logarithm. The same with the index or exponent.

To CHA'RACTERIZE. v. a. [from character.]

1. To give a character or an account of the personal qualities of any man.

It is some commendation, that we have avoided publicly to characterize any person, without long experience. Swift.

2. To engrave or imprint.

They may be called anticipations, prenotions, or sentiments characterized and engraven in the soul, born with it, and growing up with it.
Hale, Origin of Mankind.

3. To mark with a particular stamp or token.

There are faces not only individual, but gentilitious and national; European, Asiatick, Chinese, African and Grecian faces are characterized.
Arbuthnot on Air.

CHA'RACTERLESS. adj. [from character.] Without a character.

When water drops have worn the stones of Troy,
And blind oblivion swallowed cities up,
And mighty states characterless are grated
To dusty nothing. Shakspeare.

CHA'RACTERY.† n. s. [from character.] Impression; mark; distinction: accented anciently on the second syllable.

Fairies use flowers for their charáctery. Shaks.
All my engagements I will construe to thee,
All the charactery of my sad brows. Shakspeare.
A third sort — bestowed their time in drawing out the true lineaments of every virtue and vice so lively, that who saw the medals might know the face; which art they significantly termed charactery. Bp. Hall, Characters. To the Reader.

*CHARA'DE. n. s. [Fr.] A species of riddle, usually in verse.

An enigma, which consists in disguising the truth by an ambiguous or obscure expression, is certainly superiour to a rebus or charade, which only puzzles you with letters and syllables; a species of difficult trifling, which one cannot but wonder to find prevailing in this enlightened age, amongst people of good understanding in the polite world. Graves's Recollect. of Shenstone, p. 99.

CHA'RCOAL.† n. s. [imagined by Skinner to be derived from char, business; but, by Mr. Lye, from To chark, to burn, Dr. Johnson says. It may be added, that the word was formerly written charke coal: "A man made charke coles in a wood." Festival, fol. 25. The process of making charcoal, however, has been termed charring the wood.] Coal made by burning wood under turf. It is used in preparing metals.

Seacoal lasts longer than charcoal; and charcoal of roots, being coaled into great pieces lasts longer than ordinary charcoal. Bacon, Nat. Hist.
Love is a fire that burns and sparkles,
In men as nat'rally as in charcoals,
Which sooty chymists stop in holes,
When out of wood they extract coals. Hudibras.
Is there, who, lock'd from ink and paper, scrawls
With desperate charcoal round his darken'd walls.
Pope.

CHARD. n. s. [charde, Fr.]

1. Chards of artichokes are the leaves of fair artichoke plants, tied and wrapped up all over but the top, in straw, during the autumn and winter; this makes them grow white, and lose some of their bitterness. Chambers.

2. Chards of beet, are plants of white beet transplanted, producing great tops, which, in the midst, have a large white, thick, downy, and cotton-like main shoot, which is the true chard.
Mortimer.

To CHARGE.† v. a. [charger, Fr. caricare, Ital. low Lat. cargare, from carrus, Lat.]

1. To entrust; to commission for a certain purpose: it has with before the thing entrusted.

And the captain of the guard charged Joseph with them, and he served them. Genesis, xl. 4.
What you have charged me with, that I have done. Shakspeare.

2. To impute as a debt: with on before the debtor.

My father's, mother's, brother's death, I pardon:
That's somewhat sure; a mighty sum of murder,
Of innocent and kindred blood struck off,
My prayers and penance shall discount for these,
And beg of heav'n to charge the bill on me.
Dryden.

3. To impute; with on before the person to whom any thing is imputed.

No more accuse thy pen, but charge the crime
On native sloth, and negligence of time. Dryden.
It is easy to account for the difficulties he charges on the peripatetick doctrine. Locke.
It is not barely the ploughman's pains, the reaper's and thresher's toil, and the baker's sweat is to be counted into the bread we eat; the plough, mill, oven, or any other utensils, must all be charged on the account of labour. Locke.
Perverse mankind! whose wills, created free,
Charge all their woes on absolute decree;
All to the dooming gods their guilt translate,
And follies are miscall'd the crimes of fate. Pope.
We charge that upon necessity, which was really desired and chosen. Watts, Logick.

4. To impute to, as cost, or hazard.

He was so great an encourager of commerce, that he charg'd himself with all the sea risk of such vessels as carried corn to Rome in winter.
Arbuthnot on Coins.

Heap'd in great chargers, load our sumptuous boards. Denham.

This golden charger, snatch'd from burning Troy,
Anchises did in sacrifice employ.
Dryden, Æneid.

Ev'n Lamb himself, at the most solemn feast,
Might have some chargers not exactly dress'd.
King.

Nor dare they close their eyes,
Void of a bulky charger near their lips,
With which in often interrupted sleep,
Their frying blood compels to irrigate
Their dry furr'd tongues. Philips.

2. The horse of a military officer; "a charging horse." Kersey.

CHA'RILY.† adv. [from chary.] Warily; frugally.

What paper do you take up so charily. Shaks.

Whose finger else, but God's, did confront against the Spanish ostentation, and Rome's curses, in 1588? Whose provident arm else, but God's, did bring to nought, the power-undermining, which was carried so warily and charily?
Sheldon, Miracles of Antichrist, p. 316.

CHA'RINESS. n. s. [from chary.] Caution; nicety; scrupulousness.

I will consent to act any villainy against him, that may not sully the chariness of our honesty.
Shakspeare.

CHA'RIOT.† n. s. [car-rhod, Welsh, a wheeled car; for it is known the Britons fought in such; charroi, old Fr. chariot, Fr. carretta, Ital. Wicliffe uses chare for chariot.]

1. A wheel carriage of pleasure, or state; a vehicle for men rather than wares.

Thy grand captain Anthony
Shall set thee on triumphant chariots, and
Put garlands on thy head. Shakspeare.

2. A car in which men of arms were anciently placed.

The king of Israel stayed himself up in his chariot against the Syrians until the even; and about the time of the sun going down he died.
2 Chron. xviii. 34.

He skims the liquid plains,
High on his chariot, and with loosen'd reins,
Majestick moves along. Dryden, Æneid.

3. A lighter kind of coach with only front seats.

Matthew thought right,
And hired a chariot so trim and so tight. Prior.

To CHA'RIOT. v. a. [from the noun.] To convey in a chariot. This word is rarely used.

An angel all in flames ascended
As in a fiery column charioting
His godlike presence. Milton, S. A.

CHA'RIOT-MAN.* n. s. [from chariot and man; our old word for the driver of the chariot; as carman for the driver of a cart.] The driver of a chariot.

He said to his chariot-man, turn thine hand, that thou mayest carry me out of the host; for I am wounded. 2 Chron. xviii. 33.

Therefore commanded he his chariot-man to drive without ceasing, and dispatch the journey.
2 Maccab. ix. 4.

CHARIOTE'ER. n. s. [from chariot.] He that drives the chariot. It is used only in speaking of military chariots, and those in the ancient publick games.

The gasping charioteer beneath the wheel
Of his own car. Dryden, Fables.

The burning chariot, and the charioteer,
In bright Boötes and his wane appear.
Addison on Italy.

Show us the youthful handsome charioteer,
Firm in his seat, and running his career. Prior.

CHA'RIOT-RACE. n. s. [from chariot and race.] A sport anciently used, where chariots were driven for the prize, as now horses run.

There is a wonderful vigour and spirit in the description of the horse and chariot-race. Addison.

CHA'RITABLE. adj. [charitable, Fr. from charité.]

1. Kind in giving alms; liberal to the poor.

He that hinders a charitable person from giving alms to a poor man, is tied to restitution, if he hindered him by fraud or violence.
Bp. Taylor's Holy Living.

Shortly thou wilt behold me poor and kneeling
Before thy charitable door for bread. Rowe.

How shall we then wish, that it might be allowed us to live over our lives again, in order to fill every minute of them with charitable offices! Atterbury.

Health to himself, and to his infants bread
The labourer bears: what his hard heart denies,
His charitable vanity supplies. Pope.

2. Kind in judging of others; disposed to tenderness; benevolent.

How had you been my friends else? Why have you that charitable title from thousands, did you not chiefly belong to my heart?
Shakspeare, Timon.

Of a politick sermon that had no divinity, the king said to bishop Andrews, Call you this a sermon? The bishop answered? By a charitable construction it may be a sermon. Bacon.

CHA'RITABLENESS.* n. s. [from charitable.] The exercise of charity; disposition to charity.

We shall beseech the same God to give you a more profitable and pertinent humiliation than yet you know, and a less mistaken charitableness.
Milton, Animadv. Rem. Defence.

CHA'RITABLY. adv. [from charity.]

1. Kindly; liberally; with inclination to help the poor.

2. Benevolently; without malignity.

Nothing will more enable us to bear our cross patiently, injuries charitably, and the labour of religion comfortably. Bp. Taylor.

'Tis best sometimes your censure to restrain,
And charitably let the dull be vain. Pope.

CHA'RITATIVE.* adj. [old Fr. charitatif.] Disposed to tenderness.

The latin tract of Confirmation, in answer to the exceptions of Mr. Daillée — was then prepared for the press, though detained much longer upon prudential or rather charitative considerations, a respect to which was strictly had in all the doctor's writings. Fell, Life of Hammond, § 1.

CHA'RITY. n. s. [charité, Fr. charitas, Lat.]

1. Tenderness; kindness; love.

By thee,
Founded in reason, loyal, just, and pure,
Relations dear, and all the charities
Of father, son, and brother, first were known.
Milton, P. L.

2. Goodwill; benevolence; disposition to think well of others.

My errours, I hope, are only those of charity to mankind, and such as my own charity has caused me to commit, that of others may more easily excuse. Dryden.

3. The theological virtue of universal love.

Concerning charity, the final object whereof is that incomprehensible beauty which shineth in the countenance of Christ, the son of the living God.
Hooker.

Peace, peace, for shame, if not for charity.—
—Urge neither charity nor shame to me;
Uncharitably with me have you dealt. Shaks.

Only add
Deeds to thy knowledge answerable, add faith;
Add virtue, patience, temperance, add love,
By name to come call'd charity, the soul
Of all the rest. Milton, P. L.

Faith believes the revelations of God; hope expects his promises; charity loves his excellencies and mercies. Taylor.

But lasting charity's more ample sway,
Nor bound by time, nor subject to decay,
In happy triumph shall for ever live. Prior.

Charity, or a love of God, which works by a love of our neighbour, is greater than faith or hope. Atterbury.

4. Liberality to the poor.

The heathen poet, in commending the charity of Dido to the Trojans, spoke like a christian.
Dryden.

5. Alms; relief given to the poor.

We must incline to the king; I will look for him, and privily relieve him; go you and maintain talk with the Duke, that my charity be not of him perceived. Shakspeare.

The ant did well to reprove the grasshopper for her slothfulness; but she did ill then to refuse her a charity in her distress. L'Estrange.

I never had the confidence to beg a charity.
Dryden.

To CHARK.† v. a. [perhaps from char. See CHARCOAL and To CHAR.] To burn to a black cinder, as wood is burned to make charcoal.

Excess, either with an apoplexy, knocks a man on the head, or, with a fever, like fire in a strong-water shop, burns him down to the ground; or if it flames not out, charks him to a coal.
Grew, Cosmologia Sacra.

CHARLATA'N. n. s. [charlatan, Fr. ciarlatano, Ital. from ciarlare, to chatter.] A quack; a mountebank; an empirick.

Saltinbanchoes, quacksalvers, and charlatans, deceive them in lower degrees. Brown, Vulg. Err.

For charlatans can do no good,
Until they're mounted in a crowd. Hudibras.

CHARLATA'NICAL. adj. [from charlatan.] Quackish; ignorant.

A cowardly soldier, and a charlatanical doctor, are the principal subjects of comedy. Cowley.

CHARLATA'NERY.† n. s. [old Fr. charlatanerie.] Wheedling; deceit; cheating with fair words.

There are seven stars in Ursa minor, and in Charles's-wain, or Plaustrum of Ursa major, seven.
Brown, Vulg. Err.

Is not Charles-wain there?
Beaum. and Fl. The Captain.

CHA'RLOCK.† n. s. [Sax. ceplice.] A weed growing among the corn with a yellow flower. It is a species of Mithridate mustard.

CHARM. n. s. [charme, Fr. carmen, Latin.]

1. Words, or philtres, or characters, imagined to have some occult or unintelligible power.

I never knew a woman so doat upon a man; surely I think you have charms. —— Not I, I assure thee; setting the attraction of my good parts aside, I have no other charms. Shakspeare.

There have been used, either barbarous words, of no sense, lest they should disturb the imagination, or words of similitude, that may second and feed the imagination: and this was ever as well in heathen charms, as in charms of later times. Bacon.

Alcyone he names amidst his pray'rs,
Names as a charm against the waves and wind,
Most in his mouth, and ever in his mind. Dryden.

Antæus could, by magick charms,
Recover strength, whene'er he fell. Swift.

2. Something of power to subdue opposition, and gain the affections; something that can please irresistibly.

Well-sounding verses are the charm we use,
Heroick thoughts and virtue to infuse. Roscommon.

Nor ever hope the queen of love
Will e'er thy fav'rite's charms improve. Prior.

To fam'd Apelles, when young Ammon brought
The darling idol of his captive heart;
And the pleas'd nymph with kind attention sat,
To have her charms recorded by his art. Waller.

But what avail her unexhausted stores,
Her blooming mountains and her sunny shores,
With all the gifts that heaven and earth impart,
The smiles of nature, and the charms of art,
While proud oppression in her vallies reigns,
And tyranny usurps her happy plains. Addison.

To CHARM.† v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To fortify with charms against evil.

Let fall thy blade on vulnerable crests,
I bear a charmed life, which must not yield
To one of woman born. Shakspeare.

2. To make powerful by charms.

3. To summon by incantation.

Upon my knees
I charm you by my once commended beauty,
By all your vows of love, and that great vow
Which did incorporate and make us one. Shaks.

4. To subdue by some secret power; to amaze; to overpower.

I will send serpents, cockatrices, among you, which will not be charmed; and they shall bite you, saith the Lord. Jerem. viii. 17.

I, in mine own woe charm'd,
Could not find death, where I did hear him groan;
Nor feel him where he struck. Shakspeare.

'Tis possible he might enchant the rocks,
And charm the forest. Beaum. and Fl. The Coronation.

Musick the fiercest grief can charm. Pope.

5. To subdue the mind by pleasure.

'Tis your graces,
That, from my mutest conscience, to my tongue,
Charms this report out. Shakspeare, Cymbeline.

Amoret! my lovely foe,
Tell me where thy strength does lie:
Where the pow'r that charms us so,
In thy soul, or in thy eye? Waller.

Charm by accepting, by submitting sway. Pope.

Chloe thus the soul alarm'd
Aw'd without sense, and without beauty charm'd. Pope.

6. To tune; to temper.

Here we our slender pipes may safely charm. Spenser, Shep. Cal. Oct.

Charming his oaten pipe unto his peers. Spenser, Colin Clout.

That well could charme his tongue, and time his speech. Spenser, F. Q. v. ix. 39.

To CHARM.* v. n. To sound harmonically.

And all the while harmonious airs were heard
Of chiming strings, or charming pipes. Milton, P. R. ii. 363.

In such a posture Christ found the Jews, who were neither won with the austerity of John the Baptist, and thought it too much licence to follow freely the charming pipe of him who sounded and proclaimed liberty and relief to all distresses. Milton, Doct. and Dis. of Divorce.

CHA'RMED. adj. Enchanted.

Arcadia was the charmed circle, where all his spirits for ever should be enchanted. Sidney.

We implore thy powerful hand,
To undo the charmed band
Of true virgin here distressed. Milton, Comus.

CHA'RMER.† n. s. [from charm, and old Fr. charmeur.]

1. One that has the power of charms, or enchantments.

There shall not be found among you — an enchanter, or a witch, or a charmer, or a consulter with familiar spirits. Deut. xviii. 10, 11.

That handkerchief
Did an Egyptian to my mother give;
She was a charmer, and could almost read
The thoughts of people. Shakspeare.

To hear [the nightingale] that charmer of the night. Drayton, Polyolb. S. 13.

The passion you pretended,
Was only to obtain;
But when the charm is ended,
The charmer you disdain. Dryden.

2. Word of endearment among lovers.

O think that beauty waits on thy decree,
And thy lov'd loveliest charmer pleads with me,
She whose soft smile or gentler glance to move,
You vow'd the wild extremities of love. Shenstone, Judgm. of Hercules.

CHA'RMERESS.* n. s. [old Fr. charmeresse, magicienne. Cotgr. and Roquef.] An enchantress; a witch. Huloet.

Charmeressis,
And old witches, and sorceressis. Chaucer, House of Fame, iii. 171.

CHA'RMFUL.* adj. [from charm and full.] Abounding with charms.

In treacherous haste he's sent for to the king,
And with him bid his charmful lyre to bring. Cowley, Davideis.

Not vain she finds the charmful task
In pageant quaint, in motley mask. Collins, Ode on the Manners.

CHA'RMING. particip. adj. [from charm.] Pleasing in the highest degree.

For ever all goodness will be charming, for ever all wickedness will be most odious. Sprat.

O charming youth! in the first op'ning page,
So many graces in so green an age. Dryden.

CHA'RMINGLY.† adv. [from charming.] In such a manner as to please exceedingly.

This is a most majestick vision, and Harmonious charmingly. Shakspeare, Tempest.

She smiled very charmingly, and discovered as fine a set of teeth as ever eye beheld. Addison.

CHA'RMINGNESS. n. s. [from charming.] The power of pleasing.

CHA'RNEL. adj. [charnel, Fr.] Containing flesh, or carcases.

Such are those thick and gloomy shadows damp
Oft seen in charnel vaults and sepulchres,
Lingering and sitting by a new-made grave. Milton, Comus.

CHA'RNEL-HOUSE. n. s. [charnier, Fr. from caro, carnis, Latin.] The place under churches where the bones of the dead are reposited.

If charnel-houses and our graves must send
Those, that we bury, back; our monuments
Shall be the maws of kites. Shakspeare.

When they were in those charnel-houses, every one was placed in order, and a black pillar or coffin set by him. Bp. Taylor.

CHART.† n. s. [charta, Lat.]

1. A delineation or map of coasts, for the use of sailors. It is distinguished from a map, by representing only the coasts.

The Portuguese, when they had doubled the Cape of Good Hope, found skilful pilots, using astronomical instruments, geographical charts, and compasses. Arbuthnot.

2. A written deed; a charter. Cockeram.

In old charts we find the words Angli and Anglici, contradistinguished to Franci, &c. Brady, Intr. to Old Eng. Hist. 1684, Gloss, p. 11.

CHA'RTAL.* n. s. [Lat. chartula.] A little roll or piece of paper; a few leaves of paper.

It seemeth for fear that any of their railing pamphlets should perish, being many of them but triobolar chartals, they have taken upon them to make a register. Bp. Bancroft, Dangerous Positions, 1593, p. 48.

CHA'RTEL.* See CARTEL.

CHA'RTER. n. s. [charta, Latin.]

1. A charter is a written evidence of things done between man and man. Charters are divided into charters of the king, and charters of private persons. Charters of the king are those, whereby the king passeth any grant to any person or more, or to any body politick: as a charter of exemption, that no man shall be empannelled on a jury; charter of pardon, whereby a man is forgiven a felony, or other offence. Cowel.

2. Any writing bestowing privileges or rights.

If you deny it, let the danger light
Upon your charter, and your city's freedom. Shakspeare.

It is not to be wondered, that the great charter whereby God bestowed the whole earth upon Adam, and confirmed it unto the sons of Noah, being as brief in word as large in effect, hath bred much quarrel of interpretation. Raleigh's Essays.

Here was that charter seal'd, wherein the crown
All marks of arbitrary power lays down. Denham.

She shakes the rubbish from her mounting brow,
And seems to have renew'd her charter's date,
Which Heav'n will to the death of time allow. Dryden.

God renewed this charter of man's sovereignty over the creatures. South.

3. Privilege; immunity; exemption.

I must have liberty,
Withal as large a charter as the wind,
To blow on whom I please; for so fools have;
And they that are most gauled with my folly,
They most must laugh. Shakspeare.

My mother,
Who has a charter to extol her blood,
When she does praise me, grieves me. Shaksp.

CHA'RTER-LAND.* n. s. In law, such land as a man holds by charter; freehold; which the Saxons termed boc-land; both meaning land held by evidence in writing.

Charter-land had its name from a particular form in the charter, or deed, which ever since the reign of Hen. VIII. hath been disused. Coke on Littleton.

CHA'RTER-PARTY. n. s. [chartre partie, Fr.] A paper relating to a contract, of which each party has a copy.

Charter-parties, or contracts, made even upon the high sea, touching things that are not in their own nature maritime, belong not to the admiral's jurisdiction. Hale.

CHA'RTERED. adj. [from charter.] Invested with privileges by charter; privileged.

When he speaks,
The air, a charter'd libertine, is still. Shakspeare.

CHA'RTULARY.* n. s. See CARTULARY.

These particulars are recorded by an authentic and well-informed annalist, Heming, the learned sub-priour of that monastery, who compiled a chartulary of its possessions and privileges.
Warton, Hist. of Kiddington, p. 26.

CHA'RY.† adj. [Sax. ceariȝ.] Careful; cautious; wary; frugal.

Over his kindred he held a wary and chary care, which bountifully was expressed, when occasion so required. Carew's Survey of Cornwall.
The chariest maid is prodigal enough,
If she unmask her beauty to the moon. Shaks.
Yet I am chary too who comes about me:
Two innocents should not fear one another.
Beaum. and Fl. Elder Brother.

To CHASE.† v. a. [chasser, Fr. derived by some from the Lat. calcare, to trample or tread; whence the low Lat. caciare, chaciare; and the Ital. cacciare; by others, from captare, to catch.]

1. To hunt.
It shall be as the chased roe. Isaiah, xiii. 14.
Mine enemies chased me sore like a bird.
Lament. iii. 52.

2. To pursue as an enemy.
And Abimelech chased him, and he fled before him. Judges, ix. 40.
How should one chase a thousand.
Deut. xxxii. 30.

3. To drive away.
He that chaseth away his mother, is a son that causeth shame. Proverbs, xix. 26.

4. To follow as a thing desirable.

5. To drive.
Thus chased by their brother's endless malice, from prince to prince, and from place to place, they, for their safety, fled at last to the city of Bisennis. Knolles's Hist. of the Turks.
When the following morn had chas'd away
The flying stars, and light restor'd the day.
Dryden.

To CHASE Metals. See To ENCHASE.

CHASE.† n. s. [from the verb.]

1. Hunting; as, the pleasures of the chase.
The chase I sing; hounds, and their various breed. Somerville.

2. Pursuit of any thing as game.
Whilst he was hastening, in the chase, it seems,
Of this fair couple, meets he on the way
The father of this seeming lady. Shakspeare.
There is no chase more pleasant, methinks, than to drive a thought, by good conduct, from one end of the world to another, and never to lose sight of it till it fall into eternity.
Burnet, Theory on the Earth.

3. Fitness to be hunted, appropriation to chase or sport.
Concerning the beasts of chase, whereof the buck is the first, he is called the first year a fawn. Shakspeare.
A maid I am, and of thy virgin train;
Oh! let me still that spotless name retain,
Frequent the forests, thy chaste will obey,
And only make the beasts of chase my prey.
Dryden.

4. Pursuit of an enemy, or of something noxious.
The admiral, with such ships only as could suddenly be put in readiness, made forth with them, and such as came daily in, we set upon them, and gave them chase. Bacon.
He sallied out upon them with certain troops of horsemen, with such violence, that he overthrew them, and, having them in chase, did speedy execution. Knolles's Hist.
They seek that joy, which us'd to glow,
Expanded on the hero's face;
When the thick squadrons prest the foe,
And William led the glorious chase. Prior.

5. Pursuit of something as desirable.
Yet this mad chase of fame, by few pursu'd,
Has drawn destruction on the multitude.
Dryden, Juv.

6. The game hunted.
She, seeing the towering of her pursued chase, went circling about, rising so with the less sense of rising. Sidney.
Hold, Warwick! seek thee out some other chase,
For I myself must put this deer to death.
Shakspeare.
Honour's the noblest chase; pursue that game,
And recompence the loss of love with fame.
Granville.

7. Open ground stored with such beasts as are hunted.
A receptacle for deer and game, of a middle nature between a forest and a park; being commonly less than a forest, and not endued with so many liberties; and yet of a larger compass, and stored with greater diversity of game than a park. A chase differs from a forest in this, because it may be in the hands of a subject, which a forest, in its proper nature, cannot; and from a park, in that it is not inclosed, and hath not only a larger compass, and more store of game, but likewise more keepers and overseers. Cowel.
He and his lady both are at the lodge,
Upon the northside of this pleasant chase.
Shakspeare.

8. The CHASE of a gun, is the whole bore or length of a piece, taken withinside. Chambers.

9. A term at the game of tennis, signifying the spot where a ball falls, beyond which the adversary must strike his ball to gain a point or chase.
Tell him, he hath made a match with such a wrangler,
That all the courts of France will be disturb'd
With chases. Shakspeare, K. Hen. V.
T. I have two chases.
I. Sir, the last is no chase, but a loss.
T. Sir, how is it a loss?
I. Because you did strike it at the second bound.
Woedrophe's Fr. Gr. (1624,) p. 234.

CHASE-GUN. n. s. [from chase and gun.] Guns in the forepart of the ship, fired upon those that are pursued.
Mean time the Belgians tack upon our rear,
And raking chase-guns through our stern they send.
Dryden.

CHA'SEABLE, or CHACEABLE.* adj. [old Fr. chassable, "chaseable, fit to be chased, pursued, hunted after." Cotgrave.] Fit for the chase.
Beastes which ben chaceable.
Gower, Conf. Am. b. 5.

CHA'SER. n. s. [from chase.]

1. Hunter; pursuer; driver.
Then began
A stop i' th' chaser, a retire; anon
A rout, confusion thick. Shakspeare.
So fast he flies, that his reviewing eye
Has lost the chasers, and his ear the cry.
Denham.
Stretch'd on the lawn, his second hope survey,
At once the chaser, and at once the prey.
Lo, Rufus tugging at the deadly dart,
Bleeds in the forest like a wounded hart! Pope.

2. An enchaser.

CHASM. n. s. [χάσμα.]

1. A breach unclosed; a cleft; a gap; an opening.
In all that visible corporeal world, we see no chasms or gaps. Locke.
The water of this orb communicates with that of the ocean, by means of certain hiatuses or chasms passing betwixt it and the bottom of the ocean.
Woodward.
The ground adust her riv'n mouth disparts,
Horrible chasm! profound. Philips.

2. A place unfilled; a vacuity.
Some lazy ages, lost in ease,
No action leave to busy chronicles;
Such, whose supine felicity but makes,
In story chasms, in epochas mistakes. Dryden.

CHA'SMED.* adj. [from chasm.] Having gaps or openings.
Fast by yon chasmed hill that frowns,
Cleft by an elemental shock. Essays by a Society of Gentlemen at Exeter, (1796,) p. 542.

CHA'SSELAS. n. s. [French.] A sort of grape.

CHASTE. adj. [chaste, Fr. castus, Lat.]

1. Pure from all commerce of sexes; as, a chaste virgin.
Diana chaste, and Hebe fair. Prior.

2. With respect to language; pure; uncorrupt; not mixed with barbarous phrases.

3. Free from obscenity.
Among words which signify the same principal ideas, some are clean and decent, others unclean; some chaste, others obscene. Watts, Logick.

4. True to the marriage bed.
To love their children, to be discreet, chaste, keepers at home. Titus, ii. 5.

CHASTE-EYED.* adj. [from chaste and eye.] Having chaste or modest eyes.
The oak-crown'd sisters, and their chaste-ey'd queen. Collins, Ode on the Passions.

CHASTE-TREE. n. s. [vitex, Lat.]
This tree will grow to be eight or ten feet high, and produce spikes of flowers at the extremity of every strong shoot in autumn. Miller.

CHA'STELY.† adv. [from chaste.]

1. Without incontinence; purely; without contamination.
You should not pass here: no, though it were as virtuous to lie as to live chastely. Shakspeare.
Make first a song of joy and love,
Which chastely flame in royal eyes. Wotton.
Succession of a long descent,
Which chastely in the channels ran,
And from our demi-gods began. Dryden.

2. Without violation of decent ceremony.
Howsoe'er my cause goes, see my body
(Upon my knees I ask it) buried chastely.
Beaum. and Fl. Knight of Malta.

To CHA'STEN. v. a. [chastier, Fr. castigo, Lat.] To correct; to punish; to mortify.
Chasten thy son while there is hope, and let not thy soul spare for his crying. Proverbs, xix. 18.
I follow thee, safe guide! the path
Thou lead'st me; and to the hand of Heaven submit,
However chastening. Milton, P. L.
Some feel the rod,
And own, like us, the father's chastening hand.
Rowe.
From our lost pursuit she wills to hide
Her close decrees, and chasten human pride.
Prior.

CHA'STENER.* n. s. [from chasten.] One who corrects or chastens.

CHA'STENESS.† n. s. [from chaste.]

1. Chastity; purity.

Stand not upon thy strength, though it surpass;
Nor thy fore-proved chastness stand thou on:
Thou art not holier than David was,
Nor wiser than was most wise Solomon.
Davies, Wit's Pilgrim. Q. 3.

Religion requires of him the highest degree of purity and chasteness.
Young on Idolatrous Corruptions, ii. 213.

2. Purity of writing.

He [Sacheverel] wrote without either chasteness of style, or liveliness of expression.
Burnet, Hist. of his own Times.

CHASTI'SABLE.* adj. [old Fr. chastiable.] Deserving chastisement. Sherwood.

To CHASTI'SE.† v. a. [castigo, Lat. anciently accented on the first syllable, now on the last. So far Dr. Johnson. But it is rather from the old Fr. chastier, chastoyer, which is also from the Lat. castigare. In confirmation of this etymology, I may adduce Chaucer, who writes, for chastise, the word chastie, Rom. of the Rose, "I, that other folke chastie, woll not be taught," &c.]

1. To punish: to correct by punishment; to afflict for faults.

My breast I'll burst with straining of my courage,
But I will chastise this high-minded strumpet.
Shakspeare.

I am glad to see the vanity or envy of the canting chymists thus discovered and chastised. Boyle.

Seldom is the world affrighted or chastised with signs or prodigies, earthquakes or inundations, famines or plagues? Grew, Cosmologia Sacra.

Like you, commission'd to chastise and bless,
He must avenge the world, and give it peace.
Prior.

2. To reduce to order, or obedience; to repress; to restrain; to awe.

Hie thee hither,
That I may pour my spirits in thine ear,
And chastise, with the valour of my tongue,
All that impedes thee. Shakspeare.

Know, sir, that I
Will not wait pinion'd at your master's court,
Nor once be chastis'd with the sober eye
Of dull Octavia. Shakspeare.

The gay social sense
By decency chastis'd. Thomson.

CHASTI'SEMENT.† n. s. [chastiment, Fr.] Correction; punishment: commonly, though not always, used of domestick or parental punishment. Dr. Johnson has not noticed the twofold accentuation of this word. The example from Shakspeare shews it to have been, occasionally, on the first syllable; and, in modern times, many so pronounce the word.

Shall I so much dishonour my fair stars,
On equal terms to give him chastisement?
Shakspeare.

He held the chastisement of one which molested the see of Rome, pleasing to God.
Ralegh, Essays.

For seven years what can a child be guilty of, but lying, or ill-natur'd tricks; the repeated commission of which shall bring him to the chastisement of the rod. Locke.

He receives a fit of sickness as the kind chastisement and discipline of his heavenly father, to wean his affections from the world. Bentley.

CHASTI'SER.* n. s. [from chastise.] He who chastises, or corrects by punishment.

They have grown in strength, and by their strength now begin to despise their chastisers.
Sir E. Sandys, State of Religion.

An instrument of humility, and a chastiser of too big a confidence.
Bp. Taylor, Holy Dying, v. § 3.

The thought of death indulge:
Give it its wholesome empire; let it reign,
That kind chastiser of the soul to joy!
Young, Night Thoughts, 3.

Such as preserve them [the traces of sorrow] longest, do perhaps best acquiesce in the will of the chastiser. Gray, Lett. to Mr. Nicholls.

CHA'STITY.† n. s. [old Fr. chasteté, castitas, Lat.]

1. Purity of the body.

Who can be bound by any solemn vow,
To force a spotless virgin's chastity? Shakspeare.

Chastity is either abstinence or continence: abstinence is that of virgins or widows; continence of married persons: chaste marriages are honourable and pleasing to God. Bp. Taylor.

Ev'n here where frozen chastity retires,
Love finds an altar for forbidden fires. Pope.

2. Freedom from obscenity.

There is not chastity enough in language,
Without offence to utter them.
Shakspeare, Much ado.

3. Freedom from bad mixture of any kind; purity of language, opposed to barbarisms.

That chastity of worship, which God has, so suitably to our understandings, expressed himself to expect from us.
Bp. Compton, Episcopalia, (1686,) p. 29.

CHASTI'SER. n. s. [from chastise.] The person that chastises; a punisher; a corrector.

To CHAT. v. n. [from caqueter, Fr. Skinner; perhaps from achat, purchase or cheapening, on account of the prate naturally produced in a bargain; or only, as it is most likely, contracted from chatter.] To prate; to talk idly; to prattle; to cackle; to chatter; to converse at ease.

Thus chatten the people in their steads,
Ylike as a monster of many heads.
Spenser, Shep. Cal.

Because that I familiarly sometimes,
Do use you for my fool, and chat with you,
Your sauciness will jest upon my love.
Shakspeare.

The shepherds on the lawn
Sat simply chatting in a rustick row. Milton, Ode.

With much good-will the motion was embrac'd,
To chat a while on their adventures pass'd.
Dryden.

To CHAT. v. a. To talk of. Not in use, unless ludicrously.

All tongues speak of him, and the bleared sights
Are spectacled to see him. Your prattling nurse
Into a rapture lets her baby cry,
While she chats him. Shakspeare.

CHAT. n. s. [from the verb.] Idle talk; prate; slight or negligent tattle.

Lords that can prate
As amply and unnecessarily,
As this Gonzalo, I myself would make
A chough of as deep chat. Shakspeare.

The time between before the fire they sat,
And shorten'd the delay by pleasing chat.
Dryden.

The least is good, far greater than the tickling of his palate with a glass of wine, or the idle chat of a soaking club. Locke.

Snuff, or the fan, supplies each pause of chat,
With singing, laughing, ogling, and all that.
Pope.

CHAT. n. s. The keys of trees are called chats; as ash chats.

CHA'TEAU. n. s. [Fr.] A castle.

The strong chateaus, those feudal fortresses, that were ordered to be demolished, attracted next the attention of your committee. Burke.

CHA'TELET.* n. s. [Fr. diminut. of chateau.] A little castle. Chambers.

CHA'TELLANY. n. s. [châtelenie, Fr.] The district under the dominion of a castle.

Here are about twenty towns and forts of great importance, with their chatellanies and dependencies. Swift.

CHA'TTEL.† n. s. [See CATTLE. Goth. katila; old Fr. catals, catels, chatels, moveables of any kind. V. Charpentier, Kelham, and Roquefort. Some of our elder authors write the word cattel. The etymology of chattel is by some referred to the Lat. castellum or capitale; low Lat. captale.] Any moveable possession: a term now scarce used but in forms of law.

Nay, look not big, nor stamp, nor stare, nor fret;
I will be master of what is mine own;
She is my goods, my chattels. Shakspeare.

Honour's a lease for lives to come,
And cannot be extended from
The legal tenant: 'tis a chattel
Not to be forfeited in battle. Hudibras.

To CHA'TTER.† v. n. [caqueter, Fr. Dr. Johnson. — Our word was formerly chitter: "The swalowes chyterid and songe." Golden Legend, 1493.]

1. To make a noise as a pie, or other unharmonious bird.

Like a crane, or a swallow, so did I chatter.
Isaiah, xxxviii. 14.

Nightingales seldom sing, the pie still chattereth. Sidney.

So doth the cuckow, when the mavis sings,
Begin his witless note apace to chatter. Spenser.

There was a crow sat chattering upon the back of a sheep; Well, sirrah, says the sheep, you durst not have done this to a dog. L'Estrange.

Your birds of knowledge, that in dusky air
Chatter futurity. Dryden.

2. To make a noise by collision of the teeth. See To CHITTER.

Stood Theodore surpriz'd in deadly fright,
With chattering teeth, and bristling hair upright.
Dryden.

Dip but your toes into cold water,
Their correspondent teeth will chatter. Prior.

3. To talk idly or carelessly.

Come hither you, to whom the breath
Of musick is a second death;
Whose untun'd ears are neither fit
For concord, poesie, nor wit;
That chatter in unpointed prose,
And use no organ but the nose.
Jordan's Poems, (before 1650.)

CHA'TTER. n. s. [from the verb.]

1. Noise like that of a pie or monkey.

The mimick ape began his chatter,
How evil tongues his life bespatter. Swift.

2. Idle prate.

CHA'TTERBOX.* n. s. A word of contempt, applied to such as are perpetually talking of themselves, or talking idly but incessantly of other things.

CHA'TTERER.† n. s. [from chatter.] An idle talker; a prattler. Sherwood.

CHA'TTERING.* n. s. [from chatter.] Idle or unprofitable talk.

Suffer no hour to pass away in a lazy idleness, an impertinent chattering, or useless trifles.
Watts, Logick.

CHA'TTY.* adj. [from chat.] Full of prate; chattering; conversing freely.

Expect me in your dressing room as constant as your India cabinet, and as chatty as your parrot. Montagu's Letters, i. 35.

CHA'TWOOD. n. s. Little sticks; fuel.

CHA'UDRON.* See CHAWDRON.

CHA'VENDER. n. s. [chevesne, Fr.] The chub; a fish.

These are a choice bait for the chub, or chavender, or indeed any great fish. Walton's Angler.

CHAUMONTE'LLE. n. s. [French.] A sort of pear.

CHAUN.* n. s. [Sax. ȝeonan, to yawn, to gape; Gr. χαίνω.] A gap; a chasm.

Full of crannies, full of chauns. Cotgrave in V. Fendu.

The earth at first, you must suppose, was a very paradise; but in process of time, the sun, with its mighty heat, so parched and filled it with chops and chauns, which descended very far into the earth, and prepared it for a rupture. Bp. H. Croft on Burnet's Theory, (1685,) p. 113.

To CHAUN.* v. n. To open. Sherwood.

CHAUNT.* See CHANT.

To CHAW.† v. a. [kawen, Germ. ceopan, Sax. The old past participle is chawen; the modern, chawed.] To champ between the teeth; to masticate; to chew.

I home returning, fraught with foul despite,
And chawing vengeance all the way I went.
Spenser, F. Q.

They be forced to say, that accidents be broken, eaten, drunken, chawen, and swallowed without any substance at all.
Abp. Cranmer, Answer to Bp. Gardiner, p. 391.

They come to us, but us love draws;
He swallows us, and never chaws;
He is the tyrant pike, and we the fry. Donne.

Whether he found any use of chawing little sponges, dipt in oil, in his mouth, when he was perfectly under water, and at a distance from his engine. Boyle.

The man who laught but once to see an ass
Mumbling to make the cross-grain'd thistles pass,
Might laugh again, to see a jury chaw
The prickles of unpalatable law. Dryden.

CHAW. n. s. [from the verb.] The chap; the upper or under part of a beast's mouth.

I will turn thee back, and put hooks into thy chaws, and will bring thee forth and all thine army. Ezekiel, xxix. 4.

CHA'WDRON.† n. s. [written also cauldron, and chaudron.] Entrails.

Add thereto a tyger's chawdron,
For the ingredients of our cauldron. Shaksp.

Sheeps-heads will stay with thee? —
Yes, sir, or chauldrons.
Beaum. and Fl. Nice Valour.

CHAWN.* See CHAUN.

CHEAP.† adj. [ceapan. Sax. koopen, Dutch, to buy, from the Goth. kaupan.]

1. To be had at a low rate; purchased for a small price.

Where there are a great many sellers to a few buyers, there the thing to be sold will be cheap. On the other side, raise up a great many buyers for a few sellers, and the same thing will immediately turn dear. Locke.

2. Of small value; easy to be had; not respected.

The goodness, that is cheap in beauty, makes beauty brief in goodness. Shakspeare.

Had I so lavish of my presence been,
So common hackney'd in the eyes of men,
So stale and cheap to vulgar company. Shaksp.

He that is too much in any thing, so that he giveth another occasion of society, maketh himself cheap. Bacon.

May your sick fame still languish till it die,
And you grow cheap in every subject's eye.
Dryden.

The titles of distinction, which belong to us, are turned into terms of derision, and every way is taken by profane men, towards rendering us cheap and contemptible. Atterbury.

CHEAP.† n. s. [cheping is an old word for market; whence Eastcheap and Cheapside. Dr. Johnson might have added, that our ancient lexicography gives "chepe for price," Prompt. Parv.] Market; purchase: bargain: as good cheap; [à bon marché, Fr.]

It is like to children sittynge in chepynge.
Wicliffe, St. Matt. xi.

The same wine which we pay so dear for now a days, in that good world was very good cheap. Sidney.

Victuals shall be so good cheap upon earth, that they shall think themselves to be in good case.
2 Esdras, xvi. 21.

It is many a man's case to tire himself out with hunting after that abroad, which he carries about him all the while, and may have it better cheap at home. L'Estrange.

Some few insulting cowards, who love to vapour good cheap, may trample on those who give least resistance. Decay of Piety.

To CHE'APEN.† v. a. [Goth. kaupan, ceapan, Sax. to buy.]

1. To attempt to purchase; to bid for any thing; to ask the price of any commodity.

Rich she shall be, that's certain; wise, or I'll none; virtuous, or I'll never cheapen her. Shaksp.

He goes on negociating and cheapening the loyalty of our faithful governour of Ireland.
Milton, Observ. on Peace between E. of Orm. and the Irish.

The first he cheapened was a Jupiter, which would have come at a very easy rate. L'Estrange.

She slipt sometimes to Mrs. Thody's,
To cheapen tea. Prior.

To shops in crouds the daggled females fly,
Pretend to cheapen goods, but nothing buy. Swift.

2. To lessen value.

My hopes pursue a brighter diadem:
Can any brighter than the Roman be?
I find my profer'd love has cheapen'd me.
Dryden.

CHE'APENER.* n. s. [from cheapen. Prompt. Parv. chepener, negotiator.] A bargainer. Sherwood.

CHE'APLY. adv. [from cheap.] At a small price; at a low rate.

By these I see
So great a day as this is cheaply bought. Shaksp.

Blood, rapines, massacres, were cheaply bought,
So mighty recompence your beauty brought.
Dryden.

CHE'APNESS. n. s. [from cheap.] Lowness of price.

Ancient statutes incite merchant strangers to bring in commodities; having for end cheapness. Bacon.

The discredit which is grown upon Ireland, has been the great discouragement to other nations to transplant themselves hither, and prevailed farther than all the invitations which the cheapness and plenty of the country has made them. Temple.

CHEAR. See CHEER.

To CHEAT.† v. a. [of uncertain derivation; probably from acheter, Fr. to purchase, alluding to the tricks used in making bargains. See the noun, Dr. Johnson says; where escheat is proposed as the etymology, and perhaps justly. But the Sax. ceatt, circumvention, may be noticed. Serenius gives the old Goth. kyta, deceitfully to impose upon.]

1. To defraud; to impose upon; to trick. It is used commonly of low cunning.

It is a dangerous commerce, where an honest man is sure at first of being cheated; and he recovers not his losses, but by learning to cheat others. Dryden.

There are people who find that the most effectual way to cheat the people, is always to pretend to infallible cures. Tillotson.

2. It has of before the thing taken away by fraud.

I that am curtail'd of this fair proportion,
Cheated of feature by dissembling nature,
Deformed, unfinish'd. Shakspeare.

CHEAT.† n. s. [from the verb. Some think abbreviated from escheat, because many fraudulent measures being taken by the lords of manors in procuring escheats, cheat, the abridgement, was brought to convey a bad meaning. This may be further illustrated. "They call their art [gaming] by a new found name, as cheating; themselves, cheators; and the dice, cheters; borrowing the term from among our lawyers, with whom all such casuals as fall to the lord at the holding of his leets, as waifes, straies, and such like, be called chetes, and are accustomably said to be escheated to the lord's use." Greene's Michel Mumchance, his Discoverie of the Art of Cheating, before 1600.]

1. A fraud; a trick; an imposture.

The pretence of publick good is a cheat that will ever pass, though so abused by ill men, that I wonder the good do not grow ashamed to use it. Temple.

Emp'rick politicians use deceit,
Hide what they give, and cure but by a cheat.
Dryden.

When I consider life, 'tis all a cheat;
Yet, fool'd with hope, men favour the deceit,
Trust on, and think to-morrow will repay;
To-morrow's falser than the former day;
Lyes worse; and while it says, we shall be blest,
With some new joys cuts off what we possest.
Dryden.

2. A person guilty of fraud.

Dissimilation can be no further useful than it is concealed; for as much as no man will trust a known cheat. South.

Like that notorious cheat, vast sums I give,
Only that you may keep me while I live.
Dryden.

CHE'ATABLENESS.* n. s. [from cheat.] Liableness or proneness to be deceived.

Not faith, but folly, an easy cheatableness of heart; and not confidence, but presumption. Hammond's Works, iv. 554.

CHEAT-BREAD.* n. s. [probably from the Fr. achet, bought.] Fine bread; bought bread; in opposition to that of a coarser quality, usually baked at home; or, as we now say, wheaten, in contradistinction to houshold. Cotgrave renders "bisblanc, wheaten or cheat bread."

Without French wines, cheat-bread, or quails. Com. of Eastward Hoe.

CHEA'TER.† n. s. [from cheat.] One that practises fraud.

I will be cheater to them both, and they shall be exchequers to me. Shakspeare.

[It is in the preceding example, by way of joke or quibble, for escheator; "with the es left out, and so turned cheater," as Lord Coke in his Charge at Norwich, in 1607, thus played upon the word.]

They say this town is full of couzenage,
As nimble jugglers that deceive the eye;
Disguised cheaters, prating mountebanks,
And many such like libertines of sin. Shaksp.

He is no swaggerer, hostess; a tame cheater i'faith. ——— Cheater, call you him? I will bar no honest man my house, nor no cheater. Shaksp.

All sorts of injurious persons, the sacrilegious, the detainers of tithes, cheaters of men's inheritances, false witnesses and accusers.
Bp. Taylor's Rule of living Holy.

To CHECK.† v. a. [from the French echecs, chess; from whence we use, at that game, the term checkmate, when we stop our adversary from carrying on his play any farther. The Dutch have also the word schaak, belonging to the game of chess. But see the remarks on CHECKMATE.]

1. To repress; to curb.

Reserve thy state; with better judgement check
This hideous rashness. Shakspeare.

Fames may be sown and raised, they may be spread and multiplied, they may be checked and laid dead. Bacon.

I hate when vice can bolt her arguments,
And virtue has no tongue to check her pride.
Milton, Comus.

He who sat at a table, richly and deliciously furnished, but with a sword hanging over his head by one single thread or hair, surely had enough to check his appetite. South.

2. To reprove; to chide.

Richard, with his eye brimful of tears,
Then check'd and rated by Northumberland,
Did speak these words, now prov'd a prophecy.
Shakspeare.

His fault is much, and the good king his master
Will check him for't. Shakspeare.

The king, which erst kept all the realme in doubt,
The veriest rascall now dare checke and flout.
Mir. for Mag. p. 293.

3. To compare a bank note or other bill, with the correspondent paper.

4. To controul by a counter reckoning; to compare the items of an account with vouchers, so as to check and controul it, and thus ascertain its justness. This sense seems to have been taken not from the game of chess, as Mr. Malone also has observed, but from the chequered cloth on the board of the Exchequer, which was used for settling accounts passed before the court. See Archæologia, vol. ix. p. 28.

To CHECK. v. n.

1. To stop; to make a stop: with at.

With what wing the stanyel checks at it. Shaks.

He must observe their mood on whom he jests,
The quality of the persons, and the time;
And, like the haggard, check at every feather
That comes before his eye. Shakspeare.

The mind, once jaded by an attempt above its power, either is disabled for the future, or else checks at any vigorous undertaking ever after.
Locke.

2. To clash; to interfere.

If love check with business, it troubleth men's fortunes. Bacon.

3. To strike with repression.

I'll avoid his presence;
It checks too strong upon me. Dryden.

CHECK.† n. s. [from the verb.]

1. Repressure; stop; rebuff; sudden restraint.

Rebellion in this land shall lose his sway,
Meeting the check of such another day. Shaksp.

We see also, that kings that have been fortunate conquerors in their first years, must have some check or arrest in their fortunes.
Bacon, Essays.

God hath of late years manifested himself in a very dreadful manner, as if it were on purpose to give a check to this insolent impiety. Tillotson.

It was this viceroy's zeal, which gave a remarkable check to the first progress of Christianity.
Addison, Freeholder.

God put it into the heart of one of our princes, to give a check to that sacrilege, which had been but too much winked at. Atterbury.

The great struggle with passions is in the first check. Rogers.

2. Restraint; curb; government; continued restraint.

They who come to maintain their own breach of faith, the check of their consciences much breaketh their spirit. Hayward.

The impetuosity of the new officer's nature needed some restraint and check, for some time, to his immoderate pretences and appetite of power. Clarendon.

Some free from rhyme or reason, rule or check,
Break Priscian's head, and Pegasus's neck. Pope.

While such men are in trust, who have no check from within, nor any views but towards their interest. Swift.

3. A reproof; a slight.

Oh! this life
Is nobler than attending for a check. Shakspeare.

I do know, the state,
However this may gall him with some check,
Cannot with safety cast him. Shakspeare.

So we are sensible of a check,
But in a brow, that saucily controuls
Our action. Beaum. and Fl. The Coronation.

4. A dislike; a sudden disgust; something that stops the progress.

Say I should wed her, would not my wise subjects
Take check, and think it strange? perhaps revolt?
Dryden.

5. In falconry, when a hawk forsakes her proper game to follow rooks, pies, or other birds that cross her flight.
Chambers.

The free haggard
(Which is that woman, that hath wing, and knows it, Spirit and plume,) will make an hundred checks,
To shew her freedom.
Beaum. and Fl. Tamer Tamed.

A young woman is a hawk upon her wings; and if she be handsome, she is the more subject to go out on check. Suckling.

When whistled from the fist,
Some falcon stoops at what her eye design'd,
And with her eagerness, the quarry miss'd,
Straight flies at check, and clips it down the wind.
Dryden.

6. The person checking; the cause of restraint; a stop.

He was unhappily too much used as a check upon the lord Coventry. Clarendon.

A satyrical poet is the check of the laymen on bad priests. Dryden, Fables, Preface.

7. Any stop or interruption.

The letters have the natural production by several checks or stops, or, as they are usually called, articulations of the breath or voice.
Holder's Elements of Speech.

8. The corresponding cipher of a bank bill. This word is often corruptly used for the draft itself of the person on his banker.

9. A term used in the game of chess, when one party obliges the other either to move or guard his king.

10. Linen cloth fabricated in squares of the same or of different colours.

11. Clerk of the CHECK, in the king's household, has the check and controulment of the yeoman of the guard, and all the ushers belonging to the royal family.

12. Clerk of the CHECK, in the king's navy at Plymouth, is also the name of an officer invested with like powers.
Chambers.

To CHE'CKER.† } v. a. [from echecs, chess,
To CHE'QUER. } Fr. Dr. Johnson says. Serenius offers the old Goth. adj. skiakr, different; whence, perhaps, both the Dutch schakereen, to variegate, and our checker.] To variegate or diversify, in the manner of a chess-board, with alternate colours, or with darker and brighter parts.

The grey ey'd morn smiles on the frowning night,
Checkering the eastern clouds with streaks of light. Shakspeare.

The green leaves quiver with the cooling wind,
And make a checquer'd shadow on the ground.
Shakspeare.

As the snake roll'd in the flow'ry bank,
With shining checker'd slough doth sting a child,
That for the beauty thinks it excellent. Shaksp.

The wealthy spring yet never bore
That sweet, nor dainty flower,
That damask'd not the checker'd floor
Of Cynthia's summer bower. Drayton.

Many a youth and many a maid,
Dancing in the chequer'd shade. Milton, L'All.

CHE'CKLESS.* adj. [from check.] Uncontrollable; violent.

The hollow murmur of the checkless winds
Shall groan again.
Marston, Trag. of the Malcontent.

CHE'CKMATE † n. s. [echec et mat, Fr.] The movement on the chess-board, that kills the opposite men, or hinders them from moving, Dr. Johnson says. Check-mate, or simply mate, Mr. Tyrwhitt has observed, is the term used when the king is actually made prisoner, and the game finished. In the East, scheck-mæt signifies the king is dead. See Sadler's Rights of the Kingdom, 1649, p. 43.

Love they him called, that gave me checkmate,
But better might they have behote him Hate.
Spenser, Shep. Cal.

To CHE'CKMATE.* v. a. [from the noun.] To finish, figuratively.

Our days be datyd
To be checkmated
With drawttys of death. Skelton, Poems, p. 258.

Standing at some poor sutler's tent
With his pike cheek'd, to guard the tun
He must not taste when he has done.
Cotton, Epist.

To CHEEP.* v. n. To pule, cheep, or chirp, like a sparrow, or young bird. See CHIRP. Cotgrave in V. Pioler, and Sherwood. I am informed, that in some parts of the north, cheep is still applied to the note of a bird newly hatched.

CHEER.† n. s. [chere, Fr. entertainment; cara, Sp. the countenance. It seems to have, in English, some relation to both these senses, Dr. Johnson says. It certainly has; and, in that of countenance, may be also referred to the old Fr. chére, which is visage, mine, as well as reception; low Lat. cara; from the Gr. κάρα or κάρη, the head. See Menage.]

1. Entertainment; provisions served at a feast.

But though my cates be mean, take them in good part;
Better cheer you may have, but not with better heart. Shakspeare.
His will was never determined to any pursuit of good cheer, poignant sauces, and delicious wines.
Locke.

2. Invitation to gaiety.

You do not give the cheer; the feast is sold
That is not often vouched, while 'tis making,
'Tis given with welcome. Shakspeare.

3. Gaiety; jollity.

Nothing did he dread, but ever was ydrad,
Spenser, F. Q. i. i. 2.
A gentlewoman of cheere very mild, named Grace. Transl. of Boccacio, 1587.
Which publick death, receiv'd with such a cheer,
As not a sigh, a look, a shrink bewrays
The least felt touch of a degenerous fear,
Gave life to envy, to his courage praise. Daniel.
He ended; and his words their drooping cheer
Enlighten'd, and their languish'd hope reviv'd.
Milton, P. L.
At length appear
Her grisly brethren stretch'd upon the bier:
Pale at the sudden sight, she chang'd her cheer.
Dryden.

5. Perhaps temper of mind in general; for we read of heavy cheer.

Then were they all of good cheer, and they also took some meat. Acts, xxvii. 36.

6. Acclamation; shout of triumph or applause; as, he was received with loud cheers; the toast was given with three cheers.

To CHEER.† v. a. [from the noun, Dr. Johnson says; we may also refer to the Fr. verb. cherer, which is from the Gr. χαίρω.]

1. To incite; to encourage; to inspirit.

He complained that he was betrayed: yet, for all that, was nothing discouraged, but cheered up the footmen. Knolles.
He cheer'd the dogs to follow her who fled,
And vow'd revenge on her devoted head.
Dryden, Fables.

2. To comfort; to console.

I died, ere I could lend thee aid;
But cheer thy heart, and be thou not dismay'd.
Shakspeare.

Cheerly rouse the slumb'ring morn. Milton, L'All.

Under heavy arms the youth of Rome
Their long laborious marches overcome;
Cheerly their tedious travels undergo.
Dryden, Virg.

CHE'ERY.† adj. [from cheer.] Gay; sprightly; having the power to make gay: a ludicrous word, Dr. Johnson says; which is a hasty remark. For our old lexicography presents this word without such meaning or imputation: "To say a thing with a merrie countenance, cheerie visage, look full of glee." Cotgrave in V. LIE.

Come, let us hie, and quaff a cheery bowl;
Let cider new wash sorrow from thy soul.
Gay, Pastorals.

CHEESE. n. s. [caseus, Lat. ceje, Sax.] A kind of food made by pressing the curd of coagulated milk, and suffering the mass to dry.

CHESS.† n. s. [echec, Fr.] A nice and abstruse game, in which two sets of men are moved in opposition to each other. The first citation, which Dr. Johnson gives, ascribes the invention of the game to the Persian magi. Mr. Bryant says, that "to the Indo-Cuthites is attributed the most rational and amusing game, called chess; and the names of the several pieces prove that we received it from them." Analys. of Anc. Mythology, vol. iii. p. 510.
This game the Persian magi did invent,
The force of Eastern wisdom to express;
From thence to busy Europeans sent,
And styl'd by modern Lombards pensive chess.
Denham.
So have I seen a king on chess,
(His rooks and knights withdrawn,
His queen and bishops in distress)
Shifting about, grow less and less,
With here and there a pawn. Dryden.

CHE'SS-APPLE. n. s. A species of Wild Service.

CHE'SS-BOARD. n. s. [from chess and board.] The board or table on which the game of chess is played.

A company of chessmen, standing on the same squares of the chessboard where we left them: we say, they are all in the same place, or unmoved. Locke.

CHE'SS-PLAYER. n. s. [from chess and player.] A gamester at chess.
Thus like a skilful chessplayer, he draws out his men, and makes his pawns of use to his greater persons. Dryden.

CHE'SSOM. n. s. Mellow earth.
The tender chessom and mellow earth is the best, being mere mould, between the two extremes of clay and sand; especially if it be not loomy and binding. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

CHEST.† n. s. [Celt. kest; Goth. and Su. kista; Welsh, cist, cyst; Sax. cyꝛt; Lat. cista; formerly used for a coffin, as by Chaucer: "He is now ded, and nailed in his cheste:" whence our verb to chest, in this sense; of which Dr. Johnson has taken no notice. The Sax. substantive is so used. Kist is our old word, found in manuscripts of Gower; and is still our Yorkshire word for chest. Mr. Tooke refers to the Sax. ceaꝛt, used for womb, in Alfred's Laws by Lambard, fol. 21. But perhaps the Hebrew kis, as Dr. Jamieson has observed, a little chest or bag for holding weights or money, is the root.]
1. A box of wood or other materials, in which things are laid up.
He will seek there, on my word: neither press, chest, trunk, well, vault, but he hath an abstract for the remembrance of such places. Shakspeare.
But more have been by avarice opprest,
And heaps of money crowded in the chest. Dryden.
2. A CHEST of Drawers. A case with moveable boxes or drawers.

To CHEST.† v. a. [from the noun.]
1. To reposite in a chest; to hoard.
2. To place in a coffin; "to chest a dead corpse with spice and sweet ointments in a coffin." Haloet.
He dieth, and is chested. Genesis, l. 26. Contents of the Chapter.
That afternoon we chested our late commander, putting some great shot with him into it, that he might presently sink. Terry, Voyage to the E. Indies, (1655,) p. 41.

CHE'ST-FOUNDERING. n. s. A disease in horses. It comes near to a pleurisy, or peripneumony, in a human body. Farrier's Dict.

CHE'STED. adj. [from chest.] Having a chest; as, broad-chested, narrow-chested.

CHE'STER. See CASTOR.

CHE'STNUT.† } n. s. [chastaigne, Fr. castanea, Lat. so
CHE'STNUT-TREE. } called from Castania in Asia Minor, whence the chesnut was brought into Europe. The word is frequently pronounced, and sometimes written, chesnut.]
1. The tree hath katkins, which are placed at remote distances from the fruit, on the same tree. The outer coat of the fruit is very rough, and has two or three nuts included in each husk or covering. This tree was formerly in greater plenty, as may be proved by the old buildings in London, which were, for the most part, of this timber; which is equal in value to the best oak, and, for many purposes, far exceeds it, particularly for making vessels for liquours; it having a property, when once thoroughly seasoned, to maintain its bulk constantly, and is not subject to shrink or swell, like other timber. Miller.

2. The fruit of the chestnut tree.

A woman's tongue,
That gives not half so great a blow to the ear,
As will a chestnut in a farmer's fire. Shaksp.

October has a basket of services, medlars and chestnuts, and fruits that ripen at the latter time. Peacham on Drawing.

3. The name of a brown colour.

His hair is of a good colour. ——
—— An excellent colour: your chestnut was ever the only colour. Shakspeare.

Merab's long hair was glossy chestnut brown. Cowley.

CHE'STON. n. s. A species of plum.

CHE'VACHIE.* n. s. [Fr. low Lat. chevalchia.] An expedition with cavalry. Obsolete.

He had been sometime in chavechie,
In Flaundres, in Artois, and in Picardie. Chaucer, C. T. Prol.

CHE'VAGE.* See CHIEFAGE.

CHEVALIER. n. s. [chevalier, Fr.] A knight; a gallant strong man.

Renowned Talbot doth expect my aid;
And I am lowted by a traitor-villain,
And cannot help the noble chevalier. Shaksp.

CHEVA'UX de Frise. n. s. [Fr. The singular cheval de frise is seldom used.] The Friesland horse, which is a piece of timber, larger or smaller, and traversed with wooden spikes, pointed with iron, five or six feet long; used in defending a passage, stopping a breach, or making a retrenchment to stop the cavalry. It is also called a turnpike or tourniquet. Chambers.

CHE'VEN.† n. s. [chevesne, Fr. from chef, the head; the fish having a large head.] A river fish; the same with chub.

The fishes of this lake were trouts, pikes, chevins, and tenches. Sir T. Brown, Tracts, p. 99.

CHE'VERIL.† n. s. [old Fr. chevrel, from chevreau, i. e. petit chevre. V. Roq. This word, now obsolete, was a favourite expression with our ancestors to denote the pliability of certain consciences; and to the solitary instance of a cheveril conscience in Shakspeare, given by Dr. Johnson, a pleasant illustration of the phrase may be added from an elder writer. B. Jonson has also cheveril conscience, in his Poetaster.] A kid; kid-leather.

A sentence is but a cheveril glove to a good wit: how quickly the wrong side may be turned outward. Shakspeare.

Neither the captains nor souldiers can stand or prevail. And no mervail; for their armoure is of cheverel leather; and the nature of cheverel leather is, that if a man take it by the sides, and pull it in breadth, he may make a little point as brode as both his hands; if he take it by the ends, and pull it in length, he may make it as small as a thread. Moste men now a dayes have cheverel consciences! if the matter touch their owne profit or pleasure, they make their consciences wide enough, and large enough; if it touch another man's profit, they make them as small as a thread. Bp. of Chichester's Serm. at Paul's Cross, (1576.) c. viii.

Which gifts the capacity
Of your soft cheveril conscience would receive,
If you might please to stretch it. Shakspeare.

O, here's a wit of cheveril, that stretches from an inch narrow to an ell broad. Shakspeare.

To CHE'VERILIZE.* v. a. [from cheveril.] To make as pliable as kidleather. Not now in use.

I appeal unto your own, though never so much cheverillized, consciences, my good calumniators; can there be inferred a just accusation? Mountagu, App. to Cæs. p. 23.

CHE'VISANCE.† n. s. [chevisance, Fr.]

1. Enterprize; achievement. A word now not in use.

Fortune, the foe of famous chevisance,
Seldom, said Guyon, yields to virtue aid. Spenser, F. Q.

2. Bargain. [old Fr. cheivsawns, chevissance. An agreement between debtor and creditor, in relation to the loan of money. Kelham.]

They maken many a wrong chevisaunce,
Heaping up waves of wealth and woe. Spenser, Shep. Cal. May.

CHE'VRON.† n. s. [French.] One of the honourable ordinaries in heraldry. It represents two rafters of a house, set up as they ought to stand. Harris.

The masquers were placed in a great concave shell, like mother of pearl; — the top thereof was stuck with a cheveron of lights, which, indented to the proportion of the shell, struck a glorious beam upon them, as they were seated one above another. B. Jonson, Masques at Court.

CHE'VRONED.* adj. [from chevron.] Variegated in the shape of a chevron.

Their bases were of watchet cloth of silver, cheveroned all over with lace. B. Jonson, Masques at Court.

CHE'VRONEL.* n. s. A diminutive of, and in size half, the heraldick chevron.

To CHEW. v. a. [ceopan, Sax. kauwen, Dutch. It is very frequently pronounced chaw, and perhaps properly.]

1. To grind with the teeth; to masticate.

If little faults, proceeding on distemper,
Shall not be wink'd at, how shall we stretch our eye,
When capital crimes chew'd, swallow'd, and digested,
Appear before us? Shakspeare.

Pacing through the forest,
Chewing the food of sweet and bitter fancy. Shakspeare.

This pious cheat, that never suck'd the blood,
Nor chew'd the flesh of lambs. Dryden, Fables.

The vales
Descending gently, where the lowing herd
Chews verdurous pasture. Philips.

By chewing, solid aliment is divided into small parts: in a human body, there is no other instrument to perform this action but the teeth. By the action of chewing, the spittle and mucus are squeezed from the glands, and mixed with the aliment; which action, if it be long continued, will turn the aliment into a sort of chyle. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

2. To meditate; or ruminate in the thoughts.

While the fierce monk does at his trial stand,
He chews revenge, abjuring his offence:
Guile in his tongue, and murder in his hand,
He stabs his judge, to prove his innocence. Prior.

3. To taste without swallowing.

Heav'n's in my mouth,
As if I did but only chew its name. Shaksp.

Some books are to be tasted, others to be swallowed, and some few to be chewed and digested: that is, some books are to be read only in parts; others to be read, but not curiously; and some few to be read wholly, with attention. Bacon.

To CHEW. v. n. To champ upon; to ruminate.

I will with patience hear, and find a time;
Till then, my noble friend, chew upon this. Shakspeare.

Inculcate the doctrine of disobedience, and then leave the multitude to chew upon't. L'Estrange.

Old politicians chew on wisdom past,
And blunder on in business to the last. Pope.

CHEW.* n. s. [from the verb.] That which is chewed; a vulgarism, as a chew of tobacco.

CHE'WING.* n. s. [Sax. ceopung.] Mastication.

CHE'WET.* n. s. [probably from chew. See CHUET.] A pie consisting of various articles chopped, and mixed together. Cotgrave terms the "chewet pie, goubelet." There is a receipt for this olio, whether fried or baked, in the Archæologia, vol. 15. p. 12.

A kind of dainty chewet, or minced pie. Florio, Ital. Dict. in V. Frilingotti.

Men laden with bottles of wine, chewets, and currant-custards. Middleton's Witch, ii. 1.

CHI'BBAL.* n. s. [Fr. ciboule. In the north of England chibe is the word; Sax. cipe, Lat. cepa.] A small kind of onion.

Ye eating rascals,
Whose gods are beef and brewis, whose brave angers
Do execution upon these, and chibbals. Beaum. and Fl. Bonduca.

CHICA'NE.† n. s. [chicane, Fr. derived by Menage from the Spanish word chico, little, Dr. Johnson says. But Morin asserts, that both Menage and Huet derive the word from the Gr. δικανικὸς, he who loves a suit at law. Others derive it from σικανὸς, which at first signifies a Sicilian, and afterwards a deceiver, because the Sicilians were so esteemed. V. Morin, Dict. Etym. Fr. and Gr. in V. CHICANEUR.]

1. The art of protracting a contest by petty objection and artifice.

The general part of the civil law concerns not the chicane of private cases, but the affairs and intercourse of civilized nations, grounded upon the principles of reason. Locke.

His attornies have hardly one trick left; they are at an end of all their chicane. Arbuthnot, Hist. of John Bull.

2. Artifice in general. This sense is only in familiar language.

Unwilling then in arms to meet,
He strove to lengthen the campaign,
And save his forces by chicane. Prior.

To CHICA'NE.† v. n. [chicaner, Fr.] To prolong a contest by tricks.

Give me but virtuous actions, and I will not quibble and chicane about the motives. Ld. Chesterfield.

CHICA'NER. n. s. [chicaneur, Fr.] A petty sophister; a trifling disputant; a wrangler.

This is the way to distinguish the two most different things I know, a logical chicaner from a man of reason. Locke.

CHICA'NERY. n. s. [chicanerie, Fr.] Sophistry; mean arts of wrangle.

His anger caused him to destroy the greatest part of these reports; and only to preserve such as discovered most of the chicanery and futility of the practice. Arbuthnot.

CHI'CHES.† n. s. [old Fr. chiches; chichpeas, Sherwood; from the Lat. cicer.]

Dwarf peas, or vetches. See CHICK-PEAS.

Such things as neede not much moisture, as sperie, chich, and the other pulses.
B. Googe's Husbandrie, (1586.) fol. 18. b.

He chiches gives, for winter laid aside;
Nor are the long and slender oats denied.
Sir J. Beaumont's Poems, p. 41.

CHI'CHLING VETCH. n. s. [lathyrus, Lat.] In Germany they are cultivated, and eaten as peas, though neither so tender nor well tasted. Miller.

CHICK. n. s. } [cicen, Sax. kiecken,
CHI'CKEN.† n. s. } Dutch. Chicken is, I believe, the old plural of chick, though now used as a singular noun, Dr. Johnson says. The old proverb, however, yet countenances chicken as the regular plural; and we still say, "a couple of chicken." See Ray's Prov. "Children and chicken must always be picking."

1. The young of a bird, particularly of a hen, or small bird.

All my pretty ones!
What all my pretty chickens, and their dam,
At one fell swoop! Shakspeare.

For when the shell is broke, out comes a chick.
Davies.

While it is a chick, and hath no spurs, nor cannot hurt, nor hath seen the motion, yet he readily practiseth it. Hale.

Ev'n since she was a se'en-night old, they say,
Was chaste and humble to her dying day;
Nor chick, nor hen, was known to disobey.
Dryden, Fables.

Having the notion that one laid the egg out of which the other was hatched, I have a clear idea of the relation of dam and chick. Locke.

On rainy days alone I dine,
Upon a chick and pint of wine;
On rainy days I dine alone,
And pick my chicken to the bone. Swift.

2. A word of tenderness.

My Ariel, chick,
This is thy charge. Shakspeare.

3. A term for a young person.

Then, Chloe, still go on to prate
Of thirty-six and thirty-eight;
Pursue your trade of scandal-picking,
Your hints, that Stella is no chicken. Swift.

To CHICK.* v. n. [from the Sax. cicen.] To sprout, as seed in the ground; to vegetate. A word still used in some parts of England. "Chykynge or sprowting of corne, pullulatus; to chyken as corne, or spyren, pullulo." Promp. Parv.

CHI'CKENHEARTED. adj. [from chicken and heart.] Cowardly; timorous; fearful.

Now we set up for tilting in the pit,
Where 'tis agreed by bullies, chickenhearted,
To fright the ladies first, and then be parted.
Prol. to Sp. Friar.

The CHI'CKENPOX. n. s. An exanthematous distemper, so called from its being of no very great danger.

CH'ICKLING. n. s. [from chick.] A small chicken.

CHI'CKPEAS.† n. s. See CHICHES. A peculiar sort of pea.

CHI'CKWEED. n. s. [chick and weed.] The name of a plant.

Green mint, or chickweed, are of good use, in all the hard swellings of the breast, occasioned by milk. Wiseman.

To CHIDE.† v. a. preter. chid or chode, part. chid or chidden. [Sax. chiðan, part. chið.]

1. To reprove; to check; to correct with words: applied to persons.

Chide him for faults, and do it reverently,
When you perceive his blood inclin'd to mirth.
Shakspeare.

And fly like chidden Mercury from Jove.
Shakspeare.

Those, that do teach your babes,
Do it with gentle means, and easy tasks;
He might have chid me so: for, in good faith,
I am a child to chiding. Shakspeare.

Scylla wept,
And chid her barking waves into attention.
Milton, Com.

Above the waves as Neptune shew'd his face,
To chide the winds, and save the Trojan race.
Waller.

You look, as if yon stern philosopher
Had just now chid you. Addison.

If any woman of better fashion in the parish happened to be absent from church, they were sure of a visit from him, to chide and to dine with her. Swift.

2. To drive with reproof.

Margaret my queen, and Clifford too,
Have chid me from the battle. Shakspeare.

If, rather than to marry county Paris,
Thou hast the strength of will to slay thyself;
Then it is likely, thou wilt undertake
A thing like death to chide away this shame.
Shakspeare, Romeo and Juliet.

3. To blame; to reproach: applied to things.

He'll call you to so hot an answer for it,
That caves and womby vaultages of France
Shall chide your trespass. Shakspeare, K. Hen. V.

Winds murmur'd through the leaves your long delay,
And fountains, o'er the pebbles, chid your stay.
Dryden.

I chid the folly of my thoughtless haste;
For, the work perfected, the joy was past. Prior.

To CHIDE.† v. n.

1. To clamour; to scold.

Therefore the Jews chidden togidere, and seyden, how may this give to us his fleisch to ete?
Wicliffe, St. John, vi.

What had he to do to chide at me? Shakspeare.

Next morn, betimes, the bride was missing:
The mother scream'd, the father chid,
Where can this idle wench be hid? Swift.

2. To quarrel with.

And the people chode with Moses.
Numbers, xx. 3. (Transl. 1578.)

The business of the state does him offence,
And he does chide with you. Shakspeare.

3. To make a noise.

My duty,
As doth a rock against the chiding flood,
Should the approach of this wild river break,
And stand unshaken yours. Shakspeare.

CHIDE.* n. s. [from the verb.] Murmur; gentle noise.

Nor the chide of streams,
And hum of bees, inviting sleep sincere
Into the guiltless breast. Thomson, Autumn.

CHI'DER.† n. s. [from chide.] A rebuker; a reprover.

Whether any be brawlers, slanderers, chiders, scolders, and sewers of discord between one and another. Abp. Cranmer, Articles of Visitation.

Not her that chides, sir, at any hand, I pray. — I love no chiders, sir. Shakspeare.

CHI'DERESS.* n. s. [from chider.] She who chides. Obsolete.

If one be full of wantonnesse,
Another is a chideresse.
Chaucer, Rom. of the Rose.

CHI'DING.* n. s. [Sax. ciðinʒ.]

1. Rebuke; contention; quarrel.

He called the name of the place Massah, and Meribah, because of the chiding [in the margin strife] of the children of Israel, and because they tempted the Lord. Exod. xvii. 7.

Well thou know'st what cruel chidings
Oft I've from my mother borne.
Bp. Percy, Alcanzor and Zaida.

2. Simply, noise; sound.

I was with Hercules and Cadmus once,
When in a wood of Crete they bay'd the boar
With hounds of Sparta: never did I hear
Such gallant chiding. Shakspeare, M. N. Dr.

CHI'DINGLY.* adv. [from chiding.] After the manner of chiding. Huloet.

CHIEF.† adj. [chef, the head, Fr. from the Gr. κέφαλη.]

1. Principal; most eminent; above the rest in any respect.

These were the chief of the officers that were over Solomon's works. 1 Kings, ix. 13.

My lord chief justice, speak to that vain man.
Shakspeare, K. Hen. IV. P. II.

The hand of the princes and rulers hath been chief in this trespass. Ezra, ix. 2.

Your country, chief in arms, abroad defend;
At home, with morals, arts, and laws amend.
Pope.

2. Eminent; extraordinary.

A froward man soweth strife, and a whisperer separateth chief friends. Proverbs, xvi. 28.

3. Capital; of the first order; that to which other parts are inferiour, or subordinate.

I came to have a good general view of the apostle's main purpose in writing the epistle, and the chief branches of his discourse wherein he prosecuted it. Locke.

4. It is used by some writers with a superlative termination; but, I think improperly: the comparative chiefer is never found.

We beseech you, bend you to remain,
Here in the cheer and comfort of our eye,
Our chiefest courtier, cousin, and our son.
Shakspeare.

Doeg an Edomite, the chiefest of the herdmen.
1 Sam. xxi. 7.

He sometimes denied admission to the chiefest officers of the army. Clarendon.

CHIEF. n. s. [from the adjective.]

1. A military commander; a leader of armies; a captain.

Is pain to them
Less pain, less to be fled? or thou than they
Less hardy to endure? courageous chief!
The first in flight from pain. Milton, P. L.

After or before were never known
Such chiefs; as each an army seem'd alone.
Dryden.

A wit's a feather, and a chief a rod;
An honest man's the noblest work of God. Pope.

A prudent chief not always must display
His pow'rs in equal ranks, and fair array;
But with th' occasion and the place comply,
Conceal his force, nay seem sometimes to fly. Pope.

2. In CHIEF, in law. In capite, by personal service.

All sums demandable, either for licence of alienation to be made of lands holden in chief, or for the pardon of any such alienation already made without licence, have been stayed in the way to the hanaper. Bacon.

I shall be proud to hold my dependance on you in chief, as I do part of my small fortune in Wiltshire. Dryden.

3. In Spenser it seems to signify somewhat like achievement; a mark of distinction.

Where be the nosegays that she dight for thee?
The coloured chaplets wrought with a chief,
The knottish rush-rings, and gilt rosemary.
Spenser.

4. In heraldry.

The chief is so called of the French word chef, the head or upper part: this possesses the upper third part of the escutcheon.
Peacham on Drawing.

CHIEF.* adv. [from the adj.] Chiefly.

Then, issuing cheerful, to thy sport repair,
Chief, should the western breezes curling play,
And light o'er ether bear the shadowing clouds.
Thomson, Spring.

CHIEF.* n. s. [old Fr. chef, from cheoir; whence mescheoir, meschief; and thence our word mischief. See also BONCHIF.] Hap; fortune. Prompt. Parv. Not now in use, except in the compound mischief.

CHI'EFAGE, or CHE'VAGE.* n. s. [old Fr. chevage, poll-money paid by a villain to his lord, Kelham; from chef, the head.] A tribute by the head.

The Jews, allowed to live in England, long paid chevage, or poll-money; viz. three pence per head, at Easter. Chambers.

CHI'EFDOM. n. s. [from chief.] Sovereignty. Not in use.

Zephyrus being in love with Chloris, and coveting her to wife, gave her for a dowry the chiefdom and sovereignty of all flowers and green herbs.
Spenser, Shep. Cal. Gloss.

CHI'EFLESS. adj. [from chief.] Wanting a head; being without a leader.

And chiefless armies doz'd out the campaign,
And navies yawn'd for orders on the main. Pope.

CHI'EFLY. adv. [from chief.] Principally; eminently; more than common.

Any man who will consider the nature of an epick poem, what actions it describes, and what persons they are chiefly whom it informs, will find it a work full of difficulty. Dryden.

Those parts of the kingdom, where the number and estates of the dissenters chiefly lay. Swift.

CHI'EFRIE. n. s. [from chief.] A small rent paid to the lord paramount.

They shall be well able to live upon those lands, to yield her majesty reasonable chiefrie, and also give a competent maintenance unto the garrisons.
Spenser, on Ireland.

Would the reserved rent at this day be any more than a small chiefrie? Swift.

CHI'EFTAIN.† n. s. [old Fr. chefetain; and in our ancient language chevetain and cheventeyn. Chaucer uses the former in the Knight's Tale; and the latter occurs in a ballad of earlier days than his. See Ritson's Anc. Songs, p. 19.]

1. A leader; a commander.

That forc'd their chieftain, for his safety's sake,
(Their chieftain Humber named was aright)
Unto the mighty stream him to betake,
Where he an end of battle and of life did make.
Spenser, F. Q.

2. The head of a clan.

It broke, and absolutely subdued all the lords and chieftains of the Irishry. Davies on Ireland.

CHI'EFTAINRY.* } n. s. [from chieftain.]
CHI'EFTAINSHIP.* } Headship.

The chieftainship of the highlandry is a very dangerous influence. Smollet.

The laird of Raarsa has sometimes disputed the chieftainry of the clan with Macleod of Skie.
Johnson, Lett. to Mrs. Thrale.

CHIE'VANCE. n. s. [probably from achevance, Fr. purchase.] Traffick, in which money is extorted; as discount. Now obsolete.

There were good laws against usury, the bastard use of money; and against unlawful chievances and exchanges, which is bastard usury. Bacon.

To CHIEVE, or CHEVE.* v. n. [Fr. chevir.] To turn out; to come to a conclusion; to succeed. Not yet obsolete. Chieve in Lancashire is to prosper.

Evil mote he cheve. Chaucer, Chan. Yeom. Tale.
It chieves nought with him.
Ray, N. C. Words, p. 14.

CHI'LBLAIN. n. s. [from chill, cold, and blain; so that Temple seems mistaken in his etymology, or has written it wrong to serve a purpose.] Sores made by frost.

I remembered the cure of childblanes when I was a boy, (which may be called the children's gout,) by burning at the fire. Temple.

CHILD.† n. s. [Sax. cild; Goth. kilthein, the womb; inkiltho, with child; probably from the Heb. choul, to bring forth.] In the plural children.

1. An infant, or very young person.

A faire young man,
Of wondrous beauty, and of freshest years: —
Whom when the palmer saw, abasht he was
Through fear and wonder, that he nought could say,
Till him the child bespoke.
Spenser, F. Q. ii. viii. 5—7.

In age, to wish for youth is full as vain,
As for youth to turn a child again. Denham.

The young lad must not be ventured abroad at eight or ten, for fear of what may happen to the tender child; though he then runs ten times less risque than at sixteen. Locke.

The stroke of death is nothing: children endure it, and the greatest cowards find it no pain. Wake.

2. One in the line of filiation, opposed to the parent.

Of a truth, against thy holy child Jesus, whom thou hast anointed, both Herod and Pontius Pilate, with the Gentiles and the people of Israel, were gathered together. Acts, iv. 27.

Where children have been exposed, or taken away young, and afterwards have approached to their parents' presence, the parents, though they have not known them, have had a secret joy, or other alteration thereupon. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

I shall see
The winged vengeance overtake such children.
Shakspeare.

So unexhausted her perfections were,
That for more children she had more to spare.
Dryden.

He in a fruitful wife's embraces old,
A long increase of children's children told.
Addison.

3. The descendants of a man, how remote soever, are called children; as the children of Edom, the children of Israel.

And the Mdianites, and the Amalekites, and all the children of the east, lay along in the valley like grasshoppers for multitude. Judges, vii. 12.

4. In the language of scripture.

One weak in knowledge.
Isaiah, x. 19. 1 Cor. xiii. 11.

Such as are young in grace. 1 John, ii. 13.

Such as are humble and docile.
St. Matthew, xvii. 3, 4.

The children of light, the children of darkness; who follow light, who remain in darkness.

The elect, the blessed, are also called the children of God.

How is he numbered among the children of God, and his lot is among the saints! Wisdom, v. 5.

In the New Testament, believers are commonly called children of God.

Ye are all the children of God, by faith in Jesus Christ. Gal. iii. 26. Calmet.

5. A girl child. Not in use, Dr. Johnson says. But, in some of our inland counties, the contradistinction of a female to a male infant is said to be yet kept up, among the lower orders, by the word child. See Steevens's Note on the Winter's Tale. Formerly, however, it was just the reverse; child being restrained to the young of the male sex; as, "the child Iulus," a translation of "puer Iulus;" and the children of the chapel, signify the boys of the royal chapel. See Warton's Hist. of Eng. Poetry, vol. iii. p. 23.

Mercy on's, a bearne, a very pretty bearne!
A boy, or child, I wonder.
Shakspeare, Winter's Tale.

6. Any thing, the product or effect of another.

Macduff, this noble passion,
Child of integrity, hath from my soul
Wip'd the black scruples. Shakspeare.

7. A noble youth; like the Fr. bachelier; not always a knight, but sometimes a young man of noble birth dubbed esquire, in his progress to the honour of knighthood; though, in our old ballads and romances, child usually means knight. In Spenser, child Tristram is not knight Tristram, as Bp. Percy has asserted; for he is called child, not after, but before he was made a knight. But Prince Arthur, certainly a knight, is called child by Spenser. See Nares's Gloss.

Every knight had after him riding
Three henchmen [each] on him awaiting: —
And every childe ware of leaves grene
A fresh chapelet upon his haires bright.
Chaucer, Flower and Leaf.

The noble childe, preventing his desire,
Under his club with wary boldnesse went,
And smote him on the knee that never yet was bent. Spenser, F. Q. vi. viii. 15.

8. To be with CHILD. To be pregnant.

If it must stand still, let wives with child
Pray that their burthen may not fall this day,
Lest that their hopes prodigiously be crost.
Shakspeare.

To CHILD. v. n. [from the noun.] To bring children.

The spring, the summer,
The childing autumn, angry winter, change
Their wonted liveries. Shakspeare.

As to childing women, young vigorous people, after irregularities of diet, in such it begins with hæmorrhages. Arbuthnot.

To CHILD.* v. a. To bring forth children.

Whilst ye in durance dwelt, ye to me gave
A little mayde, the which ye childed tho:
The same again if now ye list to have,
The same is yonder lady, whom High God did save. Spenser, F. Q. vi. xii. 17.

An hundred plants beside, e'en in his sight,
Childed an hundred nymphs.
Fairfax, Tasso, xviii. 26.

CHI'LDBEARING. n. s. [from child and bear.] The act of bearing children.

To thee,
Pains only in childbearing were foretold,
And, bringing forth, soon recompens'd with joy,
Fruit of thy womb. Milton, P. L.

The timorous and irresolute Sylvia has demurred 'till she is past childbearing. Addison.

CHI'LDBED. n. s. [from child and bed.]

The state of a woman bringing a child, or being in labour.

The funerals of Prince Arthur, and of Queen Elizabeth, who died in childbed in the Tower. Bacon.

Pure, as when wash'd from spot of childbed stain. Milton, Sonnet.

Yet these, tho' poor, the pain of childbed bear. Dryden.

Let no one be actually married, 'till she hath the childbed pillows. Spectator.

Women in childbed are in the case of persons wounded. Arbuthnot on Diet.

CHI'LDBIRTH. n. s. [from child and birth.] Travail; labour; the time of bringing forth; the act of bringing forth.

The mother of Pyrocles, after her childbirth, died. Sidney.

A kernel void of any taste, but not so of virtue, especially for women travailing in childbirth. Carew's Survey.

In the whole sex of women, God hath decreed the sharpest pains of childbirth; to shew, that there is no state exempt from sorrow. Bp. Taylor, Holy Living.

He to his wife, before the time assign'd
For childbirth came, thus bluntly spoke his mind. Dryden.

CHI'LDED. adj. [from child.] Furnished with a child.

How light and portable my pain seems now,
When that which makes me bend, makes the king bow;
He childed, as I father'd. Shakspeare, K. Lear.

CHI'LDERMAS DAY.† [Sax. cilbamaꝛꝛe-dæg.]

The day of the week, throughout the year, answering to the day on which the feast of the holy Innocents is solemnized, which weak and superstitious persons think an unlucky day.

To talk of hares, or such uncouth things, proves as ominous to the fisherman, as the beginning of a voyage on the day when childermas day fell, doth to the mariner. Carew.

CHI'LDHOOD. n. s. [from child, cilðhað, Sax.]

1. The state of children; or, the time in which we are children: it includes infancy, but is continued to puberty.

Now I have stain'd the childhood of our joy
With blood, remov'd but little from our own. Shakspeare.

The sons of lords and gentlemen should be trained up in learning from their childhoods. Spenser, on Ireland.

Seldom have I ceas'd to eye
Thy infancy, thy childhood, and thy youth. Milton, P. R.

The same authority that the actions of a man have with us in our childhood, the same in every period of life, has the practice of all whom we regard as our superiours. Rogers.

2. The time of life between infancy and puberty.

Infancy and childhood demand thin, copious, nourishing aliment. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

3. The properties of a child.

Their love in early infancy began,
And rose as childhood ripen'd into man. Dryden.

CHI'LDISH.† adj. [Sax. cilðiꝛc.]

1. Having the qualities of a child; trifling; ignorant; simple.

Learning hath its infancy, when it is but beginning and almost childish: then its youth, when it is luxuriant and juvenile. Bacon, Essays.

2. Becoming only children; trifling; puerile.

Musidorus being elder by three or four years, there was taken away the occasion of childish contentions. Sidney.

The lion's whelps she saw how he did bear,
And lull in rugged arms withouten childish fear. Spenser, F. Q.

When I was yet a child, no childish play
To me was pleasing; all my mind was set
Serious to learn and know. Milton, P. R.

The fathers looked on the worship of images as the most silly and childish thing in the world. Stillingfleet.

One that hath newly learn'd to speak and go,
Loves childish plays. Roscommon.

They have spoiled the walls with childish sentences, that consist often in a jingle of words. Addison on Italy.

By conversation the childish humours of their younger days might be worn out. Arbuthnot, Hist. of J. Bull.

CHI'LDISHLY. adv. [from childish.] In a childish trifling way; like a child.

Together with his fame their infamy was spread, who had so rashly and childishly ejected him. Hooker.

Some men are of excellent judgement in their own professions, but childishly unskilful in any thing besides. Hayward.

CHILDISHMI'NDEDNESS.* n. s. [from childish and mind.] Triflingness.

I have somewhat of the French; I love birds, as the king does; and have some childishmindedness wherein we shall consent. Bacon.

CHI'LDISHNESS.† n. s. [from childish.]

1. Puerility; triflingness; state of a child.

Last scene of all,
That ends this strange eventful history,
Is second childishness, and mere oblivion. Shakspeare, As you Like it.

The actions of childishness, and unfashionable carriage, time and age will of itself be sure to reform. Locke.

Nothing in the world could give a truer idea of the superstition, credulity, and childishness of the Roman catholick religion. Addison on Italy.

2. Harmlessness.

Speak thou, boy;
Perhaps thy childishness will move him more
Than can our reasons. Shakspeare.

CHI'LDLESS.† adj. [from child.] Without children; without offspring.

As thy sword hath made women childless, so shall thy mother be childless among women. 1 Samuel, xv. 33.

A man shall see the noblest works and foundations have proceeded from childless men; which have sought to express the images of their minds, where those of their bodies have failed: so the care of posterity is most in them that have no posterity. Bacon, Essays.

Childless thou art, childless remain: so death
Shall be deceiv'd his glut. Milton, P. L.

She can give the reason why one died childless. Spectator.

So the sad nightingale, when childless made
By some rough swain, that steals her young away. Ld. Mulgrave, Virg. Georg. iv.

CHI'LDLIKE. adj. [from child and like.] Becoming or beseeming a child.

Who can owe no less than childlike obedience to her that hath more than motherly care. Hooker.

I thought the remnant of mine age
Should have been cherish'd by her childlike duty. Shakspeare.

CHI'LDLY.* adj. [from child.] Like a child. Not in use.

In childly wyse on her [he] gan to smyle. Lidgate, Fall of Princes, ii. 22.

CHI'LIAD. n. s. [from χιλιας.] A thousand; a collection or sum containing a thousand.

We make cycles and periods of years; as decads, centuries, chiliads, for the use of computation in history. Holder.

CHILIA'EDRON. n. s. [from χιλια.] A figure of a thousand sides.

In a man, who speaks of a chiliaedron, or a body of a thousand sides, the idea of the figure may be very confused, though that of the number be very distinct. Locke.

CHI'LIARCH.* n. s. [χιλιάρχης.] A commander of a thousand. Coles, and Blount.

CHI'LIARCHY.* n. s. [χιλιαρχία.] A body consisting of a thousand men.

The chiliarchies also, or regiments, as I may so call them, of the Lamb, being summed up in this number. More, Myst. of Godl. p. 195.

CHI'LIAST.* n. s. [χιλιάσης.] One of the sect of the millenarians.

To reign with Christ a 1000 years before the ending of the world, was the old errour of the chiliasts. Pagitt's Heresiography, p. 20.

This imposture was put upon us by the Hellenists, those among them who affected that ancient heresy of the chiliasts. Gregory's Posthuma, p. 115.

CHILIFA'CTIVE.† adj. [from chile, or rather chyle. This word and the two following should be written chylifactive, chylifactory, and chylification.] That which makes chile.

Whether this be not effected by some way of corrosion, rather than any proper digestion, chilifactive mutation, or alimental conversion. Brown, Vulg. Err.

CHILIFA'CTORY. adj. [from chile.] That which has the quality of making chile.

We should rather rely upon a chilifactory menstruum, or digestive preparation drawn from species or individuals, whose stomachs peculiarly dissolve lapideous bodies. Brown.

CHILIFICA'TION. n. s. [from chile.] The act of making chile.

Nor will we affirm that iron is indigested in the stomach of the ostrich; but we suspect this effect to proceed not from any liquid reduction, or tendence to chylification, by the power of natural heat. Brown, Vulg. Err.

CHILL.† adj. [cele, Sax. kyla, Su. cold.]

1. Cold; that which is cold to the touch.

And all my plants I save from nightly ill,
Of noisome winds, and blasting vapours chill. Milton, Arcades.

2. Cold; having the sensation of cold; shivering with cold.

My heart, and my chill veins freeze with despair. Rowe.

3. Dull; not warm; not forward: as, a chill reception.

4. Depressed; dejected; discouraged.

5. Unaffectionate; cold of temper.

CHILL. n. s. [from the adjective.] Chillness; cold.

I very well know one to have a sort of chill about his præcordia and head. Derham, Physico-Theology.

To CHILL. v. a. [from the adjective.]

1. To make cold.

Age has not yet
So shrunk my sinews, or so chill'd my veins,
But conscious virtue in my breast remains. Dryd.

Heat burns his rise, frost chills his setting beams,
And vex the world with opposite extremes. Creech.

Each changing season does its poison bring;
Rheums chill the winter, agues blast the spring. Prior.

Now no more the drum
Provokes to arms; or trumpet's clangor shrill
Affrights the wives, or chills the virgin's blood. Philips.

2. To depress; to deject; to discourage.
Every thought on God chills the gaiety of his spirits, and awakens terrors, which he cannot bear. Rogers.

3. To blast with cold.
The fruits perish on the ground,
Or soon decay, by snows immod'rate chill'd,
By winds are blasted, or by lightning kill'd. Blackmore.

To CHILL.* v. n. To shiver.
Ready to chill for cold. Homilies against Excess of Apparel.

CHI'LLINESS. n. s. [from chilly.] A sensation of shivering cold.
If the patient survives three days, the acuteness of the pain abates, and a chilliness or shivering affects the body. Arbuthnot.

CHI'LLY.† adj. [from chill.] Somewhat cold.
Their winters are for the most part sharper than ours —— perchance by vicinity to the chilly tops of the Alps. Wotton, Rem. p. 251.
A chilly sweat bedews
My shuddering limbs. Philips.

CHI'LLY.* adv. Coldly. Sherwood.

CHI'LNESS. n. s. [from chill.] Coldness; want of warmth.
If you come out of the sun suddenly into a shade, there followeth a chilness or shivering in, all the body. Bacon.
This, while he thinks, he lifts aloft his dart,
A gen'rous chilness seizes ev'ry part,
The veins pour back the blood, and fortify the heart. Dryden.

CHIMB. n. s. [kime, Dut.] The end of a barrel or tub.

CHIME.† n. s. [The original of this word is doubtful. Junius and Minsheu suppose it corrupted from cimbal; Skinner from gamme, or gamut; Henshaw from chiamare, to call, because the chime calls to church. Perhaps it is only softened from chirme, or churme, an old word for the sound of many voices, or instruments making a noise together. But Mr. H. Tooke asks where this old word chirm is to be found. I am surprised that it escaped his researches. See To CHIRM.]

1. The consonant or harmonick sound of many correspondent instruments.
Hang our shaggy thighs with bells;
That, as we do strike a tune,
In our dance, shall make a chime. B. Jonson.
The sound
Of instruments, that made melodious chime,
Was heard, of harp and organ. Milton, P. L.
Love virtue, she alone is free;
She can teach you how to climb
Higher than the sphery chime. Milton, Comus.

2. The correspondence of sound.
Love first invented verse, and form'd the rhime,
The motion measur'd, harmoniz'd the chime. Dryden.

3. The sound of bells, not rung by ropes, but struck with hammers. In this sense it is always used in the plural, chimes.
We have heard the chimes at midnight. Shakspeare.

4. The correspondence of proportion or relation.
The conceptions of things are placed in their several degrees of similitude; as in several proportions, one to another: in which harmonious chimes, the voice of reason is often drowned. Grew's Cosmol.

To CHIME. v. n. [from the noun.]

1. To sound in harmony or consonance.
To make the rough recital aptly chime,
Or bring the sum of Gallia's loss to rhime,
'Tis mighty hard. Prior.

2. To correspond in relation or proportion.
Father and son, husband and wife, and such other correlative terms, do belong one to another; and through custom, do readily chime, and answer one another, in people's memories. Locke.

3. To agree; to fall in with.
He not only sat quietly and heard his father railed at, but often chimed in with the discourse. Arbuthnot, Hist. of J. Bull.

4. To suit with; to agree.
Any sect, whose reasonings, interpretation, and language, I have been used to, will, of course, make all chime that way; and make another, and perhaps the genuine meaning of the author, seem harsh, strange, and uncouth to me. Locke.

5. To jingle; to clatter.
But with the meaner tribe I'm forc'd to chime,
And, wanting strength to rise, descend to rhyme. Smith.

To CHIME. v. a.

1. To move, or strike, to cause to sound harmonically, or with just consonancy.
With lifted arms they order ev'ry blow,
And chime their sounding hammers in a row:
With labor'd anvils Ætna groans below. Dryden, Georg.

2. To strike a bell with a hammer.

CHI'MER.* n. s. [from chime.] One who chimes the bells. Sherwood.

CHIME'RA.† n. s. [Chimæra, Lat.] A vain and wild fancy, as remote from reality as the existence of the poetical chimera, a monster feigned to have the head of a lion, the belly of a goat, and the tail of a dragon.
In short, the force of dreams is of a piece.
Chimeras all; and more absurd, or less. Dryden, Fables.
No body joins the voice of a sheep with the shape of a horse, to be the complex ideas of any real substances, unless he has a mind to fill his head with chimeras, and his discourse with unintelligible words. Locke.

CHIME'RE.* n. s. [Ital. ciamare, old Fr. chamarre. Dryden writes the word simar, or symar, which Dr Johnson has defined "a woman's robe;" and Henry Wharton, the eminent antiquary, samarra, but not in Dr. Johnson's limited and imperfect meaning. See SIMAR. This variation of orthography arises, perhaps, from imitating the Dutch word samare, the Span. zamarro, or the Goth. samaria; the last of which denotes the priestly gown; as chimere, in some degree, is used by us.] A robe.
The chimere [is] the upper robe, to which the lawn sleeves are generally sewed; which before and after the reformation, till Queen Elizabeth's time, was always of scarlet silk; but Bishop Hooper scrupling first at the robe itself, and then at the colour of it, as too light and gay for the episcopal gravity, it was changed for a chimere of black satin. Wheatley on the Comm. Prayer, ii. § 4.

CHIME'RICAL.† adj. [old Fr. chimerique.] Imaginary; fanciful; wildly, vainly, or fantastically conceived; fantastick.
As if the solemnity of this vow had never had beginning! Chimerical fancies, fit for a shorn head. Bp. Hall, Honour of the Married Clergy, p. 512.
Notwithstanding the fineness of this allegory may atone for it in some measure, I cannot think that persons of such a chimerical existence are proper actors in an epic poem. Spectator.

CHIME'RICALLY. adv. [from chimerical.] Vainly; wildly; fantastically.

To CHI'MERIZE.* v. n. [from chimera.] To entertain wild fancies. Not in use.
What are all these but sophistical dreams and chimerizing ideas of shallow imaginative scholars? Transl. of Boccalini, (1626.) p. 226.

CHI'MINAGE. n. s. [from chemin, an old law word for a road.] A toll for passage through a forest. Cowel.

CHI'MNEY.† n. s. [cheminée, French, from the Lat. caminus, which also figuratively denotes fire. Wicliffe employs chimney, where the latter translations employ furnace. "And they schulen send hem into the chimney of fier; there schal be wepying and beting togidre of teeth. St. Matt. xiii.]

1. The passage through which the smoke ascends from the fire in the house.
Chimnies, with scorn, rejecting smoke. Swift.

2. The turret raised above the roof of the house, for conveyance of the smoke.
The night has been unruly: where we lay,
Our chimnies were blown down. Shakspeare.

3. The fireplace.
The chimney
Is south the chamber; and the chimneypiece,
Chaste Dian bathing. Shaksp. Cymbeline.
The fire which the Chaldeans worshipped for a god, is crept into every man's chimney. Raleigh, Hist.
Low offices, which some neighbours hardly think it worth stirring from their chimney sides to obtain. Swift on Sac. Test.

CHI'MNEY-CORNER.† n. s. [from chimney and corner.] The fireside; the seat on each end of the firegrate; usually noted in proverbial language for being the place of idlers.
Yet some old men
Tell stories of you in their chimney-corner. Denham.
Perhaps he had it from an old woman in a chimney-corner, or out of a romance. Leslie's Short Method with the Deists.

CHI'MNEY-MONEY.* Hearth-money, or a tax imposed by statute, in Charles the the Second's time, on fire-hearths, and stoves in houses; and abolished in the first year of William and Mary.

CHI'MNEYPIECE. n. s. [from chimney and piece.] The ornamental piece of wood, or stone, that is set round the fireplace.
Polish and brighten the marble hearths and chimneypieces with a clout dipt in grease. Swift.

CHI'MNEYSWEEPER. n. s. [from chimney and sweeper.]

1. One whose trade it is to clean foul chimnies of soot.
To look like her, are chimneysweepers black:
And since her time are colliers counted bright. Shakspeare.
The little chimneysweeper skulks along,
And marks with sooty stains the heedless throng. Gay.
Even lying Ned the chimneysweeper of Savoy and Tom the Portugal dustman, put in their claims. Arbuthnot.

2. It is used proverbially for one of a mean and vile occupation.
Golden lads and girls, all must,
As chimneysweepers, come to dust. Shaksp.

CHI'MNEYTOP.* n. s. [from chimney and top.] The summit of a chimney.

Many a time and oft
Have you climb'd up to walls and battlements,
To towers and windows, yea, to chimney-tops.
Shakspeare, Jul. Cæs.

CHIN.† n. s. cinne, Sax. kinn, Germ. from the Goth. kinnus, kinn. It may be curious to add, that the Pers. chynoser is the chin. See Sir T. Herbert's Travels, p. 316.] The part of the face beneath the under lip.

But all the words I could get of her, was wrying her waist, and thrusting out her chin. Sidney.
With his amazonian chin he drove
The bristled lips before him. Shakspeare.
He rais'd his hardy head, which sunk again,
And, sinking on his bosom, knock'd his chin.
Dryden.

CHI'NNED.* adj. [from chin.] Used in composition for having a long or short chin; "long-chinned." Kersey.

CHI'NA. n. s. [from China, the country where it is made.] China ware; porcelain; a species of vessels made in China, dimly transparent, partaking of the qualities of earth and glass. They are made by mingling two kinds of earth, of which one easily vitrifies; the other resists a very strong heat: when the vitrifiable earth is melted into glass, they are completely burnt.

Spleen, vapours, or small-pox, above them all,
And mistress of herself, tho' china fall. Pope.
After supper, carry your plate and china together in the same basket. Swift.

CHI'NA-ORANGE. n. s. [from China and orange.] The sweet orange; brought originally from China.

Not many years has the China-orange been propagated in Portugal and Spain.
Mortimer's Husbandry.

CHI'NA-ROOT. n. s. [from China and root.] A medicinal root, brought originally from China.

CHI'NCOUGH.† n. s. [perhaps more properly kincough, from kincken, to pant, Dutch, and cough; Goth. and Su. kikna, to have the respiration interrupted. Kersey, in 1702, calls it the 'chine-cough, vulgò chin-cough."] A violent and convulsive cough, to which children are subject.

It shall ne'er be said in our country
Thou dy'dst o'th' chin-cough.
Beaum. and Fl. Bonduca.
I have observed a chincough, complicated with an intermitting fever. Floyer on the Humours.

CHINE.† n. s. [eschine, Fr. schiena, Ital. spina, Lat. cein, Arm.]

1. The part of the back, in which the spine or back-bone is found.

She strake him such a blow upon his chine, that she opened all his body. Sidney.
He presents her with the tusky head,
And chine, with rising bristles roughly spread.
Dryden.

2. A piece of the back of an animal.

Cut out the burly boned clown in chines of beef ere thou sleep. Shakspeare.
He had killed eight fat hogs for this season, and he had dealt about his chines very liberally amongst his neighbours. Spectator.

3. The prominence of the staves beyond the head of a cask. The word is well known to coopers.

Jennings, West. of Eng. Dialects, 1825.

To CHINE.† v. a. [from the noun. Fr. eschiner, "to chine, to divide, or break the back of." Cotgrave.] To cut into chines.

He that in his line did chine the long rib'd Apennine. Dryden.

CHI'NED.* adj. [from chine.] Relating to the back.

Some hind, that, like another Milo, [can] bear quarters of malt upon his back, and sing with it; thrash all day, and in the evening in his stockings strike up a hornpipe: These be they, these steel-chined rascals. Beaum. and Fl. Scornful Lady.

CHINE'SE.* n. s. Used elliptically for the language of the people of China; and for the people themselves, having, in our language, for its plural, Chineses, a circumstance which requires to be noticed.

The Chineses are no quarrellers, albeit voluptuous. Sir T. Herbert, Trav. p. 364.
The barren plains
Of Scricana, where Chineses drive
With sails and wind their cany waggons light.
Milton, P. L.

CHI'NGLE.* n. s. [perhaps a corruption of channel; which indeed the passage in Donne illustrates.] Gravel, free from dirt. It is yet a local word.

In the superficies whereof was represented in a fair work the flood Meander, running with his returns and windings; in the channel of which, one might see a splendour of precious stones, representing his rolling waves; which chingle was of carbuncles, emeralds, agates, and all other sorts of precious stones, sparkling in their native lustre.
Donne, Hist of the Septuagint, p. 51.

CHINK. n. s. [cinan, to gape, Sax.] A small aperture longwise; an opening or gap between the parts of any thing.

Pyramus and Thisby did talk through the chink of a wall. Shaksp. Mids. N. Dream.
Plagues also have been raised by anointing the chinks of doors and the like.
Bacon, Nat. Hist.
Though birds have no epiglottis, yet they so contract the chink of their larinx, as to prevent the admission of wet or dry indigested.
Brown, Vulg. Err.
Other inventions, false and absurd, that are like so many chinks and holes to discover the rottenness of the whole fabrick. South.
In vain she search'd each cranny of the house,
Each gaping chink, impervious to a mouse. Swift.

To CHINK. v. a. [derived by Skinner from the sound.] To shake so as to make a sound.

He chinks his purse, and takes his seat of state:
With ready quills the dedicators wait.
Pope, Dunciad.

To CHINK. v. n. To sound by striking each other.

Lord Strutt's money shines as bright, and chinks as well, as 'squire South's.
Arbuthnot, Hist of J. Bull.
When not a guinea chink'd on Martin's boards,
And Atwill's self was drain'd of all his hoards.
Swift.

To CHINK.* v. a. [Sax. cinan.] To break into apertures or chinks. "To be chinked or crannied." Huloet. "To chink or chap, as the north wind does, the face." Cotgrave in V. Geroer.

The surface, which is the skin of that great body, is chopped, and chinked with drought, and burnt up with heat. Seasonable Serm. p. 15.

To CHINK.* v. n. To open, or gape; as, "the boat chinketh." Barret.

CHI'NKY. adj. [from chink.] Full of holes; gaping; opening into narrow clefts.

But plaister thou the chinky hives with clay.
Dryden, Virgil.
Grimalkin, to domestick vermin sworn
An everlasting foe, with watchful eye
Lies nightly brooding o'er a chinky gap
Protending her fell claws, to thoughtless mice
Sure ruin. Philips's Poems.

CHINTS. n. s. Cloath of cotton made in India, and printed with colours.

Let a charming chints, and Brussels lace,
Wrap my cold limbs, and shade my lifeless face.
Pope.

CHI'OPPINE.† n. s. [from chapin, Span. often written chapin or chopin, in our own language.] A high shoe, formerly worn by ladies.

Your ladyship is nearer heaven than when I saw you last, by the altitude of a chioppine. Shaksp.
Nor are those short-legged ladies thought less godly, who fly to chopines.
Bp. Taylor, Artif. Handsom. p. 60.
The queen of Spain took off one of her chapins, and clowted Olivarez about the noddle with it, because he had accompanied the king to a lady of pleasure. Howell's Lett. ii. 43.
The woman was a giantess, and yet walked always in chioppines. Cowley.

To CHIP. v. a. [probably corrupted from chop.] To cut into small pieces; to diminish, by cutting away a little at a time.

His mangled myrmidons
Noseless, handless, hackt and chipt come to him,
Crying on Hector. Shaksp. Troil. and Cress.
To return to our statue in the block of marble, we see it sometimes only begun to be chipped; sometimes rough hewn, and just sketched into an human figure. Addison, Spect.
The critick strikes out all that is not just;
And 'tis ev'n so the butler chips his crust. King.
Industry
Taught him to chip the wood, and hew the stone.
Thomson.

CHIP, CHEAP, CHIPPING, in the names of places, imply a market; from the Sax. cypan, ceapan, to buy. Gibson.

To CHIP.* v. n. [Dutch kippen, to hatch; to disclose.] To break, or crack. An egg is said to chip, when the young bird cracks the shell. A north country word. Grose. Potters also now use the phrase, meaning the flying of small pieces, or the breaking at the edges, of earthen ware.

CHIP.† n. s. [from the verb.]

1. A small piece taken off by a cutting instrument.

As children be it as it were chippes hewen from their parents, so are other things when they are disjoined one of them from another.
Expos. of Solomon's Song, (1585.) p. 232.
Cucumbers do extremely affect moisture, and over-drink themselves, which chaff or chips forbiddeth. Bacon.
That chip made iron swim, not by natural power. Bp. Taylor.
The straw was laid below;
Of chips and serewood was the second row.
Dryden, Fables.

2. A small piece, however made.

The manganese lies in the vein in lumps wrecked, in an irregular manner, among clay, spar, and chips of stone. Woodward.

CHIP-AXE.* n. s. A chip-axe, or one-handed plane-axe, wherewith carpenters hew their timber smooth.

Huloet, and Cotgrave in V. Aisceau.

CHI'PPING.† n. s. [from To chip.] A fragment cut off.

I know you were one could keep
The buttery-hatch still lock'd and save the chippings. B. Jonson, Alchemist.

They dung their land with the chippings of a sort of soft stone. Mortimer, Husbandry.

The chippings and filings of these jewels, could they be preserved, are of more value than the whole mass of ordinary authours. Felton on the Classicks.

CHIRA'GRA. n. s.* [Lat. and Fr. chiragre, from the Gr. χεὶρ the hand, and ἄγρος inert.] The gout in the hands only.

CHIRA'GRICAL. adj. [chiragra, Lat.] Having the gout in the hand; subject to the gout in the hand.

Chiragrical persons do suffer in the finger as well as in the rest, and sometimes first of all. Brown, Vulg. Err.

To CHIRK.* v. n. [Teut. circken, to chirp; and perhaps chirk is our true word for chirp; which is hardly a contraction of cheer up, as Dr. Johnson supposes; but rather a corruption of chirk. Dr. Jamieson has connected chirp with cheep or chepe, to peep or cry as young birds in the nest; and in his illustration of chirk, which he defines only "to make a grating noise," has overlooked the use of the word in Chaucer, where it expresses the brisk or cheerful noise of the bird, not the puling of it in the nest.] To chirp.

This frere ariseth up ful curtisly,
And hir embraceth in his armes narrowe,
And kisseth hir swete, and chirketh as a sparrowe
With his lippes. Chaucer, Sompnour's Tale.

To CHIRM.* v. n. [Huloet, noticing this old verb, says "to chirme, or to chur, as birds do, Lat. gingrio." Gingrio, however, is to gaggle or cackle. But to chur, or chirre, is to coo. See To CHIRRE. Possibly it may mean, generally, to sing, as the example which I bring seems to shew; Lat. carmen, whence our charm, and Sax. cipm, a charm; and so chirm. The Dutch verb kermen, to moan, is hardly applicable to this sense.] To sing, as a bird.

The bird chirmes as it is whistled to.
Wodroephe's Fr. Gr. (1623.) p. 505.

CHI'ROGRAPH.* n. s. [Fr. chirographe, from chirographie, "double copie d'un acte passé entre plusieurs personnes, an 1200." Lacombe. Lat. chirographum, from χεὶρ the hand, and γράφω, to write.]

1. Formerly, a deed, requiring a counterpart, engrossed twice upon the same piece of parchment, and cut through the middle; the same as charter-party; which see.
2. Formerly also, a fine: a phrase still preserved in the office of the chirographer in the common pleas.

CHIRO'GRAPHER.† n. s. [from chirograph.] He that exercises or professes the art or business of writing; and by way of distinction, the officer in the common pleas who engrosses fines.

Thus passeth it from this office to the chirographer's, to be engrossed.
Bacon, Office of Alienation.

CHIRO'GRAPHIST. n. s. [See CHIROGRAPHER.] This word is used in the following passage, I think improperly, for one that tells fortunes, by examining the hand: the true word is chirosophist, or chiromancer.

Let the physiognomists examine his features; let the chirographists behold his palm; but, above all, let us consult for the calculation of his nativity. Arbuthnot, on Pope.

CHIRO'GRAPHY. n. s. [See CHIROGRAPHER.] The art of writing.

CHIRO'LOGY.* n. s. [Fr. chirologie, Gr. χεὶρ and λόγος.] What we now call, talking by the hand.

Cheirology is interpretation by the transient motions of the fingers; which, of all other ways of interpretation, comes nearest to that of the tongue. Dalgarno, Deaf and Dumb Man's Tutor, (Ox. 1680.) Introd.

CHI'ROMANCER. n. s. [See CHIROMANCY.] One that foretells future events by inspecting the hand.

The middle sort, who have not much to spare,
To chiromancers' cheaper art repair,
Who clap the pretty palm, to make the lines more fair. Dryden, Juvenal.

CHI'ROMANCY.† n. s. [Fr. chiromancie, Gr. χεὶρ, the hand, and μαντὶς, a prophet.] The art of foretelling the events of life, by inspecting the hand. Sometimes written chiromanty.

There is not much considerable in that doctrine of chiromancy that spots in the top of the nails, do signify things past; in the middle, things present; and at the bottom, events to come. Brown, Vulg. Err.

Other signs [of melancholy] there are taken from physiognomy, metoposcopy, chiromancy. Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 58.

The thumb, in chiromanty, we give Venus. B. Jonson, Alchemist.

To CHIRP.† v. n. [perhaps contracted from cheer up; and the Dutch have circken, Dr. Johnson says; but the etymology is more fully shewn in To chirk, which silences the supposition of cheer up. But the word chirrup has certainly hence been formed.] To make a cheerful noise; as birds, when they call without singing.

She chirping ran, he peeping flew away. Sidney.

And thinks he, that the chirping of a wren
Can chase away the first conceived sound? Shakspeare.

How cheerfully do these little birds chirp, and sing, out of the natural joy they conceive at the approach of the sun. Bp. Hall, Occ. Medit. 36.

No chirping lark the welkin sheen invokes. Gay, Pastorals.

The careful hen
Calls all her chirping family round. Thomson, Spring.

To CHIRP. v. a. [This seems apparently corrupted from cheer up.] To make cheerful.

Let no sober bigot here think it a sin,
To push on the chirping and moderate bottle. Jonson.

Sir Balaam now, he lives like other folks;
He takes his chirping pint, he cracks his jokes. Pope.

CHIRP. n. s. [from the verb.] The voice of birds or insects.

Winds over us whisper'd, flocks by us did bleat,
And chirp went the grasshopper under our feet. Spectator.

CHI'RPER. n. s. [from chirp.] One that chirps; one that is cheerful.

CHI'RPING.* n. s. [from chirp.] The gentle noise of birds.

Let the songs be loud and cheerful, and not chirpings or pulings. Bacon.

To CHIRRE. v. n. [ceopian, Sax.] See CHURME. To coo as a pigeon. Junius.

To CHI'RRUP.* See To CHIRP. It is a colloquial word, in the sense of to make cheerful.

CHIRU'RGEON.† n. s. [old Fr. chirurgien, Gr. χειρουργος, from χεὶρ, the hand, and εργον, work. Ιατρος χειρουργων. S. Chrysostom, in Psal. 50. Opp. tom. i. p. 697. edit. Savile.] One that cures ailments, not by internal medicines, but outward applications. It is now generally pronounced, and by many written, surgeon, Dr. Johnson says. Surgeon, it must be added, was the old word; and not modern, as Dr. Johnson's remark insinuates.

Thou art surgyon that cureth sinne deedly.
Old Morality of Every Man.

When a man's wounds cease to smart, only because he has lost his feeling, they are nevertheless mortal, for his not seeing his need of a chirurgeon. South, Sermons.

CHIRU'RGERY.† n. s. The art of curing by external applications. This is called Surgery, [old Fr. chirurgie.]

Gynecia having skill in chirurgery, an art in those days much esteemed. Sidney.

Nature could do nothing in her case without the help of chirurgery, in drying up the luxurious flesh, and making way to pull out the rotten bones. Wiseman.

CHIRU'RGICAL.† } adj. [old Fr. chirurgial.] See CHIRURGEON.
CHIRU'RGICK. }

1. Having qualities useful in outward applications to hurts.

As to the chirurgical or physical virtues of wax, it is reckoned a mean between hot and cold. Mortimer.

2. Relating to the manual part of healing.

In the merchaunt's second tale, or history of Beryn, falsely ascribed to Chaucer, a chirurgical operation of changing eyes is partly performed by the assistance of the occult sciences. Warton, Hist. of Eng. Poetry, i. 440.

3. Manual in general, consisting in operations of the hand. This sense, though the first, according to etymology, is now scarce found.

The chirurgical or manual part doth refer to the making instruments, and exercising particular experiments. Wilkins.

CHI'SEL.† n. s. [ciseau, Fr.; Ital. cisello, of scissum, Lat.] An instrument with which wood or stone is pared away.

What fine chisel
Could ever yet cut breath? Let no man mock me,
For I will kiss her. Shakspeare.

There is such a seeming softness in the limbs, as if not a chisel had hewn them out of stone, but a pencil had drawn and stroaked them in oil. Wotton, Architecture.

Imperfect shapes: in marble such are seen,
When the rude chisel does the man begin. Dryd.

To CHI'SEL v. a. [from the noun. Fr. ciseler.] To cut with a chisel.

A grace [step] there was, ychesyld all of stone
Out of the rock.
Hawes, Hist. of Graunde Amoure, (1555.) ch. 3.

CHIT.† n. s. [according to Dr. Hickes, from kind, Germ. child; perhaps from chico, little, Span. To this etymology, given by Dr. Johnson, it may be added, that the dwarf pea, or chitch-pea, is called a chit. See Sherwood's Dict. 1632. Citto is an Italian word, addressed to children in order to make them hold their peace, when noisy. Florio's Ital. Dict. Citto is also a low Italian word for a little dirty boy.]

1. A child; a baby. Generally used of young persons in contempt.

These will appear such chits in story,
'Twill turn all politicks to jest. Anonymous.

She pinched me, and called me squealing chit, and threw me into a girl's arms that was taken in to tend me. Tatler, No. 89.

2. The shoot of corn from the end of the grain. A cant term with maltsters. This is probably a corruption of chick. See To CHICK.

Barley, couched four days, will begin to shew the chit or sprit at the root-end.
Mortimer, Husbandry.

3. A freckle. [from chick-pease.] In this sense it is seldom used. Huloet denominates "chits in the face or body, warts;" and gives the adjective chitty also from this word. See CHITTY.

To CHIT. v. n. [from the noun.] To sprout; to shoot at the end of the grain: cant.

I have known barley chit in seven hours after it had been thrown forth. Mortimer's Husbandry.

CHI'TCHAT.† n. s. [corrupted by reduplication from chat.] Prattle; idle prate; idle talk. A word only used in ludicrous conversation.

I am a member of a female society, who call ourselves the chitchat club. Spectator.

If Ralph had learning added to the common chit-chat of the town, he would have been a disputant upon all topicks that ever were considered by men of his own genius. Tatler, No. 197.

To CHI'TTER.* v. n. [Dutch, citteren, to tremble for cold.] To shiver. We now use chatter in this sense. See To CHATTER. But our old genuine word is this, "Chyttering, quivering, or shaking for colde." Huloet.

CHI'TTERLING.* n. s. The frill to the breast of a shirt, which appears to have been a very ancient part of dress.

We Englishemen can mocke and scoffe at all countryes for their defectes; but, before they have many times mustred before us, we can learne by lytle and lytle to exceede and pass them all: — of an Italian waist, we make an English petycoate; of a French ruffe, an English chytterling, &c.
Gascoigne, Delicate Diet for Droonkardes, (1576.)

CHI'TTERLINGS.† n. s. [from schyterlingh, Dut. Minsheu; from kutteln, Germ. Skinner.] The guts; the bowels. Dr. Johnson is mistaken in stating the word to be without singular. "A gut or chitterling hanged in the smoke."
Barret.

Cypresse hatbands shrivelled into black chitterlins. Gayton, Notes on D. Quix. iii. 5.

His warped ear hung o'er the strings,
Which was but souse to chitterlings.
Hudibras, i. ii.

CHI'TTY.† adj. [from chit.]

1. Childish; like a baby; as, a chitty face; still a common expression. Sherwood, in his old dictionary, parallels "a chittie-face with chichie-face," old Fr. chicheface, which however means one of a sneaking or miserable appearance.

2. Full of chits or warts. Huloet.

CHI'VALROUS.† adj. [old Fr. chevaleureux, Gower writes our word chevalerous, Conf. Am. B. i.] Relating to chivalry, or errand knighthood; knightly; warlike; adventurous; daring. A word now out of use, Dr. Johnson says; but this is surely not the case.

And noble minds of yore allied were
In brave pursuit of chivalrous emprise.
Spenser, F. Q.

I'll answer thee in any fair degree,
Or chivalrous design of knightly trial.
Shakspeare, K. Rich. II.

The duc de Manuail, count Spadassin, and captain Merdaille, persuade him, [king Picrochole,] that he is the most puissant and chivalrous prince that ever appeared since Alexander the Great! Lowth, Lett. to Warburton.

The Spaniards, from temper and constitution, were extravagantly fond of chivalrous exercises.
Warton, Hist. of Eng. Poet.

CHI'VALRY.† n. s. [chevalerie, Fr. knighthood, from cheval, a horse; as eques in Latin.]

1. Knighthood; a military dignity.

There be now, for martial encouragement, some degrees and orders of chivalry; which, nevertheless, are conferred promiscuously upon soldiers and no soldiers. Bacon, Essays.

2. The qualifications of a knight; as valour; dexterity in arms.

Thou hast slain
The flow'r of Europe for his chivalry. Shakspeare.

I may speak it to my shame,
I have a truant been to chivalry. Shakspeare.

3. The general system of knighthood.

Solemnly he swore,
That by the faith which knights to knighthood bore,
And whate'er else to chivalry belongs,
He would not cease 'till he reveng'd their wrongs.
Dryden.

4. An adventure; an exploit. Not now in use.

They four doing acts more dangerous, though less famous, because they were but private chivalries. Sidney.

5. The body, or order, of knights.

And by his light
Did all the chivalry of England move
To do brave acts. Shakspeare.

Arthur, with all his chivalry.
Milton, Hist. of Eng. B. iii.

6. In law.

Servitium militare, of the French, chevalier; a tenure of land by knights service. There is no land but is holden mediately or immediately of the crown, by some service or other; and therefore are all our freeholds, that are to us and our heirs, called feuda, fees, as proceeding from the benefit of the king. As the king gave to the nobles large possessions for this or that rent and service, so they parcelled out their lands, so received for rents and services as they thought good: and those services are by Littleton divided into chivalry and socage. The one is martial and military; the other, clownish and rustick. Chivalry, therefore, is a tenure of service, whereby the tenant is bound to perform some noble or military office unto his lord, and is of two sorts; either regal, that is, such as may hold only of the king; or such as may also hold of a common person as well as of the king. That which may hold only of the king is properly called sergeantry, and is again divided into grand or petit, i. e. great or small. Chivalry that may hold of a common person as well as of the king, is called scutagium. Cowel.

7. It ought properly to be written chevalry. It is a word not much used, but in old poems or romances, Dr. Johnson says; which is so far from being the case, that few words have been more forcibly employed by writers both of his own time, and since.

We find the divinity lectures of Don Quixote, and the penance of his squire, are both of them in the ritual of chivalry.
Warburton, on Love's Lab. Lost.

I look upon chivalry as on some mighty river, which the fablings of the poets have made immortal. It may have sprung up amidst rude rocks, and blind deserts. But the noise and rapidity of its course, the extent of country it adorns, and the towns and palaces it ennobles, may lead a traveller out of his way, and invite him to take a view of those dark caverns, unde supernè

Plurimus Eridani per sylvam volvitur amnis.
Hurd, Lett. on Chiv. and Rom. L. 2.

I thought ten thousand swords must have leaped from their scabbards to avenge even a look that threatened her with insult. But the age of chivalry is gone. Burke, on the Fr. Revolution.

CHI'VES.† n. s. [cive, Fr. Skinner.]

1. The threads or filaments rising in flowers, with seeds at the end.

The masculine or prolifick seed contained in the chives, or apices of the stamina.
Ray on the Creation.

2. A species of small onion. [old Fr. ceves, ciboule, oignon; cepa, Lat. V. Roq. Gloss.]

CHLORO'SIS. n. s. [from χλώρος, green.] The green-sickness.

CHLORO'TICK.* adj. [Fr. chlorotique, from chlorosis.] Affected by chlorosis; subject to it.

The extasies of sedentary and chlorotick nuns.
Battie.

To CHOAK. See CHOKE.

CHOCK.* n. s. [old Fr. choc, a shock, a brunt, a violent encounter. Cotgrave. "Choquer sa teste contre le muraille, to run his head against a wall."] An encounter; an attack.

One of the kings of France died miserably by the chock of an hog.
Bp. Patrick, Divine Arithmetick, p. 27.

CHO'COLATE.† n. s. [chocolate, Span. Dr. Johnson. It was also called chocolata at first, and termed "an Indian drink." See A. Wood, Ath. Ox. vol. ii. col. 416. ed. 1692.]

1. The nut of the cacao-tree.

The tree hath a rose flower, of a great number of petals, from whose empalement arises the pointal, being a tube cut into many parts, which becomes a fruit shaped somewhat like a cucumber, and deeply furrowed, in which are contained several seeds, collected into an oblong heap, and slit down, somewhat like almonds. It is a native of America, and is found in great plenty in several places between the Tropicks, and grows wild. See Cocoa. Miller.

2. The cake or mass, made by grinding the kernel of the cacao-nut with other substances, to be dissolved in hot water.

The Spaniards were the first who brought chocolate into use in Europe, to promote the consumption of the cacao-nuts, achiot, and other drugs, which their West Indies furnish, and which enter the composition of chocolate. Chambers.

3. The liquour made by a solution of chocolate in hot water.

Chocolate is certainly much the best of these three exotick liquours: its oil seems to be both rich, alimentary, and anodyne. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

In fumes of burning chocolate shall glow,
And tremble at the sea that froths below. Pope.

Cho'colate-house. n. s. [chocolate and house.] A house where company is entertained with chocolate.

Ever since that time, Lisander has been twice a day at the chocolate-house. Tatler.

Chode. [the old preterite, from chide.] See Chide.

And Jacob was wroth, and chode with Laban. Genesis, xxxi. 36.

Choice.† n. s. [choix, French, according to Dr. Johnson; but it is rather from the Saxon ceoꝛan, cıꝛan, to choose. Yet the old French chius may be added. Choice is not often found in the plural number. I have met with an example in Scott.]

1. The act of choosing; determination between different things proposed; election.

If you oblige me suddenly to chuse,
The choice is made; for I must both refuse. Dryden.

If they are not masters of their own choices, whatsoever the rigid laws of necessity determine them to they must necessarily chuse. Scott, Christian Life, P. II. ch. 5. § 3.

Soft elocution doth thy style renown,
Gentle or sharp, according to thy choice,
To laugh at follies, or to lash at vice. Dryden, Persius.

2. The power of choosing; election.

Choice there is not, unless the thing which we take to be so in our power, that we might have refused it. If fire consume the stable, it chooseth not so to do, because the nature thereof is such that it can do no other. Hooker.

There's no liberty like the freedom of having it at my own choice, whether I will live to the world, or to myself. L'Estrange.

To talk of compelling a man to be good, is a contradiction; for where there is force, there can be no choice. Whereas all moral goodness consisteth in the elective act of the understanding will. Grew's Cosmol.

Whether he will remove his contemplation from one idea to another, is many times in his choice. Locke.

3. Care in choosing; curiosity of distinction.

Julius Cæsar did write a collection of apophthegms: it is pity his book is lost; for I imagine they were collected with judgment and choice. Bacon, Apophthegms.

4. The thing chosen; the thing taken or approved, in preference to others.

Your choice is not so rich in birth as beauty:
That you might well enjoy her. Shakspeare.

Take to thee, from among the cherubim,
Thy choice of flaming warriors. Milton, P. L.

Now, Mars, she said, let fame exalt her voice;
Nor let thy conquests only be her choice. Prior.

5. The best part of any thing, that is more properly the object of choice.

The choice and flower of all things profitable in other books, the psalms do both more briefly contain, and more movingly also express. Hooker.

Thou art a mighty prince: in the choice of our sepulchres bury thy dead. Genesis, xxiii. 6.

Their riders, the flower and choice
Of many provinces, from bound to bound. Milton, P. R.

6. Several things proposed at once, as objects of judgment and election.

A braver choice of dauntless spirits,
Did never float upon the swelling tide. Shakspeare.

7. To make Choice of. To choose; to take from several things proposed.

Wisdom, of what herself approves, makes choice,
Nor is led captive by the common voice. Denham.

Choice. adj. [choisi, French.]

1. Select; of extraordinary value.

After having set before the king the choicest of wines and fruits, he told him the best part of his entertainment was to come. Guardian.

Thus in a sea of folly toss'd,
My choicest hours of life are lost. Swift.

2. Chary; frugal; careful. Used of persons.

He that is choice of his time, will also be choice of his company, and choice of his actions. Bp. Taylor's Holy Living.

Choice-drawn.* part. adj. [from choice and draw.] Selected with particular care.

For who is he, whose chin is but enrich'd
With one appearing hair, that will not follow
These cull'd and choice-drawn cavaliers of France? Shakspeare, K. Hen. V.

Cho'iceless. adj. [from choice.] Without the power of choosing; without right of choice; not free.

Neither the weight of the matter, of which the cylinder is made, nor the round voluble form of it, are any more imputable to that dead choiceless creature, than the first motion of it; and, therefore, it cannot be a fit resemblance to shew the reconcileableness of fate with choice. Hammond.

Cho'icely. adv. [from choice.]

1. Curiously; with exact choice.

A band of men,
Collected choicely from each county some. Shaks.

2. Valuably; excellently.

It is certain it is choicely good. Walton's Angler.

Cho'iceness.† n. s. [from choice.] Nicety; particular value.

Make exact animadversion where style hath degenerated, where flourished and thrived in choiceness of phrase. B. Jonson, Discoveries.

Carry into the shade such auriculas, seedlings, or plants, as are for their choiceness reserved in pots. Evelyn's Kalendar.

Choir.† n. s. [old Fr. choëur, Sax. chop, Lat. chorus.]

1. An assembly or band of singers.

They now assist the choir,
Of angels, who their songs admire. Waller.

2. The singers in divine worship.

The choir
With all the choicest musick of the kingdom,
Together sung Te Deum. Shakspeare.

3. The part of the church where the choiristers or singers are placed.

The lords and ladies, having brought the queen
To a prepar'd place in the choir, fell off
At distance from her. Shakspeare.

Choir-Service.* n. s. [from choir and service.] The duty performed by the choir of a cathedral.

That part of our choir-service called the motet or anthem. Warton's Hist. of Eng. Poetry, iii. 183.

To Choke.† v. a. [aceocan, Sax. from ceoca, the cheek or mouth. According to Minsheu, from חכ; from whence, probably, the Spanish, ahogar. From the Goth. kuak, the throat; according to Serenius.]

1. To suffocate; to kill by stopping the passage of respiration.

But when to my good lord I prove untrue,
I'll choke myself. Shakspeare.

The herd ran violently down a steep place into the sea, and were choked in the sea. St. Mark, v. 13.

While you thunder'd clouds of dust did choke
Contending troops. Waller.

2. To stop up; to obstruct; to block up a passage.

Men troop'd up to the king's capacious court,
Whose porticos were chok'd with the resort. Chapman.

They are at a continual expence to cleanse the ports, and keep them from being choked up, by the help of several engines. Addison on Italy.

While prayers and tears his destin'd progress stay,
And crowds of mourners choke their sov'reign's way. Tickell.

3. To hinder by obstruction, or confinement.

As two spent swimmers, that do cling together,
And choke their art. Shakspeare.

She cannot lose her perfect pow'r to see,
Tho' mists and clouds do choke her window light. Davies.

It seemeth the fire is so choked, as not to be able to remove the stone. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

You must make the mould big enough to contain the whole fruit, when it is grown to the greatest; for else you will choke the spreading of the fruit. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

The fire, which chok'd in ashes lay,
A load too heavy for his soul to move,
Was upward blown below, and brush'd away by love. Dryden.

4. To suppress.

And yet we ventur'd; for the gain propos'd
Chok'd the respect of likely peril fear'd. Shakspeare.

Confess thee freely of thy sin:
For to deny each article with oath,
Cannot remove nor choke the strong conception
That I do groan withal. Shakspeare.

5. To overpower.

And that which fell among thorns are they, which, when they have heard, go forth, and are choked with cares, and riches, and pleasures of this life, and bring no fruit to perfection: St. Luke, viii. 14.

No fruitful crop the sickly fields return;
But oats and darnel choke the rising corn. Dryden, Past.

Choke.† n. s. [from the verb, or perhaps, from the Ital. ciocco, a lock of hair. See Artichoke.] The filamentous or capillary part of an artichoke. A cant word.

Choke-full.* adj. [from choke and full. Corruptly pronounced chuck-full.] Filled, so as to leave no more room.

We filled the skins choak-full. Bruce's Travels, iv. 549.

Choke-pear.† n. s. [from choke and pear.]

1. A rough, harsh, unpalatable pear.

2. Any aspersion or sarcasm, by which another is put to silence. A low term, Dr. Johnson says, in citing the passage from Richardson's Clarissa. But it is a phrase of a century's date, at least, beyond Richardson.

After your goodly and vain-glorious banquet, I'll give you a choak-pear.
Webster, Trag. of the White Devil.

Pardon me for going so low as to talk of giving choak-pears. Clarissa.

CHO'KER. n. s. [from choke.]

1. One that chokes or suffocates another.
2. One that puts another to silence.
3. Any thing that cannot be answered.

CHO'KE-WEED. n. s. [ervangina.] A plant.

CHO'KY. adj. [from choke.] That which has the power of suffocation.

CHO'LAGOGUES. n. s. [χόλος, bile.] Medicines which have the power of purging bile or choler.

CHO'LER. n. s. [cholera, Lat. from χολὴ.]

1. The bile.

There would be a main defect, if such a feeding animal, and so subject unto diseases from bilious causes, should want a proper conveyance for choler. Brown, Vulg. Err.

Marcilius Ficimuss increase these proportions, adding two more of pure choler.
Wotton on Education.

2. The humour, which, by its super-abundance, is supposed to produce irascibility.

It engenders choler, planteth anger;
And better 'twere that both of us did fast,
Since, of ourselves, ourselves are cholerick,
Than feed it with such over-roasted flesh.
Shakspeare.

3. Anger; rage.

Put him to choler straight: he hath been used
Ever to conquer, and to have his word
Of contradiction. Shakspeare.

He, methinks, is no great scholar,
Who can mistake desire for choler. Prior.

CHO'LERA-MORBUS,* n. s. [Gr. χολὴ, bile, ῥέω, to flow; and the Lat. morbus, a disease.] In medicine, a sudden overflowing of the bile, or bilious matter, both upwards and downwards; a dangerous disease.

CHO'LERICK. adj. [cholericus, Latin.]

1. Abounding with choler.

Our two great poets being so different in their tempers, the one cholerick and sanguine, the other phlegmatick and melancholick. Dryden.

2. Angry; irascible: of persons.

Bull, in the main, was an honest plain-dealing fellow, cholerick, bold, and of a very unconstant temper. Arbuthnot.

3. Angry; offensive: of words or actions.

There came in cholerick haste towards me about seven or eight knights. Sidney.

Bechanus threateneth all that read him, using his confident, or rather cholerick speech.
Ralegh, Hist. of the World.

CHO'LERICKNESS. † n. s. [from cholerick.] Anger; irascibility; peevishness.

Subject to like passions for covetousness, contentiousness, and cholerickness.
Bp. Gander, Anti-Baal Berith, 1661, p. 128.

CHOLIA'MBICS.* n. s. [Lat. choliambi, from χωλὸς, lame.] Verses differing from the true Iambick, having an Iambick foot in the fifth place, and a spondee in the sixth, or last. They are the same as scazons.

After him came one Babrius, that gave a new turn of the fables into choliambicks.
Bentley, Diss. on Phalaris.

To CHOOSE.† v. a. I chose, I have chosen or chose. [choisir, Fr. ceoþan, Sax. kiesen, Germ. kiusan, M. Goth. kesa, old Goth. Often written, in our old language, chese.]

1. To take by way of preference of several things offered; not to reject.

Did I choose him out of all the tribes of Israel to be my priest. 1 Sam. ii. 28.

I may neither choose whom I would, nor refuse whom I dislike. Shakspeare.

If he should offer to choose, and choose the right casket, you should refuse to perform your father's will, if you should refuse to accept him.
Shakspeare.

2. To take; not to refuse.

Let us choose to us judgment; let us know among ourselves what is good. Job, xxxiv. 4.

The will has still so much freedom left as to enable it to choose any act in its kind good; as also to refuse any act in its kind evil. South, Serm.

3. To select; to pick out of a number.

How much less shall I answer him, and choose out my words to reason with him? Job, ix. 14.

4. To elect for eternal happiness; to predestinate to life. A term of theologians.

To CHOOSE.† v. n. To have the power of choice between different things. It is generally joined with a negative, and signifies must necessarily be, Dr. Johnson says. This is indeed the modern construction; but, formerly, it was otherwise; as in the Book of Homilies, "who can choose but marvaile?" p. 280. The word thus occurs in a passive form, "as it cannot be chosen but we must needs fall often." Ib. p. 260.

Without the influence of the Deity supporting things, their utter annihilation could not choose but follow. Hooker.

Knaves abroad,
Who having by their own importunate suit,
Convinced or supplied them, they cannot choose
But they must blab. Shakspeare.

When a favourite shall be raised upon the foundation of merit, then can he not choose but prosper.
Bacon.

Threw down a golden apple in her way;
For all her haste, she could not choose but stay.
Dryden.

Those who are persuaded that they shall continue for ever, cannot choose but aspire after a happiness commensurate to their duration. Tillotson.

CHO'OSER. n. s. [from choose.] One that has the power or office of choosing; elector.

Come all into this nut, quoth she;
Come closely in, be rul'd by me;
Each one may here a chooser be,
For room you need not wrestle. Drayton.

In all things to deal with other men, as if I might be my own chooser.
Hammond's Pract. Catechism.

This generality is not sufficient to make a good chooser, without a more particular contraction of his judgement. Wotton.

CHO'OSING.* n. s. [Sax. ceoþunʒ.] Choice; election. Wicliffe writes it chesyng.

To CHOP. v. a. [kappen, Dutch, couper, French.]

1. To cut with a quick blow.

What shall we do, if we perceive
Lord Hastings will not yield to our complots?
——— Chop off his head, man. Shakspeare.

Within these three days his head is to be chopt off.
Shakspeare.

And where the cleaver chops the heifer's spoil,
Thy breathing nostril hold. Gay, Trivia.

2. To devour eagerly: with up.

You are for making a hasty meal, and for chopping up your entertainment, like an hungry clown.
Dryden.

Upon the opening of his mouth he drops his breakfast, which the fox presently chopp'd up.
L'Estrange.

3. To mince; to cut into small pieces.

They break their bones, and chop them in pieces, as for the pot. Micah, iii. 3.

Some granaries are made with clay, mixed with hair, chopped straw, mulch, and such like.
Mortimer's Husbandry.

By dividing them into chapters and verses they are so chopped and minced, and stand so broken and divided, that the common people take the verses usually for different aphorisms. Locke.

4. To break into chinks.

I remember the cow's dugs, that her pretty chopt hands had milked. Shakspeare.

To CHOP. v. n.

1. To do any thing with a quick and unexpected motion, like that of a blow: as we say, the wind chops about, that is, changes suddenly.

If the body repercussing be near, and yet not so near as to make a concurrent echo, it choppeth with you upon the sudden. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

2. To catch with the mouth.

Out of greediness to get both, he chops at the shadow, and loses the substance. L'Estrange.

3. To light or happen upon a thing suddenly: with upon.

To CHOP.† v. n. [ceapan, Sax. koopen, Dut. to buy, kaupan, Goth.]

1. To purchase generally by way of truck; to give one thing for another. "To chop and change, mercor." Huloet.

To have her husband in another country,
Within a month after she is married,
Chopping for rotten raisins.
Beaum. and Fl. The Captain.

2. To bandy; to altercate; to return one thing or word for another.

Let not the council at the bar chop with the judge, nor wind himself into the handling of the cause a-new, after the judge hath declared his sentence. Bacon.

To CHOP.* v. a. To put one thing in the place of another.

My chance was great, for, from a poore man's son,
I rose aloft, and chopt and chang'd degree.
Mir. for Mag. 507.

Sets up communities and senses,
To chop and change intelligencies. Hudibras.

Affirm the Trigons chopp'd and chang'd,
The wat'ry with the fiery rang'd. Hudibras.

We go on chopping and changing our friends, as well as our horses. L'Estrange.

To CHOP in.* To become modish; to come in.

He that cometh lately out of Fraunce will talk French English, and never blush at the matter. Another choppes in with English Italianated.
Wilson's Rhetorick, (1553,) B. iii.

To CHOP out.* To give vent to; to come out.

Who has brought
A merry tale about him, to raise a laughter
Amongst our wine? Why Strato, where art thou?
Thou wilt chop out with them unseasonably
When I desire them not.
Beaum. and Fl. Maid's Tragedy.

CHOP. n. s. [from the verb.]

1. A piece chopped off. See CHIP.

Sir William Capel compounded for sixteen hundred pounds, yet Empson would have cut another chop out of him, if the king had not died.
Bacon.

2. A small piece of meat, commonly of mutton.

Old Cross condemns all persons to be fops,
That can't regale themselves with mutton chops.
King's Cook.

3. A crack; or cleft.

Water will make wood to swell; as we see in the filling of the chops of bowls, by laying them in water. Bacon.

CHOP-FALLEN.* See CHAP-FALLEN.

Though strong persuasion hung upon thy lip,—
Alas! how chop-fall'n now! R. Blair, The Grave.

CHOP-HOUSE. n. s. [chop and house.] A mean house of entertainment, where provision ready dressed is sold.

I lost my place at the chop-house, where every man eats in publick a mess of broth, or chop of meat in silence. Spectator.

CHO'PIN.† n. s. [French.]

1. A French liquid measure, containing nearly a pint of Winchester.

My landlord, who is a pert smart man, brought up a choppin of white wine; and, for this particular, there are better French wines here than in England, and cheaper; for they are but a groat a quart. Howell's Lett. i. vi. 38.

2. A term used in Scotland for a quart, of wine measure.

CHO'PPER.* n. s. [from chop.] A butcher's cleaver; a word now used more frequently than cleaver.

CHO'PPING.* n. s. [from chop.]

1. Act of merchandizing; "chopping and changing, mercatus." Huloet.

The chopping of bargains, when a man buys, not to hold, but to sell again, grindeth upon the seller and the buyer. Bacon.

2. Altercation.

You'll never leave off your chopping of logick,
'till your skin is turned over your ears for prating.
L'Estrange.

CHO'PPING.† participial adj. [In this sense, of uncertain etymology.] An epithet frequently applied to infants, by way of ludicrous commendation: imagined by Skinner to signify lusty, from cap, Sax. by others, to mean a child that would bring money at a market. Perhaps a greedy, hungry child, likely to live. Dr. Johnson. But this is not the meaning; stout, hearty, being intended by it.

Both Jack Freeman and Ned Wild,
Would own the fair and chopping child. Fenton.

CHOPPING-BLOCK. n. s. [chop and block.] A log of wood, on which any thing is laid to be cut in pieces.

The strait smooth elms are good for axle-trees, boards, chopping-blocks. Mortimer, Husbandry.

CHOPPING-KNIFE. n. s. [chop and knife.] A knife with which cooks mince their meat.

Here comes Dametas, with a sword by his side, a forrest-bill on his neck, and a chopping-knife under his girdle. Sidney.

CHO'PPY. adj. [from chop.] Full of holes, clefts, or cracks.

You seem to understand me,
By each at once her choppy finger laying
Upon her skinny lips. Shakspeare.

CHOPS. n. s. without a singular. [corrupted probably from CHAPS, which see.]

1. The mouth of a beast.

So soon as my chops begin to walk, yours must be walking too for company. L'Estrange.

2. The mouth of a man, used in contempt.

He ne'er shook hands, nor bid farewel to him
'Till he unseam'd him from the nape to the chops.
Shakspeare.

3. The mouth of any thing in familiar language; as of a river; of a smith's vice.

*CHORA'GUS. n. s. [Lat.] The superintendant of the ancient chorus.

He scruples not to affirm, that in this fantastick farce of life, in which the scene is ever changing and inconstant, the whole machinery is of human direction; and the mind the only charagus of the entertainment. Warburton on Prodigies, p. 93.

CHO'RAL.† adj. [old Fr. choral, from chorus, Lat.]

1. Belonging to or composing a choir or concert.

All sounds on fret by string or golden wire
Temper'd soft tunings, intermix'd with voice,
Choral or unison. Milton, P. L.
Choral symphonies. Milton, P. L.

2. Singing in a choir.

And choral seraphs sung the second day.
Amhurst.

CHO'RALLY.* adv. [from choral.] In the manner of a chorus.

When the words are attended to by the eye, there is a plaintive cast in the strain which makes the well-known anthem, "I call and cry," somewhat affecting; I think, however, a modern composer would judge ill if he chose to set the same words chorally. Mason, Ch. M. p. 116.

CHORD. n. s. [chorda. Lat.] When it signifies a rope or string in general, it is written cord: when its primitive signification is preserved, the h is retained.

1. The string of a musical instrument.

Who mov'd
Their stops and chords, was seen; his volant touch
Instinct thro' all proportions, low and high,
Fled and pursu'd transverse the resonant fugue.
Milton, P. L.

2. [In geometry.] A right line, which joins the two ends of any arch of a circle.

To CHORD. v. a. [from the noun.] To furnish with strings or chords; to string.

What passion cannot music raise and quell?
When Jubal struck the chorded shell,
His list'ning brethren stood around. Dryden.

CHORDE'E. n. s. [from chorda, Lat.] A contraction of the frœnum.

CHOREPIS'COPAL.* adj. [from chorepiscopus.] Relating to the power of a suffragan or local bishop.

Desiring his sense of several passages therein contained, relating to the Valentinian heresy, episcopal and chorepiscopal power, and some emergent difficulties concerning them.
Fell, Life of Hammond, § 1.

*CHOREPI'SCOPUS. n. s. [Lat. from χωρος, a district or country, and ἐπίσκοπος, a bishop.] Formerly a suffragan or local bishop, delegated to exercise episcopal jurisdiction within certain districts.

CHORIA'MBICK.* n. s. [Fr. choriambe, Lat. choriambus, Gr. χοριαμβος.] The foot of a verse consisting of four syllables, as anxietas; two being long at each end of the word, and two short in the middle.

CHO'RION.† n. s. [χωρεῖν, to contain, which seems to be the etymon of χορίον; a word having the same meaning in Greek as in English, as a learned observer on my additions to Johnson has shewn, who however doubts the etymon.] The outward membrane that enwraps the fœtus.

CHO'RIST.* n. s. [old Fr. choriste, our parent word of chorister. A singing man in a choir. Cotgrave.

Behold the great chorist of the angelical quire.
Partheneria Sacra, 1633, p. 150,

CHO'RISTER.† n. s. [from choriste, Fr. See CHORIST.]

1. A singer in cathedrals; usually a singer of the lower order; a singing boy.

And let the roaring organs loudly play
The praises of the Lord in lively notes;
The whiles, with hollow throats,
The choristers the joyous anthem sing. Spenser.

2. A singer in a concert. This sense is, for the most part, confined to poetry.

The new-born phœnix takes his way;
Of airy choristers a numerous train
Attend his progress. Dryden.

The musical voices and accents of the aerial choristers. Ray on the Creation.

CHORO'GRAPHER.† n. s. [from χωρος, a region, and γράφω, to describe.] He that describes particular regions or countries.

Places unknown, better harped at in Camden and other chorographers.
Milton, Hist. of Eng. B. 4.

Nurcia, situated in Umbria, which our modern chorographers call Spoleto. Tuisden, p. 8.

CHOROGRA'PHICAL.† adj. [See CHOROGRAPHER.] Descriptive of particular regions or countries; laying down the boundaries of countries.

I have added a chorographical description of this terrestrial paradise. Ralegh, Hist. of the World.

Methinks it would well please any man to look upon—chorographical, topographical delineations; to behold, as it were, all the remote provinces, towns, cities of the world.
Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 276.

The muse, yet observing her begun course of chorographical longitude, traces eastward the southern shore of the isle.
Selden, on Drayton's Polyolb. S. 2.

CHOROGRA'PHICALLY.† adv. [from chorographical.] In a chorographical manner; according to the rule of chorography; in a manner descriptive of particular regions.

I may perhaps be found fault withal, because I do not chorographically place the funeral monuments in this my book. Weever, Funeral Monum.

CHORO'GRAPHY.† n. s. [See CHOROGRAPHER.] The art or practice of describing particular regions, or laying down the limits and boundaries of particular provinces. It is less in its object than geography, and greater than topography.

For most of what I use of chorography, join with me in thanks to that most learned nourice of antiquity, my instructing friend, Mr. Camden.
Selden on Drayton's Polyolb. Pref.

This I have described to your lordship, because I think there might be good use made of it for chorography; for, otherwise, to make landskips by it were illiberal. Wotton, Rem. p. 300.

We have some evidences of it in our first entrance into it, in this part of the chorography of Egypt. Stillingfl. Orig. Sac.

In delightfull raptures we descry,
As in a map, Sion's chorography.
Bp. H. King on Sandys's Psalms.

CHO'RUS.† n. s. [chorus, Latin.]

1. A number of singers; a concert.

Parœus, commenting on the Revelation, divides the whole book as a tragedy, into acts distinguished each by a chorus of heavenly harpings and song between. Milton, Introd. to Samson Agonistes.

The Grecian tragedy was at first nothing but a chorus of singers; afterwards one actor was introduced. Dryden.

Never did a more full and unspotted chorus of human creatures join together in a hymn of devotion. Addison.

In praise so just let every voice be join'd,
And fill the gen'ral chorus of mankind! Pope.

2. The persons who are supposed to behold what passes in the acts of a tragedy, and sing their sentiments between the acts.

For supply,
Admit me chorus to this history. Shakspeare.

3. The song between the acts of a tragedy.

Sophocles, the genius of his age,
Increas'd the pomp and beauty of the stage.
Engag'd the chorus song in every part.
Sir W. Soame's and Dryden's Art of Poetry.

4. Verses of a song in which the company join the singer.

CHOSE. [the preter tense, and sometimes the participle passive, from To choose.]

Our sovereign here above the rest might stand,
And here be chose again to rule the land.
Dryden.

CHO'SEN. [the participle passive, from To choose.]

If king Lewis vouchsafe to furnish us
With some few bands of chosen soldiers,
I'll undertake to land them on our coast.
Shakspeare.

CHOUGH. n. s. [ceo, Sax. chouca, Fr.] A bird which frequents the rocks by the sea side, like a jackdaw, but bigger. Hanmer.

In birds, kites, and kestrels have a resemblance with hawks, crows with ravens, daws, and choughs. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

To crows the like impartial grace affords,
And choughs and daws, and such republick birds.
Dryden.

CHOULE. n. s. [commonly pronounced and written jowl.] The crop of a bird.

The choule or crop, adhering unto the lower side of the bill, and so descending by the throat, is a bag or sachel. Brown, Vulg. Err.

To CHOUSE.† v. a. [The original of this word is much doubted by Skinner, who tries to deduce it from the French gosser, to laugh at; or joncher, to wheedle; and from the Teutonick kosen, to prattle. It is perhaps a fortuitous and cant word, without etymology, Dr. Johnson says. Skinner might have given the old Fr. joucher, as well as joncher, which signifies to cog, that is to cheat. V. Cotgrave in JOUCHER. But Serenius and Ihre consider the Goth. kiusa, to fascinate, as the original of this word; and connect it with the verb cozen, to trick or cheat. It was formerly written chiause or chiauze; which countenances Henshaw's opinion, that the word is Turkish. Coles gives to chouse for cozen or deceive, and notices the similarity of sound with the Turkish chiaux, or chiaus. See CHOUSE.

1. To cheat; to trick; to impose upon.

Long practisers in the art, who make themselves sport at others follies and their own delusions: but our barber on the place is chiauz'd, a very pigeon, a younger brother.
Gayton, Notes on D. Quix. iv. 18.

Freedom and zeal have chous'd you o'er and o'er;
Pray give us leave to bubble you once more.
Dryden.

Our islanders, however they may pretend to chouse one another, they make but very aukward rogues. Tatler, No. 213.

From London they came, silly people to chouse,
Their lands and their faces unknown. Swift.

2. It has of before the thing taken away by fraud.

When geese and pullen are seduc'd,
And sows of sucking pigs are chous'd. Hudibras.

CHOUSE.† n. s. [from the verb. This word is derived by Henshaw from kiaus, or chiaus, a messenger of the Turkish court; who, says he, is little better than a fool. Dr. Johnson might have added, that the Turkish chiaus or chiaous is a title of various character. The alai chiaous is a buffoon, who carries a baton tipt with silver, and plays a thousand monkey-tricks, fitter for the entertainment of children than of sensible men. Drummond's Travels, p. 151.]

1. A bubble; a tool; a man fit to be cheated.

A scottish chouse,
Who, when a thief has robb'd his house,
Applies himself to cunning men. Hudibras.

2. A trick or sham.

To CHO'WTER. v. n. To grumble or mutter like a froward child. Phillips.

CHRISM.† n. s. [χρίσμα, an ointment.] Unguent; or unction: it is only applied to sacred ceremonies.

One act never to be repeated, is not the thing that Christ's eternal priesthood, denoted especially by his unction or chrism, refers to.
Hammond, Pract. Catechism.

O Lord, the God of our fathers, do thou bless this oil with power, energy, and illumination of the Holy Spirit, that it may be the chrism against all filthiness. Ricaut, Greek Church, p. 166.

He solicited the favour of England, by sending Henry a sacred rose, perfumed with musk, and anointed with chrism. Hume, Hist. of E. H. 8.

CHRI'SMAL.* adj. [from chrism.] Relating to chrism.

Having thus conjured and prayed, he falls upon singing the praises of this chrismal oil.
Brevint, Saul and Sam. at Endor, p. 316.

CHRI'SMATORY.* n. s. [old Fr. chrismatoire.] A little vessel for the oil intended for chrism; and generally, a cruet or vessel.

Censers, chrismatories, corporasses, and chalices, which for thy whorish holiness might not sometime be touched, but will for thy sake be abhorred of all men. Bale on the Revel. P. II. Bb. viii.

The word is sometimes translated lenticula, a chrismatory, or cruet, or vessel to contain oil; sometimes orbis, a spherical body encompassing others. Smith's Old Age, p. 215.

CHRI'SOM.† n. s. [See CHRISM.]

1. A child that dies within a month after its birth. So called from the chrisom-cloth, a cloth anointed with holy unguent, which the children anciently wore till they were christened.

When the convulsions were but few, the number of chrisoms and infants was greater.
Graunt's Bills of Mortality.

2. The cloth itself; with which also women used to shroud the child, if dying within the month.

The godfathers and godmothers shall take and lay their hands upon the child, and the minister shall put upon him his white vesture, commonly called the chrism. Ord. of Bapt. in K. Edw. VI. time.

As undiscerned as are the phantasms that make a chrism child to smile.
Bp. Taylor, Holy Dying, i. § 2.

CHRIST-CROSS-ROW.* n. s. An old term for the alphabet, probably from the cross usually set before it. It is corruptly written, as it is pronounced, chriss-cross-row. Dr. Ash so prints it; and Mr. Mason, criss-cross-row, who absurdly also calls it a cant word.

The cross of Christ, in its second and metaphorical acceptation, is the Christian's burden and badge; that which he is to take up, that which he is to glory in. The one is a paradox, and a smart one to the flesh; the other to the world; but both, truths to be learnt before ever a letter in the Christian's Christ-cross-row; as being indeed, though none of the letters, as instructive as all the four and twenty. Whitlock, Mann. of the Eng. p. 527.

To CHRI'STEN.† adj. [chpiꝛtnian, Sax. chrestienner, old Fr.]

1. To baptize; to initiate into christianity by water.

The minister of the parish, where the child was born or christened, shall examine whether the child be lawfully baptized or no.
Private Baptism, Com. Pr. Rubrick.

I am most certain this is the first example in England, since it was first christened.
Bp. Taylor, Discourse on Prayer.

2. To name; to denominate.

Where such evils as these reign, christen the thing what you will, it can be no better than a mock millenium. Burnet.

Ere yet the morning shall new christen day.
Ford's Love's Sacrifice.

CHRI'STENDOM.† n. s. [from Christ and dom. The word is the same in Flemish.] The collective body of christianity; the regions of which the inhabitants profess the christian religion.

What hath been done, the parts of Christendom most afflicted can best testify. Hooker.

An older and a better soldier, none
That Christendom gives out. Shakspeare.

His computation is universally received over all Christendom. Holder on Time.

CHRI'STENING. n. s. [from the verb.] The ceremony of the first initiation into christianity.

The queen was with great solemnity crowned at Westminster, about two years after the marriage; like an old christening, that had staid long for godfathers. Bacon.

We shall insert the causes, why the account of christenings hath been neglected more than that of burials. Graunt.

The day of the christening being come, the house was filled with gossips.
Arbuthnot and Pope.

CHRISTENING.* adj. [from the subst.] Relating to the christening.

My thoughts no christening dinners crost,
No children cry'd for butter'd toast.
T. Warton, Progr. of Discontent.

CHRI'STIAN.† n. s. [Christianus, Lat. chpiꝛten, Sax. old Fr. christian, christien.] A professor of the religion of Christ.

The disciples were called christians first in Antioch. Acts, xi. 26.

We christians have certainly the best and the holiest, the wisest and most reasonable religion in the world. Tillotson.

CHRI'STIAN.† adj. Professing the religion of Christ.

I'll not be made a soft and dull-ey'd fool,
To shake the head, relent, and sigh, and yield
To christian intercessors. Shakspeare.

2. Ecclesiastical.

In briefly recounting the various species of ecclesiastical courts, or, as they are often styled, courts Christian, I shall begin with the lowest.
Blackstone.

To CHRI'STIAN.* v. a. The same as To CHRISTEN, which see.

You allege the practice of all churches christianed to the contrary.
Falke against Allen, (1586,) p. 252.

CHRI'STIAN-NAME. n. s. The name given at the font, distinct from the gentilitious name, or surname.

CHRI'STIANISM.† n. s. [old F. christianisme, from christianismus, Lat.]

1. The christian religion.

That I may not seem, rather forcibly, to break out here out of Platonism into Christianism.
More, Song of the Soul, Pref.

Herein the worst of kings, professing christianism, have by far exceeded him.
Milton, Eiconoclast, ch. 1.

To believe antichristianity christianism, and christianity antichristian. Chillingworth, Pref. to the Auth. of Charity Maintained.

2. The nations professing christianity.

CHRISTIA'NITY. n. s. [chrétienté, French.] The religion of christians.

God doth will that couples, which are married, both infidels, if either party be converted into christianity, this should not make separation.
Hooker.

Every one, who lives in the habitual practice of any voluntary sin, cuts himself off from christianity.
Addison.

To CHRI'STIANIZE.† v. a. [old Fr. christianizer.] To make christian; to convert to christianity.

Good dispositions and natural graces, more ready to be advanced by impressions from above, and christianized unto pieties.
Brown, Chr. Mor. ii. 12.

Till this excellent piece of philosophy be, as Clemens saith of the Pagan school, τελειωμένη διὰ Χριστῦ, baptized by that baptist, christianized by the addition of repentance. Hammond, Serm. iv.

To christianize them, [the Psalms,] as Dr. Watts has done, would, I presume, deviate too far from the present practice of our establishment.
Mason on Church Musick, p. 194.

The principles of platonick philosophy, as it is now christianized.
Dryden.

CHRI'STIANLIKE.* adj. [from christian and like.] Befitting a Christian.

Although the duke was enemy to him,
Yet he, most christianlike, laments his death.
Shakspeare, Hen. VI. P. II.

In the managing of quarrels you may say he is wise; for either he avoids them with great discretion, or undertakes them with a most christianlike fear.
Shakspeare, Much Ado, &c.

CHRI'STIANLY.* adj. [from christian.] Becoming a Christian.

To inbreed in us this generous and christianly reverence one of another.
Milton, Reason of Ch. Gov. b. 2.

To do well, and say nothing, is christianly; to say well, and do nothing, is pharisaical.
Bp. Henshaw's Meditations.

CHRI'STIANLY.† adv. [from christian.] Like a christian; as becomes one who professes the holy religion of Christ.

That they may see their children christianly and virtuously brought up.
Office of Matrimony.

Those deep and retired thoughts, which, with every man christianly instructed, ought to be most frequent of God, and of his miraculous ways and works amongst men.
Milton, of Reform in Eng. b. 1.

CHRI'STIANNESS.* n. s. [from christian.] The profession of christianity.

It is very irregular and unreasonable to measure any action by a rule that belongs not to it, to try the exactness of the circle by the square, which should be done by the compass; and in like manner to judge the christianness of an action by the law of natural reason, which can only be judged by its conformity with the law of Christ, superiour to that of nature.
Hammond of Conscience, § 26.

CHRISTIANO'GRAPHY.* n. s. [from christianus and γράφω, to describe.] A general description of the nations professing christianity.

In my christianography you may see divers liturgies.
Pagitt's Heresiography, p. 64.

CHRI'STMAS.† n. s. [from Christ and mass.]

1. The day on which the nativity of our blessed Saviour is celebrated, by the particular service of the church.

Canons were made by several councils to oblige men to receive the Holy Communion three times a year at least, viz. at Christmas, Easter, and Whitsuntide.
Wheatley on the Comm. Prayer.

2. The season of Christmas; the festivity relating to it; the twelve days succeeding Christmas day.

Here was a consent,
(Knowing aforehand of our merriment)
To dash it like a christmas comedy.
Shakspeare, Love's L. Lost.

Is not a commonty a Christmas gambol or a tumbling trick?
Shakspeare, Taming of the Shrew.

At Christmas I no more desire a rose,
Than wish a snow in May's new-fangled shows;
But like of each thing, that in season grows.
Shakspeare, Love's L. Lost.

The festivity of Christmas was observed much after the same manner, ceremonies, and solemnities, as in Italy. Brown, Travels, (1685,) p. 152.

CHRI'STMAS-BOX. n. s. [from christmas and box.] A box in which little presents are collected at Christmas.

When time comes round, a Christmas-box they bear,
And one day makes them rich for all the year.
Gay's Trivia.

CHRI'STMAS-FLOWER. n. s. Hellebore.

CHRIST'S-THORN.† n. s. [So called, as Skinner fancies, because the thorns have some likeness to a cross.] A plant.

It hath long sharp spines: the flower has five leaves, in form of a rose; out of the flower-cup, which is divided into several segments, rises the pointal, which becomes a fruit, shaped like a bonnet, having a shell almost globular, which is divided into three cells, in each of which is contained a roundish seed. This is by many persons supposed to be the plant from which our Saviour's crown of thorns was composed. Miller.

The plains, in the finest cultivation, are divided by hedges of aloe, christthorn, or wild pomegranate. Swinburne, Trav. through Spain, Lett. 2.

CHROMA'TICK.† adj. [χρῶμα. colour.]

1. Relating to colour.

I am now come to the third part of painting, which is called the chromatick, or colouring.
Dryden, Dufresnoy.

2. Relating to a certain species of ancient musick, now unknown.

It was observed he never touched his lyre in such a truly chromatick and enharmonick manner.
Arbuthnot and Pope.

3. Relating to a particular style in musick moving by semitones or half notes.

Those harsh chromatick jars
Of sin that all our musick mars.
Milton, Ode at a Sol. Musick, M.S. Reading.

Musick is not designed to please only chromatick ears, but all that are capable of distinguishing harsh from disagreeable notes.
Addison, Spect. No. 29.

CHRO'NICAL. } adj. [old Fr. chronique, pe-
CHRO'NICK. } riodical; from χρόνος, time.]

A chronical distemper is of length; as dropsies, asthmas, and the like.
Quincy.

Of diseases some are chronical, and of long duration; as, quartane agues, scurvy, wherein we defer the cure unto more advantageous seasons.
Brown, Vulg. Err.

The lady's use of these excellencies is to divert the old man, when he is out of the pangs of a chronical distemper.
Spectator, No. 449.

CHRO'NICLE. n. s. [chronique, Fr. from χρόνος, time.]

1. A register or account of events in order of time.

No more yet of this;
For 'tis a chronicle of day by day,
Not a relation for a breakfast.
Shakspeare.

2. A history.

You lean too confidently on those Irish chronicles, which are most fabulous and forged.
Spenser on Ireland.

If from the field I should return once more,
I and my sword will earn my chronicle.
Shakspeare, Ant. and Cleop.

I'm traduc'd by tongues, which neither know
My faculties nor person, yet will be
The chronicles of my doing.
Shaksp.

I give up to historians the generals and heroes which crowd their annals, together with those which you are to produce for the British chronicle.
Dryden.

To CHRO'NICLE. v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To record in chronicle, or history.

This to rehearse, should rather be to chronicle times than to search into reformation of abuses in that realm.
Spenser on Ireland.

2. To register; to record.

For now the devil, that told me I did well,
Says that this deed is chronicled in hell.
Shaksp.

Love is your master; for he masters you:
And he that is so yoked by a fool,
Methinks should not be chronicled for wise.
Shakspeare.

I shall be the jest of the town; nay, in two days I expect to be chronicled in ditty, and sung in woeful ballad.
Cong.

CHRO'NICLER. n. s. [from chronicle.]

1. A writer of chronicles; a recorder of events in order of time.

Here gathering chroniclers, and by them stand
Giddy fantastick poets of each land.
Donne.

2. A historian; one that keeps up the memory of things past.

I do herein rely upon these bards, or Irish chroniclers.
Spenser.

This custom was held by the Druids and bards of our antient Britons, and of latter times by the Irish chroniclers, called rhimers.
Ralegh, Hist. of the World.

CHRO'NIQUE. n. s. [Fr.] A chronicle.

The best chronique that can be now compiled of of their late changes, must for the most part be collected from some aged grandsire's memory; a frail foundation to support an historical credit.
L. Addison, West Barbary, p. 74.

CHRO'NOGRAM.† n. s. [χρόνος, time, and γράφω, to write.] An inscription including the date of any action. Of this kind the following is an example.

Gloria lausque *D*eo, sæ*CL*or*VM* in sæc*V*la sunto.

A chronogrammatical verse, which includes not only this year 1660, but numerical letters enough to reach above a thousand years further, until the year 2867. Howell.

The Spaniards took it [Breda] again, as by inscriptions and chronograms are to be seen in divers places. Brown, Travels, (1685,) p.105.

CHRONOGRAMMA'TICAL. adj. [from chronogram.] Belonging to a chronogram. See the example from Howell in chronogram.

CHRONOGRA'MMATIST.* n. s. [from chrogram.] A writer of chronograms.

There are foreign universities, where, as you praise a man in England for being an excellent philosopher or poet, it is an ordinary character to be a great chronogrammatist. Addison on Medals.

CHRONO'GRAPHER.* n. s. [χρόνος, time, and γράφω, to describe.] He that describes circumstance of past times; a chronologist.

The common printed chronicle — is indeed but an epitome, or defloration, made by Robert of Lorraine, and the numerous rest of our monkish and succeeding chronographers.

Selden on Drayton's Polyolb. Pref.

The author had before related, out of Pausanias the chronographer, that Sosibius an Antiochian had left, as a legacy to the city of Antioch, the yearly revenue of fifteen talents of gold.

Gregory, Notes on Scripture, p. 106.

CHRONO'GRAPHY.* n. s. [Fr. chronographie, from the Gr. See CHRONOGRAPHER.] The description of past time; the arrangement of historical events.

CHRONO'LOGER.† n. s. [χρόνος, time, and λόγος, doctrine.] He that studies or explains the science of computing past time, or of ranging past events according to their proper years.

Chronologers differ among themselves about most great epochas. Holder on Time.

Among the Arabians there hath as yet come to my hands one only chronologer of these times.

Gregory's Posthuma, p. 8.

This publication, [his chronology,] bearing the name of the immortal Newton, though highly built upon by subsequent chronologers, is so unspeakably inferiour to that great man's other works, that I am almost unwilling to believe its authenticity; and can hardly be persuaded he ever would have published it himself.

Richardson on the Languages, &c. of the East, i. 1.

CHRONOLO'GICAL. adj. [from chronology.] Relating to the doctrine of time.

Thus much touching the chronological account of some times and things past, without confining myself to the exactness of years.

Hale, Origin of Mankind.

CHRONOLO'GICALLY.† adv. [from chronological.] In a chronological manner; according to the laws or rules of chronology; according to the exact series of time.

Follow them politically, chronologically, and geographically. Ld. Chesterfield.

CHRONOLO'GICK.* adj. [from chronology.] Denoting periods of time.

May chronologick spouts
Retain no cypher legible!

T. Warton, Epist. from T. Hearne.

The chronologick classing of those histories which my most sanguine wishes went to.

Pownal on Antiquities, p.127.

CHRONO'LOGIST. n. s. [See CHRONOLOGER.] One that studies or explains time; one that ranges past events according to the order of time; a chronologer.

According to these chronologists, the prophecy of the Rabin that the world should last but six thousand years, has been long disproved.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

All that learned noise and dust of the chronologist is wholly to be avoided. Locke on Education.

CHRONO'LOGY. n. s. [χρόνος, time, and λόγος, doctrine.] The science of computing and adjusting the periods of time; as the revolution of the sun and moon; and of computing time past, and referring each event to the proper year.

And the measure of the year not being so perfectly known to the ancients, rendered it very difficult for them to transmit a true chronology to succeeding ages. Holder on Time.

Where I allude to the customs of the Greeks, I believe I may be justified by the strictest chronology; though a poet is not obliged to the rules that confine an historian. Prior.

CHRONO'METER. n. s. [χρόνος and μέτρον.] An instrument for the exact mensuration of time.

According to observation made with a pendulum chronometer, a bullet, at its first discharge, flies five hundred and ten yards in five half seconds. Derham.

CHRY'SALIS. n. s. [from χρύσος, gold, because of the golden colour in the nymphæ of some insects.] A term used by some naturalists for aurelia, or the first apparent change of the maggot of any species of insects. Chambers.

CHRY'SOBERYL.* n. s. [χρύσος, gold, and beryl.] A gem of a brownish or yellowish green.

CHRY'SOLITE. n. s. [χρύσος, gold, and λιθος, a stone.] A precious stone of a dusky green, with a cast of yellow. Woodward.

Such another world,
Of one entire and perfect chrysolite,
I'd not have sold her for. Shakspeare.

If metal, part seem'd gold, part silver clear:
If stone, carbuncle most, or chrysolite.

Milton, P. L.

CHRY'SOPRAS.† } n. s. [χρύσος, gold, and
CHRYSO'PRASUS. } prasinus, green.] A precious stone of a yellow colour, approaching to green.

The ninth a topaz, the tenth a chrysoprasus.

Rev. xxi. 20.

CHUB. n. s. [from cop, a great head, Skinner.] A river fish. The chevin.

The chub is in prime from Midmay to Candlemas, but best in winter. He is full of small bones; he eats waterish; not firm, but limp and tasteless: nevertheless, he may be so dressed as to make him very good meat.

Walton, Angler.

CHU'BBED. adj. [from chub.] Big-headed like a chub.

CHU'BBY.* } adj. [from chub.] We still
CHUBFACED. } use the expression, "a chubby boy," for one having a large or fat face.

I never saw a fool lean; the chub-faced fop
Shines sleek with full-cramm'd fat of happiness.

Marston, Antonio's Revenge.

To CHUCK. v. n. [A word probably formed in imitation of the sound that it expresses; or perhaps corrupted from chick.] To make a noise like a hen, when she calls her chickens.

To CHUCK.† v. a.

1. To call as a hen calls her young.

Then crowing, clapp'd his wings, th' appointed call,
To chuck his wives together in the hall.

Dryden, Fables.

2. To give a gentle blow under the chin, so as to make the mouth strike together. [This is probably from chock, a blow. See CHOCK, and the subst. CHUCK.]

Come, chuck the infant under the chin, force a smile, and cry, Ah, the boy takes after his mother's relations. Congreve.

To CHUCK.* v. n. [Ital. scuccherare; Dutch, scachen.] To jeer; to laugh. The parent of our better known word, chuckle.

But, bold-fac'd Satyr, strain not over high,
But laugh and chuck at meaner gullery.

Marston, Sat. ii.

To CHUCK.* v. a. To throw, by a quick and dexterous motion, any heavy weight, so that it shall nicely fall in a given place. So carmen and waggoners say, "chuck that sack or parcel down here." This use of the verb seems to be taken from chuck-farthing.

CHUCK.† n. s. [from the verb.]

1. The voice of a hen.

He made the chuck four or five times, that people use to make to chickens when they call them.

Temple.

2. A word of endearment, corrupted from chicken or chick.

Come, your promise. ——What promise, chuck?

Shakspeare.

3. A sudden small noise.
4. A little blow under the chin; written "chock under the chin," in Sherwood's old dictionary. See To CHUCK, in this sense; and also CHOCK.

CHUCK-FARTHING. n. s. [chuck and farthing.] A play, at which the money falls with a chuck into the hole beneath.

He lost his money at chuck-farthing, shuffle-cap, and all fours. Arbuthnot, Hist. of John Bull.

To CHU'CKLE.† v. n. [Ital. scuccherare, Dutch, schachen.] To laugh vehemently; to laugh convulsively.

What tale shall I to my old father tell?
'Twill make him chuckle thou'rt bestow'd so well.

Dryden.

She to intrigues was e'en hard hearted;
She chuckl'd when a bawd was carted. Prior.

To CHU'CKLE. v. a. [from chuck.]

1. To call as a hen.

I am not far from the women's apartment, I am sure; and if these birds are within distance, here's that will chuckle 'em together. Dryden.

2. To cocker; to fondle.

Your confessor, that parcel of holy guts and garbidge; he must chuckle you, and moan you.

Dryden, Spanish Friar.

To CHUD.* [perhaps from To chew.] To champ or bite.

When she rides, the horse chuds his bit so cheerfully, as if he wished his burthen might grow to his back.

Stafford's Niobe dissolv'd into a Nilus, p. 119.

CHU'ET. n. s. [probably from To chew.] An old word, as it seems, for forced meat. See CHEWET.

As for chuets, which are likewise minced meat, instead of butter and fat, it were good to moisten them partly with cream, or almond or pistacho milk. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

CHUFF.† n. s. [A word of uncertain derivation; perhaps corrupted from chub, or derived from kwf, Welsh, a stock, Dr. Johnson says. Dr. Jamieson considers the Scottish coof or cufe the same as our chuff; and thinks that the Su. Goth. kufwa, to keep under, to insult, or the Iceland. kueif, one who is cowardly or feeble, may be akin to this word. I differ from this. Chuffe, in our old lexicography, is a countryman; rusticus, as in the Prompt. Parv. The Su. kyffe, from the old Goth. kofe, is a cottage. This seems to suggest in some degree, the etymology of chuff. The phrase, says Mr. Steevens, of fat chuffs in Shakspeare, " is a term of contempt always applied to rich and avaricious people, and chuff is probably a corruption of chough, a thievish bird that collects his prey on the sea-shore." This will not be received; and " a rich chuff," and " a fat chuff," which are both mentioned in our old lexicography, are also interpreted " a good rich yeoman," as well as a " big or fat chuff." The old Fr. joffu must not be forgotten, which Cotgrave translates, " chuffie, fat-cheeked, or puffed up in the face," which hitherto has been overlooked; and this meaning of bloated or fat may countenance the Teut. kuffe and the Sax. cyf, a barrel, as the original.] A coarse, fat-headed, blunt clown.

Hang ye, gorbellied knaves, are you undone? No, ye fat chuffs, I would your store were here. Shakspeare.

A less generous chuff than this in the fable, would have hugged his bags to the last. L'Estrange.

CHU'FFILY. adv. [from chuffy.] Surlily; stomach-fully.

John answered chuffily. Richardson, Clarissa.

CHU'FFINESS. n. s. [from chuffy.] Clownishness; surliness.

CHU'FFY.† adj. [from chuff; old Fr. joffu. But see CHUFF.] Blunt; surly; fat.

The goddess drank, a chuffy lad was by,
Who saw the liquour with a grudging eye,
And grinning cries, she's greedy more than dry.
Mainwaring, Ovid's Met. B. 5.

CHUM. n. s. [chom, Armorick, to live together.] A chamber fellow; a term used in the universities.

CHUMP. n. s. A thick heavy piece of wood, less than a block.

When one is battered, they can quickly, of a chump of wood, accommodate themselves with another. Moxon.

CHURCH.† n. s. [Sax. cirice, cyric; Germ. kirche; Gr. κυριακὸν, from Κύριος, the Lord, and οἶκια, house.]

1. The collective body of christians, usually termed the catholick church.

The church being a supernatural society, doth differ from natural societies in this; that the persons unto whom we associate ourselves in the one, are men, simply considered as men; but they to whom we be joined in the other, are God, angels, and holy men. Hooker.

2. The body of christians adhering to one particular opinion or form of worship.

The church is a religious assembly, or the large fair building where they meet; and sometimes the same word means a synod of bishops, or of presbyters; and in some places it is the pope and a general council. Watts, Logick.

3. The place which christians consecrate to the worship of God.

It comprehends the whole church, viz. the nave or body of the church, together with the chancel, which is even included under the word church. Ayliffe, Parergon.

That churches were consecrated unto none but the Lord only, the very general name chiefly doth sufficiently shew: church doth signify no other thing than the Lord's house. Hooker.

Though you unty the winds, and let them fight Against the churches. Shakspeare.

4. Ecclesiastical authority or power, in contradistinction to the civil power of the state.

Lest I should grow tedious about small matters at a time when such great and weighty concerns are under consideration in church and state, I will come to a conclusion.
Sir G. Wheler, Descript. of Anc. Churches, p. 128.

The same criminal may be absolved by the church, and condemned by the state; absolved or pardoned by the state, yet censured by the church. Leslie.

5. It is used frequently in conjunction with other words; as church-member, the member of a church; church-power, spiritual or ecclesiastical authority.

To CHURCH.† v. a. [from the noun.] To perform with any one the office of returning thanks in the church, after any signal deliverance, as from the danger of childbirth.

It was the ancient usage of the church of England for women to come veiled, who came to be churched. Wheatly on the Common Prayer.

CHURCH-ALE.† n. s. [from church and ale.] A wake, or feast, commemoratory of the dedication of the church. See ALE.

For the church-ale, two young men of the parish are yearly chosen to be wardens, who make collection among the parishioners of what provision it pleaseth them to bestow. Carew.

The church-wardens or quest-men, and their assistants, shall suffer no plays, feasts, banquets, suppers, church-ales, drinkings, temporal courts, or leets, lay injuries, musters, or any other profane usage, to be kept in the church, chapel, or churchyard. Const. and Canons Ecclesiastical, § 88.

CHURCH-ATTIRE. n. s. The habit in which men officiate at divine service.

These and such like were their discourses, touching that church-attire, which with us for the most part is used in publick prayer. Hooker.

CHURCH-AUTHORITY. n. s. Ecclesiastical power; spiritual jurisdiction.

In this point of church-authority, I have sifted all the little scraps alleged. Atterbury.

CHURCH-BENCH.* n. s. The seat in the porch of a church.

Let us go sit here upon the church-bench till two, and then all to bed. Shaksp. Much Ado, &c.

CHURCH-BURIAL. n. s. Burial according to the rites of the church.

The bishop has the care of seeing that all christians, after their deaths, be not denied church-burial according to the usage and custom of the place. Ayliffe, Parergon.

CHU'RCHING.* n. s. [from To church.] The act of returning thanks in the church. See To CHURCH.

The absurdity, which some would introduce, of stifling their acknowledgements in private houses, and in giving thanks for their recovery and enlargement in no other place than that of their confinement and restraint; is a practice inconsistent with the very name of the office, which is called the churching of women, and consequently implies a ridiculous solecism of being churched at home. Wheatly on the Common Prayer.

CHU'RCHDOM.* n. s. [from church and dom.] Establishment; government.

Whatsoever church pretendeth to a new beginning, pretendeth at the same time to a new churchdom; and whatsoever is so new, is none. So necessary it is to believe the holy catholick church. Pearson on the Creed, Art. 9.

CHURCH-FOUNDER. n. s. He that builds or endows a church.

Whether emperours or bishops in those days were church founders, the solemn dedication of churches they thought not to be a work in itself either vain or superstitious. Hooker.

CHURCH-LAND.* n. s. Land belonging to churches, religious houses, and benefices.

I shall not here enter into the religious account of church lands.
Sir H. Yelverton's Pref. to Bp. Morton's Episcopacy.

CHU'RCHLIKE.* adj. [from church and like.] Befitting a churchman.

Nor shall proud Lancaster usurp my right,
Nor hold his scepter in his childish fist,
Nor wear the diadem upon his head,
Whose church-like humours fit not for a crown.
Shakspeare, K. Hen. VI. P. II.

CHU'RCHMAN. n. s. [church and man.]

1. An ecclesiastick; a clergyman; one that ministers in sacred things.

If any thing be offered to you touching the church and churchmen, or church-government, rely not only upon yourself. Bacon.

A very difficult work to do, to reform and reduce a church into order, that had been so long neglected, and that was so ill filled by many weak and more wilful churchmen. Clarendon.

Patience in want, and poverty of mind,
These marks of church and churchmen he design'd,
And living taught, and dying left behind.
Dryden, Fables.

2. An adherent to the church of England.

CHURCH-MUSICK.* n. s. The service of chant and anthem in churches and cathedrals.

It was anciently customary for men and women of the first quality, ecclesiasticks, and others, who were lovers of church-musick, to be admitted into this corporation, [of parish-clerks.]
Warton, Hist. of Eng. Poetry, ii. 396.

CHURCH-PREFERMENT.* n. s. Benefice in the church.

For any church-preferment thou hast a mind to. B. Jonson, Magn. Lady.

He possessed some church-preferments in the reign of Edward the sixth.
Warton, Hist. of Eng. Poetry, ii. 240.

CHU'RCHSHIP.* n. s. Institution of the church.

The Jews were his own also by right of churchship, as selected and inclosed by God, from amidst all other nations, to be the seat of his worship, and the great conservatory of all the sacred oracles, and means of salvation. South, Serm. on John, i. 11.

CHURCH-WARDENS. n. s. [See WARDEN.] Officers yearly chosen, by the consent of the minister and parishioners, according to the custom of each place, to look to the church, church-yard, and such things as belong to both; and to observe the behaviour of the parishioners, for such faults as appertain to the jurisdiction or censure of the ecclesiastical court. They are a kind of corporation, enabled by law to sue for any thing belonging to their church, or poor of their parish. Cowel.

There should likewise church-wardens, of the gravest men in the parish, be appointed, as they be here in England. Spenser on Ireland.

Our church-wardens
Feast on the silver, and give us the farthings. Gay.

CHU'RCH-WAY.* n. s. The road that leads to the church.

Now it is the time of night,
That the graves, all gaping wide,
Every one lets forth his sprite,
In the church-way paths to glide.
Shakspeare, Mids. Night's Dream.

CHU'RCHWORK.* n. s. An expression applied to work which is carried on slowly.

This siege was church-work; and therefore went on slowly. Fuller, Holy War, p. 111.

Contrary to the proverb, church-work went on the most speedily. Fuller, Holy War, p. 36.

CHU'RCHYARD. n. s. The ground adjoining to the church, in which the dead are buried; a cemetery.

I am almost afraid to stand alone
Here in the churchyard, yet I will adventure.
Shakspeare.

In churchyards, where they bury much, the earth will consume the corps in far shorter time than other earth will. Bacon.

No place so sacred from such fops is barr'd;
Nor is Paul's church more safe than Paul's churchyard. Pope.

CHURL.† n. s. [ceorl, Sax. carl, in German, is strong, rusticks being always observed to be strong bodied, Dr. Johnson says. This may apply to the first and second senses which he has given, but not to the third; which belongs to the Goth. karl, an old, and a poor, and mean, man. See also CARLE.]

1. A rustick; a countryman; a labourer.

He holdeth himself a gentleman, and scorneth to work or use any hard labour, which he saith is the life of a peasant or churl. Spenser on Ireland.

One of the baser sort, which they call churls, being reproved for his oath, answered confidently, that his lord commanded him. Spenser on Ireland.

Churl, upon thy eyes I throw
All the power this charm doth owe. Shaksp.

From this light cause the infernal maid prepares
The country churls to mischief, hate, and wars.
Dryden.

2. A rude, surly, ill-bred man.

A churl's courtesy rarely comes, but either for gain or falshood. Sidney.

3. A miser; a niggard; a selfish or greedy wretch.

The vile person shall be no more called liberal, nor the churl said to be bountiful.
Isaiah, xxxii. 5.

Poison, I see, hath been his timeless end!
O churl, drink all, and leave no friendly drop
To help me after! Shakspeare.

CHU'RLISH.† adj. [Sax. ceorlic.]

1. Rude; brutal; harsh; austere; sour; merciless; unkind; uncivil.

A sea of melting pearl, which some call tears,
Those at her father's churlish feet she tender'd.
Shakspeare.

The interruption of their churlish drums
Cuts off more circumstance; they are at hand
To parly, or to fight. Shakspeare.

A lion in love with a lass, desired her father's consent. The answer was churlish enough, He'd never marry his daughter to a brute. L'Estrange.

He the pursuit of churlish beasts,
Forbear'd to sleening on her breasts. Waller.

2. Selfish; avaricious.

The man was churlish and evil in his doings.
1 Sam. xxv. 3.

This sullen churlish thief
Had all his mind plac'd upon Mully's beef. King.

3. [Of things.] Unpliant; cross-grained; unmanageable; harsh; not yielding.

If there be emission of spirit, the body of the metal will be hard and churlish. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

The Cornish were become, like metal often fired and quenched, churlish, and that would sooner break than bow. Bacon, Henry VII.

Iron, in a quick fire, relents and melts; but, take it out of the furnace, and it grows hard again, nay worse, churlish and unmalleable.
Abp. Sancroft's Serm. p. 103.

In the hundreds of Essex they have a very churlish blue clay. Mortimer, Husbandry.

4. Vexatious; obstructive.

Will you again unknit
This churlish knot of all abhorred war? Shaks.

Spain found the war so churlish and longsome, as they found they should consume themselves in an endless war. Bacon.

Spreads a path clear as the day,
Where no churlish rub says nay. Crashaw.

CHU'RLISHLY.† adv. [from churlish.] Rudely; brutally.

A fool will upbraid churlishly.
Ecclus. xviii. 18.

How churlishly I chid Lucetta hence,
When willingly I would have had her here!
Shakspeare, Two Gent. of Verona.

He was known to have borne himself churlishly and proudly towards Emma his sister.
Milton, Hist. of Eng. b. 6.

After he had breathed out a thousand fruitless threats, he assaults the walls with violence; but by Rustan as churlishly answered, and with great loss compelled to retreat.
Sir T. Herbert, Trav. p. 88.

To the oak, now regnant, the olive did churlishly put over the son for a reward of the service of his sire. Howell.

CHU'RLISHNESS.† n. s. [from churlish; cyplıscnerre, Saxon.]

1. Brutality; ruggedness of manner.

Better is the churlishness of a man than a courteous woman. Ecclus. xlii. 14.

In the churlishness of fortune, a poor honest man suffers in this world. L'Estrange.

2. Difficulty of management. See the third sense of CHURLISH.

I do find, Mr. Speaker, that when kingdoms and states are entered into terms and resolutions of hostility, one against the other, yet they are many times restrained from their attempts by four impediments.—The third, when they have conceived an apprehension of the difficulty, and churlishness of the enterprise, and that it is not prepared to their hand. Bacon, Speech in Parl. 39. Eliz.

CHU'RLY.* adj. [from churl.] Rude, boisterous; violent.

The ship, where Jonah sleeps,
Is vexed sore, and batter'd on the deeps,
And well nigh split upon the threatning rock,
With many a boisterous brush and churly knock.
Quarles, Feast for Worms, (1620,) § 2.

CHURME. n. s. [more properly chirm, from the Saxon cyrme, a clamour or noise; as to chirre is to coo as a turtle.] A confused sound; a noise.

He was conveyed to the Tower with the churme of a thousand taunts and reproaches. Bacon.

CHURN.† n. s. [properly chern, from kern, Dut. cierin, cepene, Sax. Goth. kerna, to churn. See QUERN. The Sax. cepene is considered a derivative of cyrnan, to turn. All these words, however, may be referred to the Lat. gyrus, or the Gr. γυρος.] The vessel in which the butter is, by long and violent agitation, coagulated and separated from the serous parts of the milk.

Her aukward fist did ne'er employ the churn.
Gay, Pastorals.

To CHURN.† v. a. [kernen, Dutch, cepnan, Sax. kerna, Goth. Our elder authors write it cherne. And kern is yet a local word.]

1. To agitate or shake any thing by a violent motion. Dr. Johnson cites a passage from Shakspeare, in proof of this meaning; but he reads churning on for German one, the true reading. The passage had been sophisticated by Pope and Warburton, and Johnson preferred erring with them to the adoption of the old and genuine lection, as the alteration here furnished a fancied illustration of this verb.

Froth fills his chaps, he sends a grunting sound,
And part he churns, and part befoams the ground.
Dryden.

Churn'd in his teeth, the foamy venom rose.
Addison.

The mechanism of nature, in converting our aliment, consists in mixing with it animal juices, and, in the action of the solid parts, churning them together. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

2. To make butter by agitating the milk.

Skim milk: and sometimes labour in the quern;
And bootless make the breathless housewife churn.
Shakspeare, Mids. N. Dream.

Have you any churn'd milk, or new cheese.
Woedrophe's Fr. Gr. p. 211.

CHU'RNING.* n. s. [from the verb.] The act of making butter.

The churning of milk bringeth forth butter.
Prov. xxx. 33.

This is Mab, the mistress fairy,
That doth nightly rob the dairy,
And can hurt or help the cherning,
As she please without discerning.
B. Jonson, Entertainments.

You may try the force of imagination, upon staying the coming of butter after the churning.
Bacon, Nat. Hist.

I ne'er hurt their churnings.
Middleton's Witch, i. 2.

CHU'RNSTAFF. n. s. [from churn and staff.] The instrument employed for churning.
Sherwood.

CHU'RRWORM. n. s. [from cyrpan, Sax.] An insect that turns about nimbly; called also a fancricket.
Skinner, Philips.

To CHUSE. See To CHOOSE.

CHYLA'CEOUS. adj. [from chyle.] Belonging to chyle; consisting of chyle.

When the spirits of the chyle have half fermented the chylaceous mass, it has the state of drink, not ripened by fermentation.
Floyer on the Humours.

CHYLE. n. s. [χύλος.] The white juice formed in the stomach by digestion of the aliment, and afterwards changed into blood.

This powerful ferment, mingling with the parts,
The leven'd mass to milky chyle converts.
Blackmore.

The chyle cannot pass through the smallest vessels. Arbuthnot.

CHYLIFA'CTION. n. s. [from chyle.] The act or process of making chyle in the body.

Drinking excessively during the time of chylefaction, stops perspiration. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

CHYLIFA'CTIVE. adj. [from chylus and facio, to make, Lat.] Having the power of making chyle.

CHYLOPOE'TICK. adj. [χύλος, and ποιέω.] Having the power, or the office, of forming chyle.

According to the force of the chylopoetick organs, more or less chyle may be extracted from the same food. Arbuthnot.

CHY'LOUS. adj. [from chyle.] Consisting of chyle; partaking of chyle.

Milk is the chylous part of an animal, already prepared. Arbuthnot.

CHY'MICAL. } adj. [Lat. chymicus.]
CHY'MICK. }

1. Made by chymistry.

I'm tir'd with waiting for this chymick gold,
Which fools us young, and beggars us when old.
Dryden.

The medicines are ranged in boxes, according to their natures, whether chymical or Galenical preparations. Watts.

2. Relating to chymistry.

Methinks already, from this chymick flame,
I see a city of more precious mold. Dryden.

With chymick art exalts the min'ral pow'rs,
And draws the aromatick souls of flow'rs. Pope.

CHY'MICK.† n. s. [old Fr. chymique, a chymist. Cotgrave.] A chymist. Obsolete, Dr. Johnson says. While in use, it seems to have been employed rather contemptuously.

Galen mentions in his time but three sects of physicians — we have now a fourth, that go under the name of chymicks, hermeticks, or Paracelsians. Hakewill on Providence, p. 244.

He is turned chymick, sirrah; it seems so by his talk. — Here's old turning; these chymicks, seeking to turn lead into gold, turn away all their own silver. Brewer, Lingua, iv. 1.

The ancients observing in that material a kind of metallical nature, seem to have resolved it into nobler use: an art now utterly lost, or perchance kept up by a few chymicks. Wotton.

CHY'MICALLY.† adv. [from chymical.] In a chymical manner.

Burgravius specifies a lamp to be made of man's blood, lucerna vitæ et mortis index, so he terms it; which chymically prepared 40 days, and afterward kept in a glass, shall shew all the accidents of his life. Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 281.

I need no muse to give my passion vent,
He brews his tears that studies to lament.
Verse chymically weeps; that pious rain,
Distill'd with art, is but the sweat o' the brain.
Cleveland, Eleg. on Abp. Laud.

CHY'MIST. n. s. [See CHYMISTRY.] A professor of chymistry; a philosopher by fire.

The starving chymist, in his golden views
Supremely blest. Pope, Essay on Man.

CHYMI'STICAL.* adj. [old Fr. chymistique.] Relating to chymistry.

Paracelsus, and his chymistical followers, are so many Promethei, will fetch fire from heaven, will cure all manner of diseases, &c.
Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 377.

CHY'MISTRY.† n. s. [derived by some from χύμος, juice, or χύω, to melt; by others from an oriental word, kemia, black. According to the supposed etymology, it is written with y or e. Some deduce it from the name of a person eminently skilled in the science; whose name, however, is written both Χύμης and Χίμης. Others consider Chêmi, the Coptick name of Egypt, which was the cradle of this science, as the original. V. Morin, Dict. Etm. Fr. et Gr. "It is derived originally from chemia, and that word from Cham.—The Egyptians were deeply skilled in astronomy, and geometry; also in chymistry, and physick." Bryant, Anc. Myth. vol. iii. p. 299.]

An art whereby sensible bodies contained in vessels, or capable of being contained therein, are so changed, by means of certain instruments, and principally fire, that their several powers and virtues are thereby discovered, with a view to philosophy, or medicine. Boerhaave.

Most of the substances belonging to our globe are constantly undergoing alterations in sensible qualities; and one variety of matter becomes, as it were, transmitted into another. The object of chemical philosophy is to ascertain the causes of all such phenomena, whether natural or artificial, and to discover the laws by which they are governed. Sir H. Davy.

Operations of chymistry fall short of vital force: no chymist can make milk or blood of grass. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

CIBA'RIOUS. adj. [cibarius, Lat. from cibus, food.] Relating to food; useful for food; edible.

CI'BOL. n. s. [ciboule, Fr.] See CHIBBAL. A small sort of onion used in salads. This word is common in the Scotch dialect; but the l is not pronounced.

Ciboules or scallions, are a kind of degenerate onions. Mortimer.

CI'CATRICE, or CI'CATRIX. n. s. [cicatrix, Lat.]

1. The scar remaining after a wound.

One captain Spurio with his cicatrice, an emblem of war, here on his sinister cheek. Shaks.

2. A mark; an impression: so used by Shakspeare less properly.

Lean but upon a rush,
The cicatrice and capable impressure
Thy palm some moments keeps. Shakspeare.

CICATRI'SANT. n. s. [from cicatrice.] An application that induces a cicatrice.

CICATRI'SIVE. adj. [from cicatrice.] Having the qualities proper to induce a cicatrice.

CICATRIZA'TION. n. s. [from cicatrice.]

1. The act of healing the wound.

A vein bursted or corroded in the lungs, is looked upon to be for the most part incurable, because of the motion and coughing of the lungs, tearing the gap wider, and hindering the conglutination and cicatrization of the vein. Harvey.

2. The state of being healed, or skinned over.

The first stage of healing or the discharge of matter is called digestion; the second, or the filling up with flesh, incarnation; and the last or skinning over, cicatrization. Sharp, Surgery.

To CI'CATRIZE.† v. a. [from cicatrix.]

1. To apply such medicines to wounds, or ulcers, as heal and skin them over. Quincy.

The apothecary, or chirurgeon, giveth, with a cruel bill, the lately cicatrized wound a new gash. Moral State of England, (1670,) p. 54.

2. To heal and induce the skin over a sore.

We incarned, and in a few days cicatrized it with a smooth cicatrix. Wiseman on Tumours.

CI'CELY. n. s. [myrrhis.] A sort of herb.

*CICERO'NE. n. s. [Ital.] plur. ciceroni. A word of modern introduction into our speech for a guide.

He had not proceeded many steps from the monument before he beckoned to our cicerone. Shenstone.

One of the greatest vexations a curious person experiences in travelling through Spain, is the scarcity, the non-existence, of tolerable ciceroni; those you meet with are generally coblers, who throw a brown cloak over their ragged apparel, and conduct you to a church or two, where they cannot give you the least satisfactory information concerning antiquities or curiosities.
Swinburne, Trav. through Spain, L. 37.

CICHORA'CEOUS. adj. [from cichorium, Lat.] Having the qualities of succory.

Diureticks evacuate the salt serum; as all acid diureticks, and the testaceous and bitter chichoraceous plants. Floyer.

CICH-PEASE. n. s. [cicer.] A plant.

To CI'CURATE. v. a. [cicuro, Lat.] To tame; to reclaim from wildness; to make tame and tractable.

Poisons may yet retain some portion of their natures; yet are so refracted, cicurated, and subdued, as not to make good their destructive malignities. Brown, Vulg. Err.

CICURA'TION. n. s. [from cicurate.] The act of taming or reclaiming from wildness.

This holds not only in domestick and mansuete birds; for then it might be the effect of cicuration or institution; but in the wild.
Ray on the Creation.

*CID. n. s. [Span.] A chief; a commander.

CI'DER.† n. s. [cidre, Fr. sidre, Ital. sicera, Lat. σικέρα, שֵׁכָר. Dr. Johnson might have added, that the word is supposed to be originally of Egypt, and denoting an inebriating liquour. In old Fr. cisere is used for ale. The Saxons had the word cíber.]

1. All kind of strong liquours, except wine. This sense is now wholly obsolete.

He schal not drinke wyn ne sydyr.
Wicliffe, St. Luke, i.

2. Liquor made of the juice of fruits pressed.

We had also drink, wholesome and good wine of the grape, a kind of cider made of a fruit of that country; a wonderful pleasing and refreshing drink. Bacon.

3. The juice of apples expressed and fermented. This is now the sense.

To the utmost bounds of this
Wide universe Silurian cider borne,
Shall please all tastes, and triumph o'er the vine.
Philips.

CI'DERIST. n. s. [from cider.] A maker of cider.

When the ciderists have taken care for the best fruit, and ordered them after the best manner they could, yet hath their cider generally proved pale, sharp, and ill tasted. Mortimer.

CI'DER-KIN. n. s. [from cider.]

A low word used for the liquour made of the murk or gross matter of apples, after the cider is pressed out, and a convenient quantity of boiled water added to it; the whole infusing for about forty-eight hours.

Philip, World of Words.
Ciderkin is made for common drinking, and supplies the place of small beer. Mortimer.

CIELING. n. s. See CEILING.

CIERGE. n. s. [French.] A candle carried in processions.

CI'LIARY. adj. [cilium, Lat.] Belonging to the eyelids.
The ciliary processes, or rather the ligaments, observed in the inside of the sclerotick tunicles of the eye, do serve instead of a muscle, by the contraction, to alter the figure of the eye.
Ray on the Creation.

CILI'CIOUS. adj. [from cilicium, hair-cloth, Lat.] Made of hair.
A garment of camel's hair; that is, made of some texture of that hair, a coarse garment, a cilicious or sackcloth habit, suitable to the austerity of his life. Brown, Vulg. Err.

CIMA'R.† See CHIMERE, and SIMAR.

CIME'LIARCH. n. s. [from κειμηλιαρχης.] The chief keeper of plate, vestments, and things of value belonging to a church; a church-warden. Dict.

CI'METER. n. s. [cimitarra, Span. and Portug. from chimeteir, Turkish. Bluteau's Portuguese Dictionary.] A sort of sword used by the Turks; short; heavy; and recurvated, or bent backward. This word is sometimes erroneously spelt scimitar, and scymiter; as in the following examples.
By this scimitar
That slew the sophy and a Persian prince,
That won three fields of sultan Solyman. Shaks.
Our armours now may rust, our idle scymiters
Hang by our sides for ornament, not use. Dryd.

CI'MISS.* n. s. [Lat. cimex, pl. cimices.] A noisome little worm, which raiseth wheals where it biteth; if it be broken, it yieldeth a stinking smell; the bug.
Bullokar.

CIMME'RIAN.* adj. [from Cimmerii, people of Italy, living in a valley between hills, which the sun, it is pretended, never visited; or, who lived in caves.] Extremely dark.
Let cimmerian darkness be my only habitation.
Sidney, Arcad. b. 3.
Hence, loathed melancholy, —
In dark cimmerian desart ever dwell.
Milton, L'All.

CI'NCTURE. n. s. [cinctura, Lat.]
1. Something worn round the body.
Now happy he whose cloak and cincture
Hold out this tempest. Shakspeare.
Columbus found the American, so girt
With feather'd cincture, naked else, and wild.
Milton, P. L.
He binds the sacred cincture round his breast.
Pope.
2. An inclosure.
The court and prison being within the cincture of one wall. Bacon, Hen. VII.
3. [In architecture.] A ring or list at the top and bottom of the shaft of a column; separating the shaft at one end from the base, at the other from the capital. It is supposed to be in imitation of the girths or ferrils anciently used, to strengthen and preserve the primitive wood-columns. Chambers.

CI'NDER. n. s. [ceindre, Fr. from cineres, Latin.]
1. A mass ignited and quenched, without being reduced to ashes.
I should make very forges of my cheeks,
That would to cinders burn up modesty,
Did but I speak thy deeds! Shakspeare.
There is in smith's cinders, by some adhesion of iron, sometimes to be found a magnetical operation. Brown.
So snow on Ætna does unmelted lie,
Whose rolling flames and scatter'd cinders fly.
Waller.
2. A hot coal that has ceased to flame.
If from adown the hopeful chops
The fat upon a cinder drops,
To stinking smoke it turns the flame. Swift.

CI'NDER-WENCH. } n. s. [cinder and wo-
CI'NDER-WOMAN. } man.] A woman whose trade is to rake in heaps of ashes for cinders.
'Tis under so much nasty rubbish laid,
To find it out's the cinder-woman's trade.
Essay on Satire.
She had above five hundred suits of fine cloaths, and yet went abroad like a cinder-wench.
Arbuthnot, Hist. of J. Bull.
In the black form of cinder-wench she came,
When love, the hour, the place had banish'd shame. Gay.

CI'NDEROUS, or CI'NDROUS.* adj. Like a cinder.
Metals — by heat well purified and cleans'd,
Or of a certain sharp and cindrous humor.
Sylvester, Du Bart. 1621, p. 450.

CINERA'TION. n. s. [from cineres, Lat.] The reduction of any thing by fire to ashes. A term of chymistry.

CINE'REOUS.* adj. [Lat. cinereus.] Of ash colour. Ray.
The hair is red at the tips, cinereous beneath.
Pennant.

CINERI'TIOUS.† adj. [cinericius, Lat.] Having the form or state of ashes.
The nerves arise from the glands of the cineritious part of the brain, and are terminated in all parts of the body. Cheyne.
Broken and burnt rocks, ruins of buildings, and cineritious earth.
Delany, Rev. Exam. ii. 226.

CINE'RULENT. adj. [from cineres, Lat.] Full of ashes. Dict.

CI'NGLE. n. s. [from cingulum, Lat.] A girth for a horse. Dict.

CI'NNABAR.† n. s. [Fr. cinnabre, or cinabre; from the Gr. κιννάβαρι, Lat. cinnabaris. It is an Indian word, according to Pliny. V. Morin, Dict. Etym. Fr. and Gr.] Cinnabar is native or factitious: the factitious cinnabar is called vermillion.
Cinnabar is the ore out of which quicksilver is drawn, and consists partly of a mercurial, and partly of a sulphureo-ochreous matter.
Woodward's Met. Fossils.
The particles of mercury uniting with the particles of sulphur, compose cinnabar.
Newton, Opt.

CI'NNABAR of Antimony, is made of mercury, sulphur, and crude antimony.

CI'NNAMON.† n. s. [cinnamomum, Lat. through the Greek; from the Heb. kinnamon.] The fragrant bark of a low tree in the island of Ceylon. Its leaves resemble those of the olive, both as to substance and colour. The fruit resembles an acorn or olive, and has neither the smell nor taste of the bark. When boiled in water, it yields an oil, which, as it cools and hardens, becomes as firm and white as tallow; the smell of which is agreeable in candles. The cinnamon of the ancients was different from ours. Chambers.
Let Araby extol her happy coast,
Her cinnamon and sweet amomum boast.
Dryden, Fables.

CI'NNAMON Water is made by distilling the bark, first infused in barley water, in spirit of wine or white wine.
Chambers.

CINQUE.† n. s. [Fr.] A Five. It is used in games alone; but is often compounded with other words, Dr. Johnson says. Cinque, however, is not confined to games. It signifies simply a five.
These five cinques, or these 25 round spots, in arms do signify numbers, as some writers have observed.
Potter on the Number 666, (1647,) p. 176.

CINQUE-FOIL. n. s. [cinque feuille, Fr.] A kind of five-leaved clover.

CINQUE-PACE. n. s. [cinque pas, Fr.] A of grave dance.
Wooing, wedding, and repenting is a Scotch jig, a measure, and a cinque-pace. The first suit is hot and hasty, like a Scotch jig, and full as fantastical; the wedding, mannerly and modest, as a measure, full of state and gravity; and then comes repentance, and, with his bad legs, falls into the cinque pace faster and faster, till he sinks into his grave. Shakspeare.

CINQUE-PORTS.† n. s. [cinque ports, Fr.] Those havens that lie towards France, and therefore have been thought by our kings to be such as ought most vigilantly to be observed against invasion. In which respect the places where they are have a special governour or keeper, called by his office Lord Warden of the cinque ports; and divers privileges granted to them, as a particular jurisdiction, their warden having the authority of an admiral among them, and sending out writs in his own name. The cinque ports are Dover, Sandwich, Rye, Hastings, Seaford, Winchelsea, Rumney, and Hithe; some of which, as the number exceeds five, must either be added to the first institution by some later grant, or accounted as appendants to some of the rest. Cowel.
They, that bear
The cloth of state above her, are four barons
Of the cinque ports. Shakspeare.
Temptations come in by those cinque-ports, the senses. Junius, Sin Stigmatized, (1639,) p. 297.

CINQUE-SPOTTED. adj. Having five spots.
On her left breast
A mole, cinque spotted, like the crimson drops
I' th' bottom of a cowslip. Shakspeare.

CI'ON. n. s. [sion, or scion, Fr.]
1. A sprout; a shoot from a plant.
We have reason to cool our raging motions, our carnal stings, our unbitted lusts; whereof I take this that you call love, to be a sect or cion.
Shakspeare.
The stately Caledonian oak, newly settled in his triumphant throne, begirt with cions of his own royal stem. Howell.
2. The shoot engrafted or inserted on a stock.
The cion over-ruleth the stock; and the stock is but passive, and giveth aliment, but no motion to the graft. Bacon.

CI'PHER.† n. s. [chifre, Fr. zifra, Ital. cifra, low Lat. from an oriental root.]

1. An arithmetical character, by which some number is noted; a figure.
2. An arithmetical mark, which, standing for nothing itself, increases the value of the other figures.

The cipher of itself implies a privation of value; but when disposed with other characters on the left of it, in the common arithmetick, it serves to augment each of their values by ten; and in decimal arithmetick, to lessen the value of each figure to the right of it, in the same proportion. Chambers.

Mine were the very cipher of a function,
To find the faults, whose fine stands in record,
And let go by the actor. Shakspeare.

If the people be somewhat in the election, you cannot make them nulls or ciphers in the privation or translation. Bacon.

As, in accounts, ciphers and figures pass for real sums, so names pass for things. South.

3. An intertexture of letters engraved usually on boxes or plate.

Troy flam'd in burnish'd gold; and o'er the throne,
ARMS AND THE MAN in golden ciphers shone. Pope.

Some mingling stir the melted tar, and some
Deep on the new-shorn vagrant's heaving side,
To stamp the master's cipher, ready stand. Thomson.

4. A character in general.

In succeeding times this wisdom began to be written in ciphers and characters, and letters bearing the form of creatures. Ralegh, Hist. of the World.

5. A secret or occult manner of writing, or the key to it.

To brachygraphy may be added the writing by zifers, or notæ furtivæ, secret marks for the hiding of the writer's mind from others, save him to whom he writes it; as also the witty invention of dezifring or discovering the most difficult of those secret characters. Hakewill on Providence, p. 261.

This book, as long liv'd as the elements,
In cipher writ, or new made idioms. Donne.

He was pleased to command me to stay at London, to send and receive all his letters; and I was furnished with mine several ciphers, in order to it. Denham.

6. A species of juggling.

That body, wheresoever that it light,
May learned be by ciphers, or by magicke might. Spenser, F. Q. iii. ii. 45.

With that he circles draws, and squares,
With ciphers, astral characters.
Then looks 'em o'er to understand 'em,
Although set down hab-nab at random. Hudibras, ii. iii.

To CI'PHER. v. n. [from the noun.] To practise arithmetick.

You have been bred to business; you can cipher: I wonder you never used your pen and ink. Arbuthnot.

To CIPHER.† v. a.

1. To write in occult characters.

He frequented sermons, and penned notes: his notes he ciphered with Greek characters. Hayward.

2. To designate; to characterise.

The face of either cipher'd either's heart.
Shakspeare, Rape of Lucrece.

Some loathsome dash the herald will contrive
To cipher me, how fondly I did dote.
Shakspeare, Rape of Lucrece.

CIRC.* n. s. [Fr. cirque, Lat. circus. See CIRCUS.] An amphitheatrical circle for sports.

Circs of the same sort are still to be seen in Cornwall, so famous at this day for the athletick art. Warton, Hist. of English Poetry, i. Diss. 1.

CIRCE'NSIAL, or CIRCE'NSIAN.* adj. [Lat. ludi circenses, from the circus, in which the sports were exhibited.] Relating to the exhibitions in the amphitheatres of the Romans.

If the Romans had well known this airy chase, they would have left or less regarded their circensial recreations. Sir T. Brown's Tracts, p. 117.

The circensian plays may very well include the representations of sea-fights, and sports performed in the amphitheatres. Kennet, Rom. Antiq. ii. v. 2.

To CI'RCINATE. v. a. [circino, Lat.] To make a circle; to compass round, or turn round. Bailey.

CIRCINA'TION. n. s. [circinatio, Lat.] An orbicular motion; a turning round; a measuring with the compasses. Bailey.

CI'RCLE.† n. s. [cipcol, cipcul, Sax. circulus, Lat.]

1. A line continued till it ends where it begun, having all its parts equidistant from a center.

Any thing, that moves round about in a circle, in less time than our ideas are wont to succeed one another in our minds, is not perceived to move; but seems to be a perfect intire circle of that matter, or colour, and not a part of a circle in motion. Locke.

By a circle I understand not here perfect geometrical circle, but an orbicular figure, whose length is equal to its breadth; and which as to sense may seem circular. Newton, Opt.

Then a deeper still,
In circle following circle, gathers round
To close the face of things. Thomson, Summer.

2. The space included in a circular line.
3. A round body; an orb.

It is he that sitteth upon the circle of the earth. Isaiah, xi. 22.

4. Compass; inclosure.

A great magician,
Obscured in the circle of the forest. Shakspeare.

5. An assembly surrounding the principal person.

To have a box where eunuchs sing,
And, foremost in the circle, eye a king.
Pope, Horace.

6. A company; an assembly.

I will call over to him the whole circle of beauties that are disposed among the boxes. Addison.

Ever since that time, Lisander visits in every circle. Tatler.

7. Any series ending as it begins, and perpetually repeated.

There be fruit trees in hot countries, which have blossoms and young fruit, and young fruit and ripe fruit, almost all the year, succeeding one another; but this circle of ripening cannot be but in succulent plants and hot countries. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

Thus in a circle runs the peasant's pain,
And the year rolls within itself again.
Dryden, Virg.

8. An inconclusive form of argument, in which the foregoing proposition is proved by the following, and the following proposition is inferred from the foregoing.

That heavy bodies descend by gravity; and again, that gravity is a quality whereby an heavy body descends, is an impertinent circle and teacheth nothing. Glanville, Scepsis.

The fallacy called a circle, is when one of the premises in a syllogism is questioned and opposed, and we intend to prove it by the conclusion. Watts, Logick.

9. Circumlocution; indirect form of words.

Has he given the lye
In circle or oblique, or semicircle,
Or direct parallel? You must challenge him.
Fletcher, Q. of Corinth.

10. CIRCLES of the German empire. Such provinces and principalities as have a right to be present at diets. Trevoux.

To CIRCLE. v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To move round any thing.

The lords that were appointed to circle the hill, had some days before planted themselves in places convenient. Bacon.

Another Cynthia her new journey runs,
And other planets circle other suns.
Pope, Dunciad.

2. To inclose; to surround.

What stern ungentle hands
Have lopp'd and hew'd, and made thy body bare
Of her two branches, those sweet ornaments,
Whose circling shadows kings have sought to sleep in? Shakspeare.

While these fond arms, thus circling you, may prove
More heavy chains than those of hopeless love.
Prior.

Unseen, he glided thro' the joyous crowd,
With darkness circled, and an ambient cloud.
Pope.

3. To CIRCLE in. To confine; to keep together.

We term those things dry which have a consistence within themselves, and which, to enjoy a determinate figure, do not require the stop or hindrance of another body to limit and circle them in. Digby on Bodies.

To CI'RCLE. v. n. To move circularly; to end where it begins.

The well fraught bowl
Circles incessant; whilst the humble cell
With quavering laugh, and rural jests resounds.
Philips.

Now the circling years disclose,
The day predestin'd to reward his woes.
Pope, Odyssey.

CI'RCLED. adj. [from circle.] Having the form of a circle; round.

The inconstant moon,
That monthly changes in her circled orb. Shaksp.

CI'RCLER.* n. s. [from circle. "Scriptor cyclicus," Hor. Art. Poet.] A mean poet; a circular poet. See CIRCULAR.

Nor so begin, as did that circler late,
I sing a noble war, and Priam's fate.
B. Jonson, Art of Poetry.

CI'RCLET.† n. s. [from circle.] A circle; an orb: properly a little circle. Formerly, a wreath, ring, or circlet of wicker, to set under a dish, in order to guard the table. Sherwood.

Certain ladies or countesses, with plain circlets of gold without flowers.
Shakspeare, Hen. VIII. Order of Procession.

Then take repast, till Hesperus displayed
His golden circlet in the western shade.
Pope, Odyss.

CI'RCLING. part. adj. [from To circle.] Having the form of a circle; circular; round.

Round he surveys, and well might, where he stood
So high above the circling canopy
Of night's extended shade. Milton, P. L.

CI'RCLY.* adj. [from circle.] In the form of a circle or compass. Huloet.

CI'RCUIT.† n. s. [circuit, Fr. circuitus, Lat.]

1. The act of moving round any thing.

There are four moons also perpetually rolling round the planet Jupiter, and carried along with him in his periodical circuit round the sun. Watts on the Mind.

2. The space inclosed in a circle.

He led me up
A woody mountain, whose high top was plain
A circuit wide inclosed. Milton, P.L.

3. Space; extent; measured by travelling round.

He attributeth unto it smallness, in respect of circuit. Hooker.

The lake of Bolsena is reckoned one and twenty miles in circuit. Addison on Italy.

4. A ring; a diadem; that by which any thing is incircled.

And this fell tempest shall not cease to rage,
Until the golden circuit on my head
Do calm the fury of this mad-brain'd flaw. Shakspeare.

5. The visitations of the judges for holding assises.

The circuits, in former times, went round about the pale; as the circuit of the cynosura about the pole. Davies.

6. The tract of country visited by the judges.

Nobles, bishops, and judges, that have great dioceses, and jurisdictions, and circuits, must read much in God's Book; for they need much honye to feed the people under them with.

Bp. of Chichester's Serm. before the Queen, 1576.

He went from year to year in circuit to Bethel, and Gilgal, and Mizpeh; and judged Israel in all those places. 1 Sam. vii. 16.

7. Long deduction of reason; circumlocution.

Thou hast used no circuit of words. Huloet.

Up into the watch tower get,
And see all things despoil'd of fallacies;
Thou shalt not peep thro' lettices of eyes,
Nor hear thro' labyrinths of ears, nor learn
By circuit or collections to discern. Donne.

Ci'rcuit of action. [In law.] Is a longer course of proceeding to recover the thing sued for, than is needful. Cowel.

To Ci'rcuit. v. n. [from the noun.] To move circularly.

Pining with equinoctial heat, unless
The cordial cup perpetual motion keep,
Quick circuiting. Philips.

To Ci'rcuit.* v. a. [from the noun.] To move round; to travel round.

He went from year to year in circuit to [in the margin, he circuited] Bethel, and Gilgal, &c. 1 Sam. vii. 16.

At length Geryon, having circuited the air like a faulcon towering without prey, deposits his burthen and vanishes. Warton, Hist. of Eng. Poet. iii. 246.

Circuite'er.† n. s. [from circuit.] One that travels a circuit. Formerly written circuiter.

Whether the thieves condemned by any circuiter corrupted have done more villanies than their judge.

Whitlock, Manners of the English, (1654,) p. 513.

Like your fellow circuiteer the sun: you travel the round of the earth, and behold all the iniquities under the heavens. Pope.

Circui'tion.† n. s. [circuitio, Lat.]

1. The act of going round any thing.

Kimchi testifieth, that all words which come from the root סבב signify encompassing or circuition. Pearson on the Creed, Art. iii.

2. Compass; maze of argument.

To apprehend by what degrees they lean to things in show, though not indeed repugnant one to another, requireth more sharpness of wit, more intricate circuitions of discourse, and depth of judgement, than common ability doth yield. Hooker.

Circu'itous.* adj. [from circuit.] Round about.

There is no way to make a connection between the original constituent and the representative, but by circuitous means. Burke.

Circu'itously.* adv. [from circuitous.] In a circuitous manner.

Ci'rculable.* adj. [from circle.] That may be circulated.

Ci'rcular. adj. [circularis, Lat.]

1. Round, like a circle; circumscribed by a circle.

The frame thereof seem'd partly circular,
And part triangular. Spenser, F. Q.

He first inclos'd for lists a level ground;
The form was circular. Dryden, Fables.

Nero's port, composed of huge moles running round it, in a kind of circular figure. Addison on Italy.

2. Successive in order; always returning.

The life of man is a perpetual war,
In misery and sorrow circular. Sandys, Job, p. 12.

From whence the innumerable race of things,
By circular successive order springs. Roscommon.

3. Vulgar; mean; circumforaneous.

Had Virgil been a circular poet, and closely adhered to history, how could the Romans have had Dido? Dennis.

4. Ending in itself, used of a paralogism, where the second proposition at once proves the first, and is proved by it.

One of Carte's first principles of reasoning, after he had doubted of every thing, seems to be too circular, to safely build upon; for he is for proving the being of God from the truth of our faculties, and the truth of our faculties from the being of a God. Baker, Reflect. on Learning.

5. Perfect; complete. Not now used.

In this, sister,
Your wisdom is not circular. Massinger, Emp. of the East.

6. Circular Letter. A letter directed to several persons who have the same interest in some common affair; as in the convocation of assemblies. Modern affectation has changed this expression into the substantive; and we now hear of nothing but circulars from publick offices, and circulars from superintendants of a feast or club.

7. Circular Lines. Such strait lines as are divided from the divisions made in the arch of a circle; as the lines of sines, tangents, and secants, on the plain scale and sector.

8. Circular Sailing, is that performed on the arch of a great circle.

Circula'rity. n. s. [from circular.] A circular form.

The heavens have no diversity or difference, but a simplicity of parts, and equiformity in motion, continually succeeding each other; so that from what point soever we compute, the account will be common unto the whole circularity. Brown.

Ci'rcularly. adv. [from circular.]

1. In form of a circle.

The internal form of it consists of several regions, involving one another like orbs about the same centre, or of the several elements cast circularly about each other. Burnet.

2. With a circular motion.

Trade, which, like blood, should circularly flow,
Stopp'd in their channels, found its freedom lost. Dryden.

Every body, moved circularly about any centre, recedes, or endeavours to recede, from that centre of its motion. Ray.

Ci'rculary.* adj. [circularis, Lat.] Ending in itself.

Which rule must serve for the better understanding of that, which Damascene hath, touching cross, and circulary speeches, wherein there are attributed to God such things as belong to manhood, and to man such as properly concern the duty of Christ Jesus. Hooker, Eccl. Pol. v. § 53.

To Ci'rculate. v. n. [from circulus.]

1. To move in a circle; to run round; to return to the place whence it departed in a constant course.

If our lives motions theirs must imitate,
Our knowledge, like our blood must circulate. Denham.

Nature is a perpetual motion; and the work of the universe circulates without any interval or repose. L'Estrange.

2. To be dispersed.

As the mints of calumny are perpetually at work, a great number of curious inventions issued out from time to time, grow current among the party, and circulate through the whole kingdom. Addison.

To Ci'rculate.† v. a.

1. To travel round.

May I not conclude for certain that this man hath been in the moon, where his head hath been intoxicated with circulating the earth?

Bp. H. Croft, Animadv. on Burnet's Theory, (1685,) Pref.

2. To put about.

In the civil wars, the money spent on both sides was circulated at home; no publick debts contracted. Swift.

Circula'tion.* n. s. [old Fr. circulation.]

1. Motion in a circle; a course in which the motion tends to the point from which it began.

What more obvious, one would think, than the circulation of the blood, unknown till the last age? Burnet, Theory.

As much blood passeth through the lungs as through all the rest of the body: the circulation is quicker, and heat greater, and their texture extremely delicate. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

2. A series in which the same order is always observed, and things always return to the same state.

As for the sins of peace, thou hast brought upon us the miseries of war; so for the sins of war, thou seest fit to deny us the blessing of peace, and to keep us in a circulation of miseries. K. Charles.

God, by the ordinary rule of nature, permits this continual circulation of human things. Swift on Modern Education.

3. A reciprocal interchange of meaning.

When the apostle saith of the Jews, that they crucified the Lord of glory; and when the son of man, being on earth, affirmeth that the son of man was in heaven at the same instant, there is in these two speeches that mutual circulation before-mentioned. Hooker.

4. Currency of a substitute for money.

It comes with something solid in aid of the credit of the paper circulation. Burke.

Circulato'rious.* adj. [Lat. circulatorius.] Travelling in a circuit; showing tricks from house to house and from town to town.

Jesus did never make use of such unaccountable methods or instruments, as magical enchapters, divinators, circulatorious juglers, and such emissaries of the devil, or self seeking impostors are wont to use. Barrow, Serm. ii. 20.

Ci'rculatory. n. s. [from circulate.] A chymical vessel, in which that which rises from the vessel on the fire, is collected and cooled in another fixed upon it, and falls down again.

CI'RCULATORY. adj. [from circulate.] Circulatory Letters are the same with CIRCULAR Letters.

CI'RCULATORY.* adj. The same as circulatorious, in its low sense.

Borde's circulatory preregrinations, in the quality of a quack doctor, might have furnished more ample materials for an English topography.
Warton, Hist. of Eng. Poetry, iii. 76.

CIRCUMA'MBIENCY. n. s. [from circumambient.] The act of encompassing.

Ice receiveth its figure according unto the surface it concreteth, or the circumambiency which conformeth it. Brown.

CIRCUMA'MBIENT.† adj. [circum and ambio, Latin.] Surrounding; encompassing; enclosing.

Some impute it to the quality of the circumambient air that hangs over the place.
Howell's Lett. i. i. 28.

The circumambient coldness towards the sides of the vessel, like the second region, cooling and condensing of it. Wilkins.

To CIRCUMA'MBULATE.† v. a. [from circum and ambulo, Lat.] To walk round about. Dict.

Why should he circumambulate the vocabulary for another couplet, to talk in harsher diction about glades of turf. Seward's Letters, i. 345.

*CIRCUMCE'LLIONS. n. s. A set of illiterate savage peasants, and desperate ruffians, who adhered to the party of the Donatists, in the fourth century. V. Chambers. The word has passed into our language for an expression of contempt; for in Cockeram's old dictionary, "a circumcellion" is defined "a tavern-hunter."

There was another sort of jesuited Donatists, as I may say, whom they called Circumcellions, though as little reason can be given of their name as of their opinions. Fuller, Holy State, &c. p. 380.

They look like the old Circumcelliones, a company of vagrant hypocrites.
Bp. Ganden's Hieraspistes, 1653, p. 98.

To CI'RCUMCISE.† v. a. [circumcido, Latin. And our own word was formerly circumcide. "A doubt arose, whether those which came to the faith of the Gentiles should be circumcided." Stapleton's Fort. of Faith, 1565, for 139. b.] To cut the prepuce or foreskin, according to the law given to the Jews.

They came to circumcise the child.
St. Luke, i. 59.

One is alarmed at the industry of the whigs, in aiming to strengthen their routed party by a reinforcement from the circumcised. Swift, Examiner.

CI'RCUMCISER.* n. s. [from circumcise.] One who circumcises.

This concising punishment of circumcisers became a penal law among the Visigoths.
Milton, Civ. Power, in Ecc. Cases.

Having gained a competent skill and experience, they set up for circumcisers.
L. Addison, State of the Jews, p. 61.

CIRCUMCI'SION. n. s. [from circumcise.] The rite or act of cutting off the foreskin.

They left a race behind
Like to themselves, distinguishable scarce
From Gentiles, but by circumcision vain.
Milton, P. R.

CIRCUMCURSA'TION.* n. s. [from Lat. circum and cursor.] The act of running up and down.

The address of Felicissimus and Fortunatus to Pope Cornelius was but a factious circumcursation of desperate wretches. Barrow, Serm. i. p. 252.

To CIRCUMDU'CT. v. a. [circumduco, Lat.] To contravene; to nullify: a term of civil law.

Acts of judicature may be cancelled and circumducted by the will and direction of the judge; as also by the consent of the parties litigant, before the judge has pronounced and given sentence.
Ayliffe, Parergon.

CIRCUMDU'CTION.† n. s. [from circumduct.]

1. Nullification; cancellation.

The citation may be circumducted, though the defendant should not appear; and the defendant must be cited, as a circumduction requires.
Ayliffe, Parergon.

2. A leading about.

By long circumduction perhaps any truth may be derived from any other truth. Hooker.

But thou scorn'st to stay
Under one title: thou hast made thy way
And flight about the isle, well near, by this
In thy admired Periegesis,
Or universal circumduction
Of all that read thy Poly-Olbion.
B. Jonson, Epigrams.

CIRCU'MFERENCE, n. s. [circumferentia, Latin.]

1. The periphery; the line including and surrounding any thing.

Extend thus far thy bounds,
This be thy just circumference, O world!
Milton, P. L.

Because the hero is the centre of the main action, all the lines from the circumference tend to him alone. Dryden.

Fire moved nimbly in the circumference of a circle, makes the whole circumference appear like a circle of fire. Newton.

2. The space inclosed in a circle.

So was his will
Pronounc'd among the gods, and by an oath,
That shook heav'n's whole circumference, confirm'd. Milton, P. L.

He first inclos'd for lists a level ground,
The whole circumference a mile around.
Dryden, Fables.

3. The external part of an orbicular body.

The bubble, being looked on by the light of the clouds reflected from it, seemed red at its apparent circumference. If the clouds were viewed through it, the colour at its circumference would be blue.
Newton, Opticks.

4. An orb; a circle; any thing circular or orbicular.

His pond'rous shield, large and round,
Behind him cast; the broad circumference
Hung on his shoulders like the moon.
Milton, P. L.

To CIRCU'MFERENCE. v. a. [from the noun.] To include in a circular space. Not proper.

Nor is the vigour of this great body included only in itself, or circumferenced by its surface; but diffused at indeterminate distances.
Brown, Vulg. Err.

CIRCUMFERE'NTIAL.* adj. [from circumference.] Belonging to the circumference; circular; that which surrounds.

How much must the influence of such an authority be upon the circumferential parts of its œcumenical sphere.
Barrow on the Pope's Supremacy.

CIRCUMFERE'NTOR. n. s. [from circumfero, Lat. to carry about.] An instrument used in surveying, for measuring angles, consisting of a brass circle, an index with sights, and a compass, and mounted on a staff, with a ball and socket. Chambers.

To CI'RCUMFLECT.* v. a. [Lat. circumflecto.] To place the accent, called circumflex on words.

CI'RCUMFLEX. n. s. [circumflexus, Lat.] An accent used to regulate the pronunciation of syllables, including or participating the acute and grave.

The circumflex keeps the voice in a middle tune, and therefore in the Latin is compounded of both the other. Holder.

CIRCU'MFLUENCE. n. s. [from circumfluent.] An inclosure of waters.

CIRCU'MFLUENT. adj. [circumfluens, Lat.] Flowing round any thing.

I rule the Paphian race,
Whose bounds the deep circumfluent waves embrace,
A duteous people and industrious isle.
Pope, Odyss.

CIRCU'MFLUOUS. adj. [circumfluus, Lat.] Environing with waters.

He the world
Built on circumfluous waters calm, in wide
Crystalline ocean. Milton, P. L.

Not borrowed from circumforanean rogues and gipsies. Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 58.

CIRCUMFORA'NEOUS.† adj. [circumforaneus, Lat.] Wandering from house to house. As a circumforaneous fidler; one that plays at doors.

Those circumforaneous wits, whom every nation calls by the name of that dish of meat which it likes best. In Holland they are termed Pickled Herrings; in France, Jean Pottages; in Italy, Maccaronies; and in Great Britain, Jack Puddings.
Addison, Spect. No. 47.

To CIRCUMFU'SE. v. a. [circumfusus, Lat.] To pour round; to spread every way.

Men see better when their eyes are against the sun, or candle, if they put their hand before their eye. The glaring sun or candle, weakens the eye; whereas the light circumfused, is enough for the perception. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

His army, circumfus'd on either wing.
Milton, P. L.

Earth with her nether ocean circumfus'd,
Their pleasant dwelling-house. Milton, P. L.

This nymph the God Cephisus had abus'd,
With all his winding waters circumfus'd.
Addison, Ovid.

CIRCUMFU'SILE. adj. [circum and fusilis, Lat.] That may be poured or spread round any thing.

Artist divine, whose skilful hands infold
The victim's horn with circumfusile gold.
Pope, Odyss.

CIRCUMFU'SION.† n. s. [from circumfuse.] The act of spreading round; the state of being poured round.

The natural suit—was of daily creation and circumfusion! Swift, Tale of a Tub.

CIRCUMGESTA'TION.† n. s. [Lat. circumgesto.] The act of carrying about.

There are very many more things, in which the church of Rome hath greatly turned aside from the doctrines of scripture, and the practice of the catholick, apostolick, and primitive church. Such are these: the invocation of saints: circumgestation of the eucharist to be adored, &c.
Bp. Taylor, Diss. from Popery, i. § 11.

To CIRCU'MGYRATE.† v. a. [circum and gyrus, Lat.] To roll round.

The soul about itself circumgyrates
Her various forms.

Lodge, Pleas. Hist. of Glaucus, &c. (1610.)

CI'VET. n. s. [civette, Fr. zibetta, Arabick, signifying scent.] A perfume from the civet cat.

The civet, or civet cat, is a little animal not unlike our cat. It is a native of the Indies, Peru, Brazil, Guinea. The perfume is formed like a kind of grease, in a bag under its tail, between the anus and pudendum. It is gathered from time to time, and abounds in proportion as the animal is fed.
Dict. Trevoux.

Civet is of a baser birth than tar; the very uncleanly flux of a cat. Shakspeare.

Some putrefactions and excrements do yield excellent odours; as civet and musk, and, as some think, ambergrease. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

CI'VICAL.* adj. [Lat. civicus.] Belonging to civil honours.

Their honorary crowns, triumphal, ovary, civical, obsidional, had little of flowers in them.
Sir T. Brown, Tracts, p. 91.

CI'VICK. adj. [civicus, Lat.] Relating to civil honours or practices; not military.

With equal rays immortal Tully shone:
Behind, Rome's genius waits with civick crowns,
And the great father of his country owns.
Pope, Temp. of Fame.

CI'VIL.† adj. [civilis, Lat.]

1. Relating to the community; political; relating to the city or government.

God gave them laws of civil regimen, and would not permit their common weal to be governed by any other laws than his own. Hooker, iii. § 11.

Part such as appertain
To civil justice; part, religious rites
Of sacrifice. Milton, P. L.

But there is another unity, which would be most advantageous to our country; and that is, your endeavour after a civil, a political union in the whole nation. Sprat.

2. Relating to any man as a member of a community.

Break not your promise, unless it be unlawful or impossible; either out of your natural, or out of your civil power. Bp. Taylor.

3. Not in anarchy; not wild; not without rule or government.

For rudest minds with harmony were caught,
And civil life was by the muses taught. Roscom.

4. Not foreign; intestine.

From a civil war, God of his mercy defend us, as that which is most desperate of all others.
Bacon to Villiers.

5. Not ecclesiastical; as, the ecclesiastical courts are controlled by the civil.

Unto whom the chief government of all estates in this realm, whether they be ecclesiastical or civil, in all causes doth appertain.
Articles of Religion, Art. 37.

6. Not natural; as, a person banished or outlawed is said to suffer civil, though not natural death.

In case any estate be granted to a man for his life generally, it may determine by his civil death; as if he enter into a monastery, whereby he is dead in law. Blackstone.

7. Not military; as, the civil magistrate's authority is obstructed by war.

But let grave annals paint the warrior's fame;
Fair shine his arms in history enroll'd;
Whilst humbler lyres his civil worth proclaim.
Shenstone.

8. Not criminal; as, this is a civil process, not a criminal prosecution.

Private wrongs are an infringement of the rights belonging to individuals, considered as individuals; and are thereupon frequently termed civil injuries. Blackstone.

9. Civilised; not barbarous.

England was very rude and barbarous; for it is but even the other day since England grew civil.
Spenser on Ireland.

Ho! who's here?
If any thing that's civil, speak. Shakps. Cymb.

Kent, in the commentaries Cæsar writ,
Is term'd the civil'st place in all this isle.
Shakspeare, Hen. VI. P. II.

10. Complaisant; civilised; gentle; well bred; elegant of manners; not rude; not brutal; not coarse.

I heard a mermaid on a dolphin's back,
Uttering such dulcet and harmonious breath,
That the rude sea grew civil at her song. Shaksp.

He was civil and well natured, never refusing to teach another. Dryden, Dufresnoy.

And fall these sayings from that gentle tongue,
Where civil speech and soft persuasion hung?
Prior.

11. Grave; sober; not gay, or shewy.

A civil habit
Oft covers a good man.
Beaum. and Fl. Beggar's Bush.

Thus night oft see me in thy pale career,
'Till civil suited morn appear. Milton, Il Pens.

12. Relating to the ancient consular, or imperial government; as, civil law.

No woman had it, but a civil doctor. Shaksp.

CIVI'LIAN.† n. s. [civilis, Lat.]

1. One that professes the knowledge of the old Roman law, and of general equity.

The professors of that law, called civilians, because the civil law is their guide, should not be discountenanced nor discouraged.
Bacon, Advice to Villiers.

A depending kingdom is a term of art, unknown to all ancient civilians, and writers upon government. Swift.

2. A student in civil law at the university.

He [Shenstone] kept his name in the college books, and changed his commoner's gown for that of a civilian. Graves, Recol. of Shenstone, p. 36.

CIVILISA'TION.† n. s. [from civilize.]

1. A law, act of justice, or judgement, which renders a criminal process civil; which is performed by turning an information into an inquest, or the contrary. Harris.

2. The act of civilizing barbarous people.

It had the most salutary consequences in assisting the general growth of refinement and the progression of civilization. Warton.

America was not peopled by any nation of the ancient continent, which had made considerable progress in civilization. Robertson.

3. The state of being civilized or reclaimed from barbarism.

CI'VILIST.* n. s. [from civil.] A civilian.

If as a religionist he entered into society, it was for a reason different from that for which, as a civilist, he invented a commonwealth.
Warburton, All. of Ch. and State, (1st edit.) p. 34.

CIVI'LITY.† n. s. [from civil.]

1. Freedom from barbarity; the state of being civilized.

The English were at first as stout and warlike a people as ever the Irish: and yet are now brought unto that civility, that no nation excelleth them in all goodly conversation, and all the studies of knowledge and humanity. Spenser on Ireland.

Divers great monarchies have risen from barbarism to civility, and fallen again to ruin.
Davies on Ireland.

Wheresoe'er her conquering eagles fled,
Arts, learning, and civility were spread.
Denham, Poems.

2. Politeness; complaisance; elegance of behaviour.

Art thou thus bolden'd, man, by thy distress;
Or else a rude despiser of good manners,
That in civility thou seem'st so empty? Shaksp.

He, by his great civility and affability, wrought very much upon the people. Clarendon, b. viii.

I should be kept from a publication, did not what your civility calls a request, your greatness, command. South.

We, in point of civility, yield to others, in our own houses. Swift.

3. Rule of decency; practice of politeness.

Love taught him shame; and shame, with love at strife,
Soon taught the sweet civilities of life. Dryden.

4. Partaking of the nature of a civilized state; growing out of the civil law.

As matrimony hath something in it of nature, something of civility, something of divinity, as instituted by God and by Him to be regulated; so sure this last interest ought to oversway the other two. Bp. Hall, Cases of Consc. iii. 10.

If there were nothing in marriage but meer civility, the magistrate might be meet to be employed in this service. Ibid. iv. 8.

To CI'VILIZE.† v. a. [old Fr. civilizer.] To reclaim from savageness and brutality; to instruct in the arts of regular life.

We send the graces and the muses forth,
To civilize and to instruct the North. Waller.

Musæus first, then Orpheus civilize
Mankind, and give the world their deities. Denham.

Amongst those who are accounted the civilized part of mankind, this original law of nature still takes place. Locke.

Osiris, or Bacchus, is reported to have civilized the Indians, and reigned amongst them fifty-two years. Arbuthnot on Coins.

CI'VILIZER. n. s. [from civilize.] One that reclaims others from a wild and savage life; he that teaches the rules and customs of civility.

The civilizers! — the disturbers, say; —
The robbers, the corrupters of mankind! Philips, Briton.

CI'VILLY. adv. [from civil.]

1. In a manner relating to government, or to the rights or character of a member of a community; not naturally.

Men that are civil lead their lives after one common law; for that a multitude should, without harmony, concur in the doing of one thing; for this is civilly to live; or should manage community of life, is not possible. Hooker, b. i.

2. Not criminally.

That accusation, which is publick, is either civilly commenced for the private satisfaction of the party injured; or else criminally, that is, for some publick punishment. Ayliffe.

3. Politely; complaisantly; gently; without rudeness; without brutality.

I will deal civilly with his poems: nothing ill is to be spoken of the dead. Dryden, Pref. to his Fables.

I would have had Almeria and Osmyn parted civilly; as if it was not proper for lovers to do so. Collier of the Stage.

He thought them folks that lost their way,
And ask'd them civilly to stay. Prior.

4. Without gay or gaudy colours.

The chambers were handsome and cheerfull, and furnished civilly. Bacon, New Atlantis.

CI'ZAR.* n. s. [Dr. Johnson observes under scissor, that the word is also variously written cisars, cizars, and scissars; from the Fr. ciseaux. The spelling of cizars, cissers, and ciselets, for the little pair of sheers, or blades, is that of our old lexicography. Huloet and Sherwood.]

An operation of art, produced by a pair of cizars. Swift, Tale of a Tub, &c. edit. 1705. p. 293.

To CI'ZAR.* v. a. [from the noun.] To clip; to trim with a pair of scissars.

Let me know,
Why mine own barber is unblest; with him
My poor chin too; for 'tis not cizard just
To such a favourite's glass. Beaum. and Fl. Two Nob. Kinsm.

CIZE. n. s. [perhaps from incisa, Lat. shaped or cut to a certain magnitude.] The quantity of any thing with regard to its external form; often written size.

If no motion can alter bodies, that is, reduce them to some other cize or figure, then there is none of itself to give them the cize and figure which they have. Grew, Cosmol.

CLACK.† n. s. [klatschen, Germ. to rattle; to make a noise, Dr. Johnson says; but we may refer, more plausibly, to the old Fr. clac, clacquet; or rather to the Teut. klack, a shrill noise. Mr. Tooke pronounces it the past participle of the verb click. But see To CLACK.]

1. Any thing that makes a lasting and importunate noise; generally used, in contempt, for the tongue.

But still his tongue ran on,
And with its everlasting clack,
Set all men's ears upon the rack. Hudibras.

Can any sober person think it reasonable, that the publick devotions of a whole congregation should be under the conduct and at the mercy, of a pert, empty, conceited holderforth, whose chief (if not sole) intent is to vaunt his spiritual clack? South, Serm. ii. 117.

Fancy flows in, and muse flies high;
He knows not when my clack will lie. Prior.

2. The CLACK of a Mill. A bell that rings when more corn is required to be put in; or, that which strikes the hopper, and promotes the running of the corn.

Says John, just at the hopper will I stand,
And mark the clack how justly it will sound. Betterton.

To CLACK.† v. n. [old Fr. claquer, claqueter, cliquer; but some refer it to the Gr. κλάγγω, whence the Lat. clangicare; and some to the old Goth. klaka, to make a noise like birds.]

1. To make a chinking noise.
2. To let the tongue run.

To CLACK.† v. a. [qui clachent lains, who clack wool. Kelham, Norm. Dict.] As to clack wool, is to cut off the sheep's mark, which makes it to weigh less, and so yield the less custom to the king. Cowel.

CLACK-DISH.* n. s. [from clack and dish.] A beggar's dish; a wooden dish with a movable cover, which they clacked, to excite the notice of passengers, or to signify the dish was empty. A custom in some parts of Oxfordshire is not yet extinct for the poor people and children, about Easter, to go a clacking, that is, with wooden bowls, and the like, to make a noise at the houses of their betters, in order to obtain the accustomed donations of money or meat. But see CLAP-DISH.

His use was, to put a ducat in her clack-dish. Shakspeare, Meas. for Meas.

CLA'CKER.* n. s. The same as the clack of a mill.

This they find by the noise of those boat mills; — their clackers beat much slower at those times than else. Blount's Voyage into the Levant, (1650,) p. 18.

CLA'CKING.* n. s. [from the verb.] Prating.

Any thing rather than to weary the world with his foolish clacking. Bp. Hall, Hon. of the Marr. Clergy, § 19.

CLAD.† part. pret. [This participle, which is now referred to clothe, seems originally to have belonged to cloden, or some such word, like kleeden, Dutch, Dr. Johnson says. But clad is the Sax. claðed, geclaðed, clothed.] Clothed; invested; garbed.

So oft in feasts with costly changes clad,
To crammed maws a spratt new stomach brings. Sidney.

He had clad himself with a new garment. 1 Kings, xi. 29.

Beyond
The flowery dale of Sibma, clad with with vine. Milton, P. L.

Their prayers clad
With incense, where the golden altar fum'd
By their great intercessor. Milton, P. L.

But virtue too, as well as vice, is clad
In flesh and blood. Waller.

To her the weeping heavens become serene;
For her the ground is clad in cheerful green. Dryden.

The courtiers were all most magnificently clad. Swift.

To CLAIM.† v. a. [clamer, Fr.]

1. To demand of right; to require authoritatively; not to beg or accept as favour, but to exact as due.

If only one man hath a divine right to obedience, nobody can claim that obedience but he that can shew his right. Locke.

We must know how the first ruler, from whom any one claims, came by his authority, before we can know who has a right to succeed him in it. Locke.

Poets have undoubted right to claim
If not the greatest, the most lasting name. Congreve.

2. To call; to name. Written by Spenser, who also uses the substantive in a similar sense, clame. [old Fr. clamer, nommer, appeller.]

Nor all, that else through all the world is named
To all the heathen gods, might like to this be clamed. Spenser, F. Q. iv. x. 30.

CLAIM.† n. s. [from the verb.]

1. A demand of any thing, as due.

You, in the right of lady Blanch your wife,
May then make all the claim that Arthur did. Shakspeare.

Forsworn thyself! The traitor's odious name
I first return, and then disprove thy claim. Dryden.

Will he not, therefore, of the two evils chuse the least, by submitting to a master, who hath no immediate claim upon him, rather than to another, who hath already revived several claims upon him. Swift.

2. A title to any privilege or possession in the hands of another.

Either there must have been but one sovereign over them all, or else every father of a family hath been as good a prince, and had as good a claim to royalty as these. Locke.

3. In law.

A demand of any thing that is in the possession of another, or at the least out of his own: as claim by charter, claim by descent. Cowel.

4. The phrases are commonly to make claim, or to lay claim.

The king of Prussia lays in his claim for Neuf-Châtel, as he did for the principality of Orange. Addison on Italy.

If God, by positive grant, gave dominion to any man, primogeniture can lay no claim to it, unless God ordained. Locke.

5. A call. Written by Spenser clame.

I knockt, but no man answred me by name;
I cald, but no man answred to my clame. Spenser, F. Q. iv. x. 11.

CLA'IMABLE.† adj. [old Fr. clamable.] That may be demanded as due; challengeable. Cotgrave.

CLA'IMANT.† n. s. [old Fr. clamant.] One that demands any thing as unjustly detained by another.

Such claimants might have the true right, but yet, by the death of witnesses or other defect of evidence, be unable to prove it to a jury.

Blackstone.

CLA'IMER.† n. s. [from claim.] He that makes a demand; he that requires any thing, as unjustly with-held from him.

His funeral was fain to be deferred till an agreement was made, and the value of the ground paid to the claimer.

Temple, Introduct. to Hist. of Eng. p. 296.

CLAIR-OBSCURE. n. s. See CLARE-OBSCURE.

CLA'MANT.* adj. [from clamo, Lat. to cry. A word perhaps coined by Thomson.] Crying; beseeching earnestly.

Instant o'er his shivering thought
Comes winter unprovided, and a train
Of clamant children dear.

Thomson, Autumn, ver. 349.

To CLAM.† v. a. [in some provinces, to cleam, from clæmian, Sax. to glew together. Written also sometimes clem. Germ. klemmen, to tie. Somner gives the Sax. clam, a band or tie. Old Goth. kleima, to besmear. Clammed up is, in some of our provinces, clogged or choaked up. To clem, though sometimes written and pronounced clam, is to hunger-starve. See To CLEM.] To clog with any glutinous matter.

A swarm of wasps got into a honey-pot, and there they cloyed and clammed themselves, 'till there was no getting out again. L'Estrange.

The sprigs were all dawbed with lime, and the birds clammed and taken. L'Estrange.

To CLAM.* v. n. To be moist.

A chilling sweat, a damp of jealousy,
Hangs on my brows, and clams upon my limbs.

Dryden, Amphitryon.

To CLAM.* v. n. [perhaps from clamour. See To CLAMOUR.] A term in ringing, which Dr. Johnson, in his remarks on Shakspeare, confounds with buffeting; for, to clam a bell, he says, is to cover the clapper with felt, which drowns the blow and hinders the sound. This is, however, to buffet. See To BUFFET. To clam, is to unite certain sounds in the peal. See To CLAMOUR.

Clamming is when each concord strikes together, which being done true, the eight will strike but as four bells, and make a melodious harmony.

School of Recreation, 1684.

To CLAM, or CLEM.* To starve. See To CLEM.

To CLA'MBER. v. n. [probably corrupted from climb; as climber, clamber.] To climb with difficulty; as with both hands and feet.

The kitchen malkin pins
Her richest lockram 'bout her reechy neck,
Clamb'ring the walls to eye him. Shakspeare.

When you hear the drum,
Clamber not you up to the casements then.

Shakspeare.

The men there do not without some difficulty clamber up the acclivities, dragging their kine with them. Ray, on the Creation.

They were forced to clamber over so many rocks, and to tread upon the brink of so many precipices, that they were very often in danger of their lives.

Addison, Freeholder.

CLA'MMINESS. n. s. [from clammy.] Vicosity; viscidity; tenacity; ropiness.

A greasy pipkin will spoil the clamminess of the glew. Moxon.

CLA'MMY.† adj. [Dutch klam, clammy; Su. klemmig.] Viscous; glutinous; tenacious; adhesive; ropy.

Bodies clammy and cleaving, have an appetite, at once, to follow another body, and to hold to themselves. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

Neither the brain nor spirits can conserve motion; the former is of such a clammy consistence, it can no more retain it than a quagmire.

Glanville, Scepsis.

Aghast he wak'd, and, starting from his bed,
Cold sweats, in clammy drops, his limbs o'erspread.

Dryden.

Joyful thou'lt see
The clammy surface all o'er strown with tribes
Of greedy insects. Philips.

There is an unctuous clammy vapour that arises from the stum of grapes, when they lie mashed together in the vat, which puts out a light, when dipped into it. Addison on Italy.

The continuance of the fever, clammy sweats, paleness, and at last a total cessation of pain, are signs of a gangrene and approaching death.

Arbuthnot on Diet.

CLA'MOROUS.† adj. [old Fr. clamoreux.] Vociferous; noisy; turbulent; loud.

It is no sufficient argument to say, that, in urging these ceremonies, none are so clamorous as Papists, and they whom Papists suborn.

Hooker, iv. § 9.

He kiss'd her lips
With such a clamorous smack, that at the parting
All the church echo'd. Shakspeare.

At my birth
The goats ran from the mountains, and the herds
Were strangely clam'rous in the frighted fields.

Shakspeare.

With the clam'rous report of war,
Thus will I drown your exclamations. Shakspeare.

Then various elements against thee join'd
In one more various animal combin'd,
And fram'd the clam'rous race of busy human kind.

Pope.

A pamphlet that will settle the wavering, instruct the ignorant, and inflame the clamorous.

Swift.

CLA'MOROUSLY.* adv. [from clamorous.] In a violent or noisy manner.

Disturbances and sad rencounters in it do clamorously tell us, we come not into the world to run a race of delight. Brown, Chr. Mor. ii. 23.

Where a jest, a grin, or a laugh, will carry it off, they are unmerciful and triumph clamorously.

Leslie, Short Meth. with Deists, Pref.

CLA'MOUR.† n. s. [old Fr. clamour, clameour, clameur; Lat. clamor.]

1. Outcry; noise; exclamation; vociferation.

Revoke thy doom,
Or whilst I can vent clamour from my throat,
I'll tell thee, thou do'st evil. Shakspeare.

The people grew then exorbitant in their clamours for justice. King Charles.

The maid
Shall weep the fury of my love decay'd;
And weeping follow me, as thou do'st now,
With idle clamours of a broken vow Prior.

2. It is used sometimes, but less fitly, of inanimate things.

Here the loud Arno's boist'rous clamours cease,
That with submissive murmurs glides in peace.

Addison.

To CLA'MOUR. v. n. [from the noun.] To make outcries; to exclaim; to vociferate; to roar in turbulence.

The obscure bird clamour'd the live-long night.

Shakspeare.

To CLA'MOUR.* v. a. [The following example from Bacon is placed by Dr. Johnson under the verb neuter; under which also he introduces, from Shakspeare, "Clamour your tongues and not a word more," as seeming to mean actively, to stop from noise; which is a meaning that has been justly disputed; and the passage is yet left open to conjecture.] To stun or overpower with noise.

Let them not come in multitudes, or in a tribunitious manner; for that is to clamour counsels, not to inform them. Bacon, Essays.

To CLA'MOUR *bells. A term in ringing, according to Warburton, which other commentators on Shakspeare imagine to be merely his own opinion; which, however, is right, as Archdeacon Nares has observed in his Glossary, though wrong in the explanation, as in the words which I have cited for the example. To clamour is much the same as to clam, that is, when the bells are pulled off all at once so as to unite in a general sound. See Nares's Gloss. in V. To CLAMOUR.

When bells are at the height, in order to cease them, the repetition of the strokes becomes much quicker than before; this is called clamouring them. Warburton.

CLA'MOURER.* n. s. [from clamour.] One who makes an outcry or clamour.

These clamourers, who make the greatest cry, do not yield the fairest fleece.

Bp. Gander's Hieraspistes, 1653. p. 468.

The non-residence therefore of the minister, or even his neglects of duty, are a mere pretence set up against paying tithes; and I am afraid that if he would graciously remit his dues, too many of these clamourers would readily dispense with his residence. Abp. Hort's Charge.

CLAMP. n. s. [clamp, French.]

1. A piece of wood joined to another as an addition of strength.
2. A quantity of bricks.

To burn a clamp of brick of sixteen thousand, they allow seven tons of coals.

Mortimer, Husbandry.

To CLAMP. v. a. [from the noun.]

When a piece of board is fitted with the grain to the end of another piece of board cross the grain, the first board is clamped. Thus the ends of tables are commonly clamped to preserve them from warping. Moxon's Mech. Exercises.

To CLAMP.* v. n. [klampig, Swed. klompen, Dutch.] To tread heavily. Craven Dialect, and Brockett's Northern Words.

CLAN.† n. s. [probably of Scottish original; klann, in the Highlands, signifies children. So far Dr. Johnson. Ir. clann. Mr. Chalmers observes, that it is the general denomination among the Irish, and Scoto-Irish Celts, for the numerous tribes, into which they were divided.]

1. A family; a race.

They around the flag
Of each his faction, in their several clans,
Swarm populous, unnumbered. Milton, P. L.

Milton was the poetical son of Spenser, and Mr. Waller of Fairfax; for we have our lineal descents and clans as well as other families. Dryden.

2. A body or sect of persons, in a sense of contempt.

Partridge and the rest of his clan may hoot me for a cheat, if I fail in any single particular. Swift.

CLA'NCULAR.† adj. [clancularius, Lat. Considered as a new and uncouth word by Heylin in 1656; though clancularly is in the edition of Bullokar's Expositor, published in that same year.] Clandestine; secret; private; concealed; obscure; hidden.

Let us withdraw all supplies from our lusts, and not by any secret reserved affection give them clancular aids to maintain their rebellion.

Decay of Piety.

CLA'NCULARLY.* adv. [from clancular.] Closely; covertly; privately. Bullokar.

Since they were members of the synod, they would do nothing clancularly without the consent and privity of the whole company.

Hales, Let. p. 20.

Judgements should not be administered clancularly, in dark corners, but in open court.

Barrow, Serm. ii. xx.

Yet all this while it was a marriage clancularly.

Bernard's Life of Heylin, p. 18.

CLANDE'STINE.† adj. [old Fr. clandestin, Lat. clandestinus. The accent, in modern times, is often placed on the first syllable. This adjective is in Cockeram's Vocabulary, and defined close, secret.] Secret; hidden; private; in an ill sense.

It is the worst clandestine marriage, when God is not invited to it.

Fuller's Holy State, &c. 1648, p. 207.

Their marriage was huddled up after a very clandestine manner.

Bp. Stillingfleet, Miscell. Speech in 1682, p. 90.

Tho' nitrous tempests, and clandestine death,
Fill'd the deep caves, and num'rous vaults beneath.

Blackmore.

CLANDE'STINELY. adv. [from clandestine.] Secretly; privately; in private; in secret.

There have been two printed papers clandestinely spread about, whereof no man is able to trace the original. Swift.

CLANDE'STINENESS.* n. s. [from clandestine.] An act of privacy or secrecy.

CLANDESTI'NITY.* n. s. [from clandestine.] An act of privacy or secrecy.

Clandestinity and disparity do not void a marriage, but only the proof more difficult.

Bp. Stillingfleet, Miscell. Speech in 1682, p. 87.

CLANG.† n. s. [klang, Germ. clangor, Lat. κλάγγη, Gr.] A sharp, shrill noise.

With such a horrid clang
As on mount Sinai rang,
While the red fire and smould'ring clouds out brake. Milton, Ode.

An island, salt and bare,
The haunt of seals and orcs, and sea-mews clang.

Milton, P. L.

What clangs were heard in German skies afar,
Of arms and armies rushing to the war! Dryden.

Guns and trumpets clang, and solemn sound
Of drums, o'ercame their groans. Philips.

To CLANG. v. n. [clango, Lat.] To clatter; to make a loud shrill noise.

Have I not in a pitched battle heard
Loud 'larums, neighing steeds, and trumpets clang? Shakspeare.

The Lybians clad in armour, lead
The dance; and clanging swords and shields they beat. Prior.

To CLANG. v. a. To strike together with a noise.

The fierce Curetes trod tumultuous
Their mystick dance, and clang'd their sounding arms;
Industrious with the warlike din to quell
Thy infant cries. Prior.

CLA'NGOUR.† n. s. [old Fr. clangueur, Lat. clangor.] A loud shrill sound.

In death he cried,
Like to a dismal clangour heard from far,
Warwick, revenge my death. Shakspeare.

Their ears were full of clangour, their hearts of horror. Junius, Sin Stigmatized, (1639,) p. 265.

With joy they view the waving ensigns fly,
And hear the trumpet's clangour pierce the sky.

Dryden.

CLA'NGOUS.† adj. [old Fr. clangueux.] Making a clang.

We do not observe the cranes, and birds of long necks, have any musical, but harsh and clangous throats. Brown.

CLANK. n. s. [from clang.] A loud, shrill, sharp noise, made by the collision of hard and sonorous bodies.

They were joined by the melodious clank of marrow-bone and clever. Spectator, No. 617.

CLA'NSHIP.* n. s. [from clan.] Association of persons or families.

The mountains on the south are well planted, and finally cultivated, high up, interspersed with the habitations of the highlanders, not singly, but in small groupes, as if they loved society or clanship. Penant, Tour in Scotland.

To CLAP.† v. a. [Icel. and Goth. klappa; Sax. clappan; Dutch, klappen, cloppen; Dan. klappe.]

1. To strike together with a quick motion, so as to make a noise by the collision.

Following the fliers at the very heels,
With them he enters; who, upon the sudden,
Clapt to their gates. Shakspeare.

Men shall clap their hands at him, and shall hiss him out of his place. Job, xxvii. 23.

Have you never seen a citizen, in a cold morning, clapping his sides, and walking before his shop? Dryden, Span. Fr.

He crowing clapp'd his wings, th' appointed call
To chuck his wives together in the hall.

Dryden, Fables.

Each poet of the air her glory sings,
And round him the pleas'd audience clap their wings. Dryden.

He had just time to get in and clap to the door, to avoid the blow. Locke on Education.

In flowery wreathes the royal virgin drest
His bending horns, and kindly clapt his breast.

Addison.

Glad of a quarrel, straight I clap the door,
Sir, let me see your works and you no more. Pope.

Smooth temptations, like the sun, make a maiden lay by her veil and robe: which persecution, like the northern wind, made her hold fast, and clap close about her. Bp. Taylor.

If a man be highly commended, we think him sufficiently lessened, if we clap sin, or folly, or infirmity into his account.

Bp. Taylor, Rule of Living Holy.

Razor-makers generally clap a small bar of Venice steel between two small bars of Flemish steel.

Moxon, Mech. Exer.

The man clapt his fingers one day to his mouth, and blew upon them. L'Estrange.

His shield thrown by, to mitigate the smart,
He clapp'd his hand upon the wounded part.

Dryden.

If you leave some space empty for the air, then clap your hand upon the mouth of the vessel, and the fishes will contend to get uppermost in the water. Ray on the Creation.

It would be as absurd as to say, he clapp'd spurs to his horse at St. James's, and galloped away to the Hague. Addison.

By having their minds yet in their perfect freedom and indifferency, they pursue truth the better, having no bias yet clapped on to mislead them.

Locke.

I have observed a certain chearfulness in as bad a system of features as ever was clapped together, which hath appeared lovely.

Addison, Spect. No. 86.

Let all her ways be unconfin'd,
And clap your padlock on her mind. Prior.

Socrates or Alexander might have a fool's coat clapt upon them, and perhaps neither wisdom nor majesty would secure them from a sneer.

Watts on the Mind.

3. To do any thing with a sudden hasty motion, or unexpectedly.

We were dead asleep,
And, how we know not, all clapt under hatches.

Shakspeare.

He was no sooner entered into the town, but a scambling soldier clapt hold of his bridle, which he thought was in a begging or in a drunken fashion.

Wotton's Life of Buckingham.

So much from the rest of his countrymen, and indeed from his whole species, that his friends would have clapped him into bedlam, and have begged his estate. Spectator.

Have you observ'd a sitting hare,
List'ning and fearful of the storm
Of horns and hounds, clap back her ear? Prior.

We will take our remedy at law, and clap an action upon you for old debts.

Arbuthnot, Hist. of John Bull.

4. To celebrate or praise by clapping the hands; to applaud.

I have often heard the stationer wishing for those hands to take off his melancholy bargain, which clapped its performance on the stage.

Dedication to Dryden's Spanish Friar.

5. To infect with a venereal poison. [See the noun.]

If the patient hath been clapt, it will be the more difficult to cure him the second time, and worse the third. Wiseman.

Let men and manners every dish adapt;
Who'd force his pepper where his guests are clapt?

King.

6. To CLAP hands. To plight mutual troth, by clapping the hands together.

Give me your answer; i'faith do; and so clap hands, and a bargain. Shakspeare, K. Hen. V.

There these young lovers shall clap hands together. Middleton, No Wit like a Woman's.

7. To CLAP up. To complete suddenly, without much precaution.

No longer than we well could wash our hands,
To clap this royal bargain up of peace. Shaks.

Was ever match clapt up so suddenly? Shaks.

A peace may be clapped up with that suddenness, that the forces which are now in motion, may unexpectedly fall upon his skirts.

Howell, Vocal Forest.

8. To CLAP up. To imprison with little formality or delay.

Being presented to the emperor for his admirable beauty, he was known, and the prince clapt him up as his inveigler. Sandys.

To CLAP.† v. n.

1. To move nimbly with a noise.

Every door flew open
T' admit my entrance; and then clapt behind me,
To bar my going back. Dryden.

A whirlwind rose, that, with a violent blast,
Shook all the dome: the doors around me clapt.

Dryden.

2. Originally, to make a noise, as, to knock.

This sompnour clappeth at the widow's gate;
Come out he sayd, thou olde very trate:—
Who clappeth, said this wife.

Chaucer, Frere's Tale.

3. To enter with alacrity and briskness upon any thing.

Come, a song. ——
— Shall we clap into't roundly, without saying we are hoarse? Shakspeare.

4. To strike the hands together in applause.

All the best men are ours; for 'tis ill hap
If they hold, when their ladies bid 'em clap.
Shakspeare.

CLAP.† n. s. [Dutch. klap; Germ. klappe.]

1. A loud noise made by sudden collision.

Give the door such a clap as you go out, as will shake the whole room, and make every thing rattle in it. Swift.

2. A sudden or unexpected act or motion.

It is monstrous to me, that the south-sea should pay half their debts at one clap. Swift, Letters.

3. An explosion of thunder.

There shall be horrible claps of thunder, and flashes of lightning, voices and earthquakes.
Hakewill on Providence.

The clap is past, and now the skies are clear.
Dryden, Juv.

4. An act of applause.

The actors, in the midst of an innocent old play, are often startled in the midst of unexpected claps or hisses. Addison.

5. A stroke; a blow. [klap, Dutch.] In colloquial language, "a clap on the ear, a clap on the head."

6. A sudden or unexpected misfortune. Obsolete.

Joyne us to mourn with wailfull plaints the deadly wound,
Which fatall clap hath made.
Bryskett, Mourning Muse of Thestylis.

7. A venereal infection [from clapoir, Fr.]

Time, that at last matures a clap to pox. Pope.

8. [With falconers.] The nether part of the beak of a hawk.

CLAP-DISH.* n. s. A wooden bowl or dish, formerly carried by beggars in general, and originally by lepers. See CLACK-DISH, and CLAPPER.

Thou art the ugliest creature; and when trimm'd up
To the height, as thou imagin'st, in mine eyes,
A leper with a clap-dish, (to give notice
He is infectious,) in respect of thee,
Appears a young Adonis.
Massinger, Parl. of Love, edit. Gifford.

I, that was wont so many to command,
Worse now than with a clap-dish in my hand.
Drayton's Epist. Et. Cobham to D. Humphry.

He claps his dish at a wrong man's door.
Ray's Proverbs.

CLA'PPER.† n. s. [Sax. clipup, Germ. klapper; old Almannick, clepel, the tongue of a bell.]

1. One who claps with his hands; an applauder.

2. The tongue of a bell.

He hath a heart as sound as a bell, and his tongue is the clapper; for what his heart thinks his tongue speaks. Shakspeare.

I saw a young lady fall down the other day, and she much resembled an overturned bell without a clapper. Addison.

3. The CLA'PPER of a Mill. A piece of wood shaking the hopper.

4. The cover of the cup called the clap-dish, which the diseased mendicant opened and shut with a loud clap to attract attention.

Thus shalt thou go begging fro hous to hous,
With cup and clapper like a Lazarous.
Henryson, Test. of Creseide.

CLA'PPERS.* n. s. pl. [old Fr. clapier, low Lat. claperia.] Places for rabbits to burrow in, either within an inclosure, or in an open warren. Cotgrave calls them rabbits' nests. Huloet describes them as places also in which birds and fish are kept; and Barret expressly terms a clapper a dovecote.

Connis there were also playing,
That comin out of their clapers.
Chaucer, Rom. R. 1405.

To CLA'PPERCLAW. v. a. [from clap and claw.] To tongue-beat; to scold.

They are clapperclawing one another, I'll look on. Shakspeare.

They've always been at daggers-drawing,
And one another clapperclawing. Hudibras.

CLA'RENCEUX, or CLA'RENCIEUX. n. s. The second king at arms: so named from the dutchy of Clarence.

CLARE-OBSCURE. n. s. [from clarus, bright, and obscurus, Lat.] Light and shade in painting.

As masters in the clare-obscure,
With various light your eyes allure;
A flaming yellow here they spread,
Draw off in blue, or change in red;
Yet from these colours, oddly mix'd,
Your sight upon the whole is fix'd. Prior.

CLA'RET. n. s. [clairet, Fr.] French wine, of a clear pale-red colour.

Red and white wine are in a trice confounded into claret. Boyle.

The claret smooth, red as the lips we press
In sparkling fancy, while we drain the bowl.
Thomson.

CLA'RICHORD.† n. s. [from clarus and chorda, Latin.] A musical instrument in form of a spinette, but more ancient. It has forty-nine or fifty keys, and seventy strings. Chambers.

The claricord hath a tunely kynde,
As the wyre is wrested high and low.
Skelton, Poems, p. 291.

CLARIFICA'TION. n. s. [from clarify.] The act of making any thing clear from impurities.

Liquors are, many of them, at the first, thick and troubled; as muste, and wort: to know the means of accelerating clarification, we must know the causes of clarification. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

To CLA'RIFY.† v. a. [clarifier, French. But see CLEAR.]

1. To purify or clear any liquour; to separate from feculences or impurities.

The apothecaries clarify their syrups by whites of eggs, beaten with the juices which they would clarify; which whites of eggs gather all the dregs and grosser parts of the juice to them; and after, the syrup being set on the fire, the whites of eggs themselves harden, and are taken forth.
Bacon, Nat. Hist.

They cast therein three or four bruised almonds; they, in less than an hour, clarify it like crystal; which effect they have upon no other water. Blount, Voyage into the Levant, p. 105.

Such [places,] as is the general site of Bohemia, the north-wind clarifies.
Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 259.

2. To brighten; to illuminate. This sense is rare, Dr. Johnson says; and he cites the authority only of South. This meaning, however, seems to have been not uncommon. Formerly the word signified to glorify or make famous: "Fadir, the hour cometh, clarifie thy sonne." Wicliffe, St. John, xvii.

Many boys are muddy-headed, till they be clarified with age; and such afterwards prove the best. Fuller's Holy State, p. 100.

The will was then ductile and pliant to all the motions of right reason: it met the dictates of a clarified understanding half way. South, Sermons.

The Christian religion is the only means that God has sanctified, to set fallen man upon his legs again, to clarify his reason, and to rectify his will. South, Sermons.

Nouns for brevity are sometimes verbalized; as, to complete, to contrary, to experience; sometimes by fy affixed, as, to make clear, to clarify, to beautify.
Instruct. for Oratory, (Ox. 1682,) p. 32.

Our affection being perfectly subdued to the reason of our minds, and drained and clarified from all its gross and carnal love.
Scott, Serm. xxi.

To CLARIFY. v. n. To clear up, to grow bright.

Whosoever hath his mind fraught with many thoughts, his wits and understanding do clarify and break up in the discoursing with another; he marshalleth his thoughts more orderly, he seeth how they look when they are turned into words.
Bacon, Essays.

CLA'RINET.* n. s. [Fr. clarinette.] A kind of hautboy, but of a shriller tone.

CLA'RION.† n. s. [old Fr. claron; Span. clarin; low Lat. clario, from clarus, loud.] A trumpet; a wind instrument of war.

And after, to his palace he them brings,
With shaums, and trumpets, and with clarions sweet;
And all the way the joyous people sings.
Spenser, F. Q.

Then strait commands, that at the warlike sound
Of trumpets loud, and clarions, be uprear'd
The mighty standard. Milton, P. L.

Let fuller notes th' applauding world amaze,
And the loud clarion labour in your praise. Pope.

CLA'RITUDE.* n. s. [Lat. claritudo.] Splendour; any thing bright. Not in use.

Amongst those claritudes which gild the skies.
Beaumont's Psyche, vii. 57.

CLA'RITY.† n. s. [clarté, and clerté, old French; claritas, Latin. Written originally cleerte. "The holy cite Jerusalem —having the cleerte of God, and the light of it lyke a precious stoon, &c." Wicliffe, Apoc. xxi.] Brightness; splendour.

A light by abundant clarity invisible; an understanding which itself can only comprehend.
Sir Walter Ralegh.

Man was not only deceivable in his integrity, but the angels of light in all their clarity.
Brown, Vulg. Err.

To CLART.* v. a. [Su.-Goth. lort, Craven Dial.] To daub; to smear; to spread. A word found in our Westmoreland, Northumberland, and Yorkshire dialects; and formerly perhaps was in general use.

There must be a specifick essence, which is the root of those powers, properties, or operations, from whence we conclude distinct species of things: for 'tis too coarse and slovenly to conceit that these are clarted on them; but the specifick powers arise immediately and inseparably from the nature of the thing; else why might they not be other powers as well as these. Annotations upon Bp. Rust's Disc. of Truth, 1683, p. 235.

Three essences clarted upon some fourth essence, or glewed together one to another.
Ibid. p. 237.

CLA'RTY.* adj. [from the verb.] Wet; slippery; dirty; miry. North.
Grose, and Brockett.

CLA'RY. n. s. [herminium, Lat.] An herb.

Plants that have circled leaves do all abound with moisture. The weakest kind of curling is roughness: as in clary and burr.
Bacon, Nat. Hist.

To CLA'RY.* v. n. [from the Lat. clarus, shrill.] To make a loud or shrill noise.
The crane that goeth before — if aught be to be avoyded, gives warning thereof by clarying.
A. Golding's Tr. of Solinus, (1587,) ch. 14.

To CLASH.† v. n. [kletsen, Dut. to make a noise; or rather from the Germ. klatschen.]

1. To make a noise by mutual collision; to strike one against another.
Three times, as of the clashing sound
Of arms, we heard. Denham.
Those few that should happen to clash, might rebound after the collision. Bentley.
How many candles may send out their light, without clashing upon one another; which argues the smallness of the parts of light, and the largeness of the interstices between particles of air and other bodies. Cheyne, Phil. Princ.
2. To act with opposite power, or contrary direction.
Neither was there any queen-mother who might clash with his counsellors for authority.
Bacon, Hen. VII.
Those that are not convinced what help this is to magistracy, would find it, if they should chance to clash. South, Sermons.
3. To contradict; to oppose.
Wherever there are men, there will be clashing sometime or other; and a knock, or a contest, spoils all. L'Estrange.
The absurdity in this instance is obvious; and yet every time that clashing metaphors are put together, this fault is committed.
Spectator, No. 595.

To CLASH. v. a. To strike one thing against another, so as to produce a noise.
The nodding statue clash'd his arms,
And with a sullen sound and feeble cry,
Half sunk, and half pronounced the word of victory. Dryden.

CLASH.† n. s. [from the verb. Germ. also klatch.]

1. A noisy collision of two bodies.
I heard no words between them, but what their weapons spoke, clash and clatter.
Beaum. and Fl. Maid in the Mill.
The clash of arms and voice of men we hear.
Denham.
He nobly seiz'd thee in the dire alarms
Of war and slaughter and the clash of arms.
Pope.
2. Opposition; contradiction.
Then from the clashes between popes and kings,
Debate, like sparks from flint's collision, springs.
Denham.
In the very next line he reconciles the fathers and scripture, and shews there is no clash betwixt them. Atterbury.

CLA'SHING.* n. s. [from clash.] Opposition; enmity; contradiction.
Good Lord! what fiery clashings we have had lately for a cap and a surplice!
Howell, Lett. iv. 29.
Yet still the man should find a civil war within himself, a great scuffle and disturbance, his thoughts divided between contrary principles, the clashings of prudence and revenge.
South, Serm. viii. 185.

CLASP.† n. s. [chespe, Dutch, according to Dr. Johnson. Serenius refers to the old Goth. klypa, to bind closely; which may countenance a supposition that clasp may be a corruption of our word clip, to embrace.]

1. A hook to hold any thing close; as a book, or garment.
The scorpion's claws here grasp a wide extent,
And here the crabs in lesser clasps are bent.
Addison.
He took me aside, opening the clasps of the parchment cover. Arbuthnot and Pope.
2. An embrace, in contempt.
Your fair daughter,
Transported with no worse nor better guard,
But with a knave of hire, a gondalier,
To the gross clasps of a lascivious Moor. Shaks.

To CLASP. v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To shut with a clasp.
Sermons are the keys of the kingdom of heaven, and do open the scriptures; which being but read, remain, in comparison, still clasped.
Hooker, v. 22.
There Caxton slept, with Wynkin at his side,
One clasp'd in wood, and one in strong cow-hide.
Pope.
2. To catch and hold by twining.
Direct
The clasping ivy where to climb. Milton, P. L.
3. To hold with the hands extended; to inclose between the hands.
Occasion turneth the handle of the bottle first to be received, and after the belly, which is hard to clasp. Bacon, Ess.
4. To embrace.
Thou art a slave, whom fortune's tender arm
With favour never claspt, but bred a dog. Shaks.
Thy suppliant
I beg, and clasp thy knees. Milton, P. L.
He stoop'd below
The flying spear, and shunn'd the promis'd blow;
Then creeping, clasp'd the heroes knees, and pray'd. Dryden.
Now, now he clasps her to his panting breast;
Now he devours her with his eager eyes. Smith.
5. To inclose.
Boys, with women's voices,
Strive to speak big, and clasp their female joints,
In stiff unwieldy arms against thy crown. Shaks.

CLA'SPER. n. s. [from clasp.] The tendrils or threads of creeping plants, by which they cling to other things for support.
The tendrels or claspers of plants are given only to such species as have weak and infirm stalks.
Ray on the Creation.

CLA'SPKNIFE. n. s. [from clasp and knife.] A knife which folds into the handle.

CLASS.† n. s. [old Fr. classe, a rank, order, &c. Cotgrave; Lat. classis.]

1. A rank or order of persons.
Segrais has distinguished the readers of poetry, according to their capacity of judging, into three classes. Dryden.
2. An assembly of persons, within a certain division.
Assemblies are either classes or synods: classes are conferences of the fewest ministers of churches, standing near together, as for example of twelve.
Bp. Bancroft's Dangerous Positions, &c. iii. 13.
The kingdom of England, instead of so many dioceses, was now [during the great rebellion,] divided into a certain number of provinces, made up of representatives from the several classes within their respective boundaries. Every parish had a congregational or parochial presbytery for the affairs of its own circle; those parochial presbyteries were combined into classes, which chose representatives for the provincial assembly, as did the provincial for the national. Thus, the city of London being distributed into twelve classes, each class chose two ministers and four lay-elders, to represent them in a provincial assembly.
Warton, Notes on Milton's Poems.
3. A number of boys learning the same lesson at the school.
We shall be seized away from this lower class in the school of knowledge, and our conversation shall be with angels and illuminated spirits.
Watts on the Mind.
4. A set of beings or things; a number ranged in distribution, under some common denomination.
Among this herd of politicians, any one set make a very considerable class of men.
Addison, Freeholder.
Whate'er of mongrel, no one class admits
A wit with dunces, and a dunce with wits.
Pope, Dunciad.

To CLASS. v. a. [from the noun.] To range according to some stated method of distribution; to range according to different ranks.
I considered that by the classing and methodizing such passages, I might instruct the reader.
Arbuthnot on Coins.

CLA'SSICAL.† } adj. [old Fr. classique, Lat.
CLA'SSICK. } classicus.]

1. Relating to antique authors; relating to literature. Addison is supposed to be the first who thus applied the word, and was ridiculed for it.
Poetick fields encompass me around,
And still I seem to tread on classick ground.
Addison.
With them the genius of classick learning dwelleth, and from them it is derived.
Felton on the Classicks.
2. Of the first order or rank. This is the old meaning of the word; Cotgrave and Bullokar define it approved, orderly, in due or fit rank, authentical, chief. "Authors of best note, and generally applauded, are called classical." Bullok. ed. 1656. See the subst. CLASSICK.
May his just fame remain a known and classick history, describing him in his full pourtraieture, among the best of subjects, of friends, of scholars, and of men. Fell's Life of Hammond.
From this standard the value of the Roman weights and coins are deduced: in the settling of which I have followed Mr. Greaves, who may be justly reckoned a classical author on this subject.
Arbuthnot on Coins.
3. Relating to the order and rules of the presbyterian assemblies. See CLASS.
We perceive it [presbyterian government] aspiring to be a compulsive power upon all without exception in parochial, classical, and provincial hierarchies. Milton, Observ. Art. of Peace betw. E. of Orm. and Irish.
Surely when we put down bishops and put up presbyters, which the most of them have made use of to enrich and exalt themselves, and turn the first heel against their benefactors, we did not think, that one classick fraternity, so obscure and so remote, should involve us and all state-affairs within the censure and jurisdiction of Belfast, upon pretence of overseeing their own charge.
Milton, Observ. Art. of Peace betw. E. of Orm. and Irish.
Dare ye for this adjure the civil sword
To force our consciences that Christ set free,
And ride us with a classick hierarchy?
Milton on the New Forcers of Conscience.
After they have so long contended for their classical ordination, will they at length submit to any episcopal?
Dryden, Pref. to Hind and Panther.
Mr. Baxter takes great pains to unite the classical and congregational brethren, but claws off the episcopal party as a set of Cassandrian priests.
Bp. Nicholson to Mr. Yates, 1699.

CLA'SSICALLY.* adv. [from classical.] In a classical manner.

CLA'SSICK.† n. s. [classicus, Lat.] An author of the first rank: usually taken for ancient authors. They are called classicks, from the circumstance of the senators, in the comitia centuriata of the Romans, voting first; all other persons, who voted afterwards, being styled infra classem.

The classicks of an age that heard of none. Pope.

CLASSIFICA'TION.* n. s. [from classis and facio, Lat.] Ranging into classes and divisions.

In the classification of the citizens, the great legislators of antiquity made the greatest display of their powers. Burke.

To CLA'SSIFY.* v. a. [from classis.] To arrange.

CLA'SSIS.† n. s. [Latin.]

1. Order; sort; body.

He had declared his opinion of that classis of men, and did all he could to hinder their growth. Clarendon.

2. A convention or assembly of persons, within a particular district.

Give to your rough gown, wherever they meet it, whether in pulpit, classis, or provincial synod, the precedency and the pre-eminence of deceiving. Milton, Observ. Art. of Peace between Earl of Ormond and Irish.

To CLA'TTER.† v. n. [clatpunz, a rattle, Saxon, Dr. Johnson says. But it is rather from the Teut. klatteren, to make a noise.]

1. To make a noise by knocking two sonorous bodies frequently together.

Now the sprightly trumpet, from afar,
Had rouz'd the neighing steeds to scour the fields,
While the fierce riders clatter'd on their shields. Dryden.

2. To utter a noise by being struck together.

All that night was heard an unwonted clattering of weapons, and of men running to and fro. Knolles's History.

Down sunk the monster-bulk, and press'd the ground;
His arms and clattering shield on the vast body sound. Dryden.

Their clattering arms with the fierce shocks resound,
Helmets and broken launces spread the ground. Granville.

3. To talk fast and idly.

Here is a great deal of good matter
Lost for lack of telling;
Now, siker, I see thou do'st but clatter;
Harm may come of melling. Spenser, Shep. Cal.

But since he must needs be the loadstar of reformation, as some men clatter, it will be good to see further his knowledge of religion what it was, and by that we may likewise guess at the sincerity of his times in those that were not heretical. Milton, of Ref. in England.

To CLA'TTER. v. a.

1. To strike any thing so as to make it sound and rattle.

I only with an oaken staff will meet thee,
And raise such outcries on thy clatter'd iron,
That thou oft' shalt wish thyself at Gath. Milton, S. A.

When all the bees are gone to settle,
You clatter still your brazen kettle. Swift.

2. To dispute, jar, or clamour. Martin. A low word.

CLA'TTER.† n. s. [from the verb.]

1. A rattling noise made by the frequent and quick collision of sonorous bodies. A clatter is a clash often repeated with great quickness, and seems to convey the idea of a sound sharper and shriller than rattle. See the verb, and its derivation from klatteren. The Sax. cleaðup is clatter or clutter.

I have seen a monkey overthrow all the dishes and plates in a kitchen, merely for the pleasure of seeing them tumble, and hearing the clatter they made in their fall. Swift.

2. It is used for any tumultuous and confused noise.

By this great clatter, one of greatest note
Seems bruited. Shakspeare, Macbeth.

Grow to be short,
Throw by your clatter,
And handle the matter. B. Jonson, Underwoods.

O'Rourk's jolly boys
Ne'er dreamt of the matter,
'Till rous'd by the noise,
And musical clatter. Swift.

The jumbling particles of matter,
In chaos make not such a clatter. Swift.

CLA'TTERER.* n. s. [from clatter.]

1. Who makes any noise.

Holye-water, swyngers, and even-song clatterers, with other hypocrites. Bale, Yet a Course, &c. fol. 88. b.

2. One who will disclose any light secret. Huloet.

CLA'TTERING.* n. s. [Sax. clatpunge.] A noise; mere clamour; rattle.

All those airy speculations, which bettered not men's manners, were only a noise and clattering of words. Decay of Christian Piety.

CLA'VATED. adj. [clavatus, Lat.] Knobbed; set with knobs.

These appear plainly to have been clavated spikes of some kind of echinus ovarius. Woodward on Fossils.

CLA'UDENT. adj. [claudens, Lat.] Shutting; inclosing; confining. Dict.

CLA'UDICANT.* adj. [claudico, Lat.] Limping; halting.

To CLA'UDICATE.† v. n. [claudico, Lat.] To halt; to limp. Cockeram.

CLAUDICA'TION.† n. s. [old Fr. claudication, from the Lat. claudico.] The act or habit of halting; lameness. Cotgrave.

CLAVE. [the preterite of cleave.] See CLEAVE.

CLA'VELLATED. adj. [clavellatus, low Lat.] Made with burnt tartar. A chymical term. Chambers.

Air, transmitted through clavellated ashes into an exhausted receiver, loses weight as it passes through them. Arbuthnot.

CLA'VER.† n. s. [clæpep pypt, Sax.] This is now universally written clover, though not so properly. See CLOVER. Mr. Pegge pronounces claver, however, to be a corruption of pronunciation for clover; which is so far from being the case, that claver is more analogous to the etymology, and is also used by an author of good note.

The desert with sweet claver fills,
And richly shades the joyfull hills.
Sandys, Ps. p. 101.

CLA'VICHORD.* n. s. [from clavis and chorda, Lat.] An instrument having many strings of one sound, saving that, with small pieces of cloth, the sound is distinct. Barret's Alv. 1580. Another name, perhaps, for the clarichord, which see.

CLA'VICLE.† n. s. [old Fr. clavicule, from clavicula, Lat.] The collar bone.

Some quadrupeds can bring their fore feet unto their mouths; as most that have clavicles, or collar bones. Brown, Vulg. Err.

A girl was brought with angry wheals down her neck, towards the clavicle. Wiseman, Surgery.

CLAUSE.† n. s. [old Fr. clause, from the Lat. part. clausa of claudere, to shut up or close. This substantive formerly signified an end or conclusion, a close; and is so used by Chaucer.]

1. A sentence; a single part of a discourse; a subdivision of a larger sentence; so much of a sentence as is to be construed together.

God may be glorified by obedience, and obeyed by performance of his will, although no special clause or sentence of scripture be in every such action set before men's eyes to warrant it. Hooker, ii. § 2.

2. An article or particular stipulation.

The clause is untrue concerning the bishop. Hooker, iv. § 4.

When, after his death, they were sent both to Jews and Gentiles, we find not this clause in their commission. South.

CLA'USTRAL.† adj. [old Fr. claustral, from the Lat. claustrum; "prieur claustral," Cotgrave.] Relating to a cloister or religious house.

Claustral priors are such as preside over monasteries, next to the abbot or chief governour in such religious houses. Ayliffe.

This Dunstane — compelled men and women to vow chastity, and to kepe claustrale obedience. Bale, Eng. Votaries, P. I. fol. 62.

This might better be verified of clausteral monks and nuns. Fulke's Apology, (1586,) p. 19.

CLA'USURE. n. s. [clausura, Lat.] Confinement; the act of shutting; the state of being shut.

In some monasteries the severity of the clausure is hard to be born. Geddes.

CLAW.† n. s. [clap, Saxon; klaue, German.]

1. The foot of a beast or bird, armed with sharp nails; or the pincers or holders of a shell fish.

I saw her range abroad to seek her food,
T' embrue her teeth and claws with lukewarm blood. Spenser, Vis. of Bellay.

What's justice to a man, or laws,
That never comes within their claws? Hudibras.

He softens the harsh rigour of the laws,
Blunts their keen edge, and grinds their harpy claws. Garth.

2. Sometimes a hand, in contempt.

To CLAW.† v. a. [clapan, Sax.]

1. To tear with nails or claws.

Look, if the wither'd elder hath not his poll claw'd like a parrot. Shakspeare.

2. To pull as with the nails.

I am afraid we shall not easily claw off that name. South.

3. To tear or scratch in general.

For Age with stealing steps
Hath claw'd me with his crutch. Old Ballad in Lord Surrey's Poems.

But we must claw ourselves with shameful
And heathen stripes, by their example. Hudibras.

They for their own opinions stand fast,
Only to have them claw'd and canvast. Hudibras.

Oh, the folly of us poor creatures, who, in the midst of our distresses, or escapes, are ready to claw or caress one another, upon matters that so seldom depend on our wisdom or our weakness, on our good or evil conduct towards each other. Burke, on a Regicide Peace.

4. To flatter; which Dr. Johnson calls an obsolete sense, and of which he gives no example; but produces, under a definition of "to scratch or tickle," the passage of Shakspeare cited in the present sense, which is the true meaning of the word. This word is indeed frequently thus employed by our old authors.

I will clawe him, and saye, well might he fare!
Wilson on Usury, (1571,) p. 141.

Using your clawing colour, because some and such do not observe the said injunctions.
Anderson, Expos. of Benedictus, (1573,) fol. 65. b.

Thus golden asses claw'd by clawbacks are.
Davies, Wittes Pilgrimage, O. 4.

I laugh when I am merry, and claw no man in his humour. Shakspeare, Much Ado.

Men — who have dealt with king Richard, as some trivial clawing pamphleters, and historical parasites, with the magnificent prelate, Thomas Wolsey. Sir G. Buck, Hist. of K. Rich. III. p. 78.

5. To claw off, or away. To scold; to rail at.

Mr. Baxter takes great pains to unite the classical and congregational brethren, but claws off the episcopal party as a set of Cassandrian priests.
Bp. Nicolson to Mr. Yates.

You thank the place where you found money; but the jade Fortune is to be clawed away for't, if you should lose it. L'Estrange.

6. To claw off, in naval language. To beat or turn to windward from a lee shore, so as to escape the danger of shipwreck. Chambers.

CLA'WBACK.† n. s. [from claw and back.] A flatterer; a sycophant; a wheedler. See the 4th sense of To CLAW. Our old lexicography renders this word adulateur.

The miserable clawbackes of our countrie, not regarding what absurdities they commit, so that their wicked heresy may take place.
Stapleton's Fortr. of the Faith, (1565,) fol. 146. b.

The overweening of thy wits does make thy foes to smile,
Thy friends to weepe, and clawbacks thee with soothings to beguile.
Warner, Albion's England, (1597.)

Misgovern'd both my kingdome and my life,
I gave my selfe to ease, to sleepe, and sinne:
And I had clawbackes even at court full rife,
Which sought by outrage golden gaines to winne.
Mir. for Mag. p. 73.

CLA'WBACK.* adj. [from the subst.] Flattering; behaving in the manner of a clawback.

Like a clawback parasite. Bp. Hall, Sat. vi. 1.

CLA'WED. adj. [from claw.] Furnished or armed with claws.

Among quadrupeds, of all the clawed, the lion is the strongest. Grew, Cosmol.

CLAY.† n. s. [clai, Cimbr. and Welsh; kley, Dutch; clæg, clæia, Sax.]

1. Unctuous and tenacious earth; such as will mould into a certain form.

Clays are earths firmly coherent, weighty and compact, stiff, viscid, and ductile to a great degree, while moist; smooth to the touch, not easily breaking between the fingers, nor readily diffusible in water; and, when mixed, not readily subsiding from it. Hill on Fossils.

Deep Acheron,
Whose troubled eddies, thick with ooze and clay,
Are whirl'd aloft. Dryden.

Expose the clay to the rain, to drain it from salts, that the bricks may be more durable.
Woodward on Fossils.

The sun, which softens wax, will harden clay.
Watts.

Clover is the best way of improving clays, where manure is scarce. Mortimer, Husbandry.

2. [In poetry.] Earth in general; the terrestrial element.

Why should our clay
Over our spirits so much sway? Donne.

3. Dirt, or moistened earth.

When he had spoken thus, he spat on the ground, and made clay of the spittle. St. John, ix. 6.

To CLAY.† v. a. [from the noun.] To cover with clay; to manure with clay. This is an old verb in our language; "clayen, to dress with clay." Huloet.

This manuring lasts fifty years: then the ground must be clayed again. Mortimer, Husbandry.

CLAY-COLD.† adj. [clay and cold.] Lifeless; cold as the unanimated earth. Formerly key-cold was used in the same sense. See KEY-COLD.

I wash'd his clay-cold corse with holy drops,
And saw him laid in hallow'd ground. Rowe.

Her face was like an April morn,
Clad in a wintry cloud;
And clay-cold was her lily hand,
That held her sable shrowd.
Mallet's Margaret's Ghost.

CLAY-GROUND.* n. s. Ground abounding with clay; thick or heavy ground.

In the plain of Jordan did the king cast them in the clay-ground, between Succoth and Zarthan.
1 Kings, vii. 46.

CLAY-PIT. n. s. [clay and pit.] A pit where clay is dug.

'Twas found in a clay-pit. Woodward on Fossils.

CLAYES. n. s. [claye, Fr. In fortification.] Wattles made with stakes interwoven with osiers, to cover lodgements. Chambers.

CLA'YEY. adj. [from clay.] Consisting of clay; abounding with clay.

CLA'YISH.† adj. [from clay.] Partaking of the nature of clay; containing particles of clay; or, "full of clay." Huloet.

Small beer proves an unwholesome drink; perhaps, by being brewed with a thick, muddish, and clayish water, which the brewers covet.
Harvey on Consumptions.

CLA'YMARL. n. s. [clay and marl.] A whitish, smooth, chalky clay.

Claymarl resembles clay, and is near akin to it; but is more fat, and sometimes mixed with chalk-stones. Mortimer, Husbandry.

CLA'YMORE.* n. s. A two-handed sword. See GLAYMORE.

CLA'YSTONE.* n. s. A blue and white limestone dug in Gloucestershire. Grose.

CLEAN.† adj. [glan, Welsh; clæne, Saxon, Dr. Johnson says. But it is more probably from the Goth. glan, brightness; which Serenius deduces from the Scythick root, hloa, to shine.]

1. Free from dirt or filth; as, clean water.

Both his hands, most filthy feculent,
Above the water were on high extent,
And fain'd to wash themselves incessantly;
Yet nothing cleaner were for such intent,
But rather fouler. Spenser, F. Q.

They make clean the outside of the cup and of the platter, but within they are full of extortion and excess. St. Matthew, xxiii. 25.

2. Free from moral impurity; chaste; innocent; guiltless. [Sax. clæn heoptan, the pure in heart, St. Matth. v. 8.]

Your blood be upon your own heads; I am clean. Acts, xviii. 6.

He that hath clean hands and a pure heart.
Psalms.

Create in me a clean heart, O God. Psalms.

3. Elegant; neat; not unwieldy; not encumbered with any thing useless or disproportioned.

The timber and wood are in some trees more clean, in some more knotty. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

Yet thy waist is strait and clean,
As Cupid's shaft, or Hermes' rod. Waller.

4. Not foul with any loathsome disease; not leprous.

If the plague be somewhat dark, and spread not in the skin, the priest shall pronounce him clean. Leviticus, xiii. 6.

5. Dexterous; not bungling; feat: as, a clean trick; a clean leap; a clean boxer.

6. Entire.

And when ye reap the harvest of your land, thou shalt not make clean riddance of the corners of thy field when thou reapest, neither shalt thou gather any gleaning of thy harvest: thou shalt leave them unto the poor and to the stranger.
Levit. xxiii. 22.

CLEAN.† adv. [Sax. adv. clæne.]

1. Quite; perfectly; fully; completely. This sense is now little used. It is of frequent occurrence in our present version of the bible.

Their actions have been clean contrary unto those before mentioned. Hooker, i. § 4.

Being seated, and domestick broils
Clean overblown. Shakspeare.

A philosopher, pressed with the same objection, shapes an answer clean contrary.
Hakewill on Providence.

2. Without miscarriage; in a dexterous manner.

Pope came off clean with Homer, but they say Broome went before, and kindly swept the way.
Henley.

CLEAN-TIMBERED.* adj. [from clean and timber.] Well-proportioned; borrowed from the application of this adjective to trees. See Lord Bacon under the 2d. definition of CLEAN. The phrase is yet in use.

I think, Hector was not so clean-timber'd: his leg is too big for Hector. Shaksp. Love's Lab. Lost.

To CLEAN.† v. a. [Sax. clænan.] To free from dirt or filth.

Their tribes adjusted, clean'd their vigorous wings.
And many a circle, many a short essay,

Rogers.

3. With discernment; acutely; without embarrassment, or perplexity of mind.
There is almost no man but sees clearlier and sharper the vices in a speaker than the virtues.
B. Jonson.

4. Without entanglement, or distraction of affairs.
He that doth not divide, will never enter into business; and he that divideth too much, will never come out of it clearly.
Bacon, Ess.

5. Without by-ends; without sinister views; honestly.
When you are examining these matters, do not take into consideration any sensual or worldly interest; but deal clearly and impartially with yourselves.
Tillotson.

6. Without deduction or cost.

7. Without reserve; without evasion; without subterfuge.
By a certain day they should clearly relinquish unto the king all their lands and possessions.
Davies on Ireland.

CLE'ARNESS.† n. s. [from clear.]

1. Transparency; brightness.
It may be, percolation doth not only cause clearness and splendour, but sweetness of savour.
Bacon, Nat. Hist.
Glass in the furnace grows to a greater magnitude, and refines to a greater clearness, only as the breath within is more powerful, and the heat more intense.
Bacon, Nat. Hist.

2. Splendour; lustre.
Love, more clear than yourself, with the clearness, lays a night of sorrow upon me.
Sidney, b. ii.

3. Distinctness; perspicuity.
If he chances to think right, he does not know how to convey his thoughts to another with clearness and perspicuity.
Addison, Spectator.

4. Sincerity; honesty; plain dealing.

Bacon.

5. Freedom from imputation of ill.
I require a clearness.
Shaksp. Mac.

CLE'ARSHINING.* adj. [from clear and shine.] Shining brightly.
Three glorious suns, each one a perfect sun;
Not separated with the racking clouds,
But sever'd in a pale clear-shining sky.
Shakspeare, K. Hen. VI. P. III.

CLEARSI'GHTED.† adj. [clear and sight.] Perspicuous; discerning; judicious.
And I the wisest man I could get for money, because I had rather follow the clear-sighted.
Beaum. and Fl. Knight of Malta.
Clearsighted reason, wisdom's judgement leads;
And sense, her vassal, in her footsteps treads.
Denham.
Where judgement sits clear-sighted, and surveys
The chain of reason with unerring gaze.
Thomson's Happy Man.

CLEARSI'GHTEDNESS.* n. s. [from clear-sighted.] Discernment; sound judgement.
As if we should suppose any thing endowed with a perfect clearsightedness, in order to view the sun and the stars.
Bp. Barlow's Rem. p. 527.

Knolles, Hist. of the Turks.

4. To be concomitant to; to be united with.
We cannot imagine, that, in breeding or begetting faith, his grace doth cleave to the one, and forsake the other. Hooker, v. § 22.

To CLEAVE.† v. a. preterite, I clove, I clave, I cleft; part. pass. cloven, or cleft. [Sax. clipian, cliopian, cleopian; Dutch, kloven; perhaps from the Goth. klyfa, a segment. Seren.]

1. To divide with violence; to split; to part forcibly into pieces.
And at their passing cleave the Assyrian flood.
Milton, P. R.
The fountains of it are said to have been cloven, or burst open. Burnet, Theory of the Earth.
The blessed minister his wings display'd,
And, like a shooting star, he cleft the night.
Dryden.
Rais'd on her dusky wings, she cleaves the skies.
Dryden.
Whom with such force he struck, he fell'd him down,
And cleft the circle of his golden crown. Dryden.
Or had the sun
Elected to the earth a nearer seat,
His beams had cleft the hill, the valley dry'd.
Blackmore.
Where whole brigades one champion's arms o'erthrow,
And cleave a giant at a random blow. Tickell.
Not half so swift the trembling doves can fly,
When the fierce eagle cleaves the liquid sky. Pope.

2. To divide; to part naturally.
And every beast that parteth the hoof, and cleaveth the cleft into two claws. Deut. xiv. 6.

To CLEAVE. v. n.

1. To part asunder.
Wars 'twixt you twain, would be
As if the world should cleave, and that slain men
Should solder up the rift.
Shakspeare, Ant. and Cleop.
The ground clave asunder that was under them.
Numb. xvi. 31.
He cut the cleaving sky,
And in a moment vanish'd from her eye.
Pope, Odyssey.

Newton, Opticks.

CLE'AVER. n. s. [from cleave.]

1. A butcher's instrument to cut animals into joints.
You, gentlemen, keep a parcel of roaring bullies about me day and night, with huzzas and hunting-horns, and ringing the changes on butchers cleavers. Arbuthnot.
Though arm'd with all thy cleavers, knives,
And axes made to hew down lives. Hudibras.

2. A weed. Improperly written CLIVER.

CLEDGE.* n. s. A name given by miners to the upper part of the stratum of fullers' earth. Chambers.

CLEES.† n. s. pl. The two parts of the foot of beasts which are cloven-footed. Skinner. It is a country word, and probably corrupted from claws, Dr. Johnson says. Nevertheless, this word is found in our old lexicography; as in Barret's Alv. " of a disease in cattell betwixt the clees of their feete." Gower has the " cat's clees," Conf. Am. B. 4. Clays is still the Warwickshire pronunciation of claws.

CLEF. n. s. [from clef, key, Fr.] In musick, a mark at the beginning of the lines of a song, which shews the tone or key in which the piece is to begin.
Chambers.

CLEFT. part. pass. [from cleave.] Divided; parted asunder.
Fat, with incense strew'd,
On the cleft wood. Milton, P. L.
I never did on cleft Parnassus dream,
Nor taste the sacred Heliconian stream. Dryden.

CLEFT.† n. s. [from cleave.] See CLIFT.

1. A space made by the separation of parts; a crack; a crevise.
To go into the clefts of the rocks, and into the tops of the ragged rocks. Isaiah, ii. 21.
He will smite the great house with breaches, and the little house with clefts. Amos, vi. 11.
The cascades seem to break through the clefts and cracks of rocks. Addison, Guardian.
The extremity of this cape has a long cleft in it, which was enlarged and cut into shape by Agrippa, who made this the great port for the Roman fleet. Addison on Italy.
The rest of it, being more gross and ponderous, does not move far; but lodges in the clefts, craggs, and sides of the rocks near the bottoms of them.
Woodward.

2. In farriery.
Clefts appear on the bought of the pasterns, and are caused by a sharp and malignant humour which frets the skin; and it is accompanied with pain, and a noisom stench. Farrier's Dict.

To CLE'FTGRAFT. v. a. [cleft and graft.] To engraft by cleaving the stock of a tree, and inserting a branch.
Filberts may be cleftgrafted on the common nut.
Mortimer.

CLEG.* n. s. [Dan. klaeg.] A cleg-fly, solipuga. Barret. It is the horse-fly; still called by this name in the north of England.

To CLEM.* v. a. [written also cleam, and clam. Goth. klamma; Germ. klemmen; to pinch, to squeeze. But see to CLAM.] To starve.
What will he clem me and my followers? Ask him an' he will clem me. B. Jonson, Poetaster.
Clemm'd or clamm'd, starved; because, by famine, the guts and bowels are, as it were, clammed or stuck together. Ray, N. C. Words.

To CLEM.* v. n. To starve.
Hard is the choice, when the valiant must eat their arms, or clem.
B. Jonson, Every Man out of his Humour.

CLE'MENCY.† n. s. [clemence, Fr. clementia, Lat. Spenser has once adopted clemence from the French, F. Q. v. vii. 22.]

1. Mercy; remission of severity; willingness to spare; tenderness in punishing.
Be careful for the country, and our nation which is pressed on every side, according to the clemency, that thou readily shewest unto all.
2 Macc. xiv. 9.
I pray thee that thou wouldst hear us, of thy clemency, a few words. Acts, xxiv. 4.
For us, and for our tragedy,
Here stooping to your clemency,
We beg the hearing patiently. Shaksp. Hamlet.
I have stated the true notion of clemency, mercy, compassion, good-nature, humanity, or whatever else it may be called, so far as is consistent with wisdom. Addison, Freeholder.

2. Mildness; softness.
Then in the clemency of upward air,
We'll scour our spots, and the dire thunder scar.
Dryden.

CLE'MENT.† adj. [old Fr. clement, from clemens, Latin.] Mild; gentle; merciful; kind; tender; compassionate.
You are more clement than vile men,
Who of their broken debtors take a third,
Letting them thrive again on the abatement. Shaks.
No patron, intercessor none! now past
The sweet, the clement, mediatorial hour.
Young, Night Th. 9.

CLE'MENTLY.* adv. [from clement.] In a mild or merciful manner.
O Mary Magdalen, hear our prayers, which are full of praises, and most clemently reconcile this company unto Christ!
Bp. Taylor, Dissuas. from Popery, ii. 9.

CLENCH.† [old Fr. clenche, the latch of a door. Lacombe.] See CLINCH.

To CLEPE.† v. a. [clypian. Saxon.] To call. Obsolete. Dr. Johnson cites a passage from Shakspeare, where the true reading is clap, in the sense of clap hands, or plight troth. It is therefore removed for the following example.
They clepe us drunkards. Shaksp. Hamlet.

To CLEPE.* v. n. To call.
To the gods I clepe
For true record of this my faithful speech.
Sackville's Gorboduc.

CLE'PSYDRA. n. s. [Lat. from the Gr. κλέπτω, to form, and ὕδωρ, water.]

1. A kind of clock among the ancients, which told the hours by water; that is, measuring the space of time by the fall of a certain quantity of water; hence the application of the word to an hour-glass of sand. See Phil. Trans. vol. xliv. p. 171. And Greenhill's Art of Embalming, 1705. p. 231.

2. A chymial vessel.

CLE'RGICAL.* adj. [from clergy. Chaucer has clergial for learning.] Relating to the clergy.
Constantine might have done more justly to have punished those clergical faults which he could not conceal, than to leave them unpunished that that they remain concealed.
Milton, Animad. Rem. Def.

CLE'RGY. n. s. [clergé, Fr. clerus, Lat. κληρὸς, Gr.] The body of men set apart by due ordination for the service of God.

We hold that God's clergy are a state which hath been, and will be as long as there is a church upon earth, necessary, by the plain word of God himself; a state whereunto the rest of God's people must be subject, as touching things that appertain to their soul's health. Hooker, b. iii.

The convocation give a greater sum,
Than ever, at one time, the clergy yet
Did to his predecessors part withal. Shaksp.

CLE'RGYABLE.* adj. [from clergy.] The term applied to felonies within benefit of clergy; which are called clergyable offences, clergyable felonies.

Chambers, and Blackstone.

CLE'RGYMAN. n. s. [clergy and man.] A man in holy orders; a man set apart for ministration of holy things; not a laick.

How I have sped among the clergymen,
The sums I have collected shall express. Shaksp.

It seems to be in the power of a reasonable clergyman to make the most ignorant man comprehend his duty. Swift.

CLE'RICAL.† adj. [old Fr. clerical, from clericus, Lat.] Relating to the clergy: as, a clerical man; a man in orders.

I cannot subscribe to the counsel of Leonardus Lessius, that it were meet for clerical and religious persons rather to suffer death than to kill a murtherer; since no reason can be shewed, why their life should not be as dear to them as others. Bp. Hall, Cases of Consc. ii. 1.

Sir P. P. having observed many to look with an evil eye on the clerical revenue, his lordship sent him in a letter the following paper. Bp. Barlow's Remains, p. 271.

CLE'RICK.* n. s. [Sax. clepic, Lat. clericus.] A clergyman.

What means the profession furnishes, the cleric who is the most intent upon its proper duties, the most addicted to a life of study and devotion, is the least qualified to improve. Bp. Horsley, Serm. for Sons of the Clergy, (1786.)

CLE'RICK.* adj. Relating to the character of a clergyman.

CLERK.† n. s. [old Fr. clerc, sçavant, instruit; and, for the clergy, clerex, clerkus; Sax. clepic; Lat. clericus. Formerly clerk was the usual term for a scholar; most situations of trust or talent being filled by the clergy. See Blackstone's Comment. vol. I. Introduct. Thus clergie, in old French, is a general term for science.]

1. A clergyman.

All persons were stiled clerks that served in the church of Christ, whether they were bishops, priests, or deacons. Ayliffe.

2. A scholar; a man of letters.

They might talk of book-learning what they would; but, for his part, he never saw more unfeaty fellows than great clerks were. Sidney.

The greatest clerks being not always the honestest, any more than the wisest men. South.

3. A man employed under another as a writer.

My lord Bassanio gave his ring away
Unto the judge; and then the boy, his clerk,
That took some pains in writing, he begg'd mine. Shakspeare.

My friend was in doubt whether he could not exert the justice upon such a vagrant; but not having his clerk with him, who is a necessary counsellor, he let the thought drop. Addison.

4. A petty writer in publick offices: an officer of various kinds.

Take a just view, how many may remark
Who's now a lord, his grand-sire was a clerk.
Granville.

It may seem difficult to make out the bills of fare for the suppers of Vitellius. I question not but an expert clerk of a kitchen can do it. Arbuthnot.

5. The layman who reads the responses to the congregation in the church, to direct the rest.

By the clerks in the rubrick of the Common-Prayer-Book, (which was first inserted in the second book of K. Edw. VI.) I suppose were meant such persons as were appointed, at the beginning of the Reformation, to attend the incumbent in his performance of the offices; and such are still in some cathedral and collegiate churches, which have lay-clerks to look out the lessons, name the anthem, set the psalms, and the like; of which sort I take our parish-clerks to be, though we have now seldom more than one to a church. Wheatley, on Comm. Pr. ii. § 17.

CLERK-ALE.* n. s. [from clerk and ale.] The feast of the parish clerk. See ALE.

Clerk-ale occurs in Aubrey's manuscript History of Wiltshire. "In the Easter holidays was the clarkes-ale for his private benefit and the solace of the neighbourhood."

Warton, Hist. of Eng. Poetry, iii. 129.

CLE'RKLESS.* adj. [from clerk and less.] Ignorant; uncivilized.

Like the Turk, whose military janisaries and bashaws rule all in their clerkless and cruel way. Waterhouse's Apol. for Learn. 1653, p. 40.

CLE'RKLIKE.* adj. [from clerk and like.] Accomplished as a clerk or learned person.

You are certainly a gentleman; thereto,
Clerk-like, experienc'd. Shakspeare, Winter's Tale.

CLE'RKLY.* adj. [from clerk.] Clever; scholar-like; cunning.

I have answered to your clerkly dialogue between the scholler and the rude man.
Abp. Cranmer to Bp. Gardiner, fol. 393.

Thou art clerkly, thou art clerkly, Sir John.
Shakspeare, Mer. Wives of Windsor.

CLE'RKLY.* adv. In an ingenious or learned manner.

They [the poets] did clerkly, in figures, set before us sundry tales.
Gascoigne, Delic. Diet for Drunkards.

Ignominious words, though clerkly couch'd.
Shakspeare, K. Hen. VI. P. II.

Then practis'd they by proclamation spread,
Nought to forget, that mought defame him dead;
Which was so curious, and so clerkly penn'd.
Mir. for Mag. p. 431.

CLE'RKSHIP.† n. s. [from clerk.]

1. Scholarship.

I have heard that Abraham was a great scholar; what portion of clerkship he hath otherwise and upon other occasions exprest, I know not.
Hales, Rem. Serm. at the Close, p. 6.

How many shrewd men have you known and very well accomplished in most parts of conversation, that never had any great matter of clerkship! Goodman, Wint. Ev. Conference, P. i.

2. The office of a clerk of any kind.

Of these clerkships your majesty had formerly granted two reversions. Sir H. Wotton, Letters.

He sold the clerkship of his parish, when it became vacant. Swift, Miscellanies.

CLEVE.
CLIF.
CLIVE. } In composition, at the beginning or end of the proper name of a place, denotes it to be situated on the side of a rock or hill; as Cleveland, Clifton, Stancliff.

CLE'VER.† adj. [of no certain etymology, Dr. Johnson says. It may be an abbreviation or corruption of our old adjective deliver, nimble, active, (so used by Spenser's contemporary commentator,) from the old Fr. "delivre de sa personne, an active wight, one that can wield his limbs at pleasure;" Cotgrave: and hence, perhaps, in our sense of clever, one that can turn his hand to any thing, dexterous.]

1. Dexterous; skilful.

It was the cleverer mockery of the two.
L'Estrange.

I read Dyer's letter more for the stile than the news. The man has a clever pen, it must be owned. Addison, Freeholder.

2. Just; fit; proper; commodious.

I can't but think 'twould sound more clever,
To me and to my heirs for ever. Pope.

3. Well-shaped; handsome.

She called him gundy guts, and he called her lousy Peg, though the girl was a tight clever wench as any was. Arbuthnot.

4. This is a low word, scarcely ever used but in burlesque or conversation; and applied to any thing a man likes, without a settled meaning.

CLE'VERLY. adv. [from clever.] Dexterously; fitly; handsomely.

These would inveigle rats with th' scent,
And sometimes catch them with a snap,
As cleverly as th' ablest trap. Hudibras, ii. 1.

A rogue upon the highway may have as strong an arm, and take off a man's head as cleverly as the executioner. South.

CLE'VERNESS. n. s. [from clever.] Dexterity; skill; accomplishment.

CLEW. n. s. [clype, cleop, Sax. klouwen, Dutch.]

1. Thread wound upon a bottom; a ball of thread.

Eftsoons untwisting his deceitful clew,
He gan to weave a web of wicked guile.
Spenser, F. Q.

While guided by some clew of heavenly thread,
The perplex'd labyrinth we backward tread.
Roscommon.

They see small clews draw vastest weights along,
Not in their bulk but in their order strong.
Dryden.

2. A guide; a direction: because men direct themselves by a clew of thread in a labyrinth.

This alphabet must be your own clew to guide you. Holder.

Is there no way, no thought, no beam of light?
No clew to guide me thro' this gloomy maze,
To clear my honour, yet preserve my faith? Smith.

The reader knows not how to transport his thoughts over to the next particular, for want of some clew, or connecting idea, to lay hold of. Watts, Logick.

3. CLEW of the sail of a Ship, is the lower corner of it, which reaches down to that earing where the tackles and sheets are fastened. Harris.

To CLEW. v. a. [from clew, a sea term.] To clew the Sails, is to raise them, in order to be furled, which is done by a rope fastened to the clew of a sail, called the clew-garnet. Harris.

To CLEW.* v. a. [from the noun.] To direct; to guide as by a thread.

Direct and clew me out the way to happiness.
Beaum. and Fl. Women pleas'd.

To CLICK.† v. n. [cliken, Dut. cliqueter,

French; or perhaps the diminutive of clack, Dr. Johnson says. He might have added that the old Fr. claquer and cliquer is to click.] To make a sharp, small, successive noise.

The solemn death-watch click'd, the hour she dy'd;
And shrilling crickets in the chimney cry'd. Gay.

To CLICK.* v. a. [Sax. ȝelæccan, to snatch.] To catch or snatch hastily; yet used in the north of England.

CLICK.* n. s. [old Fr. cliche, i. e. clichet or cliquet. See CLICKET.] The latch of a door.

CLI'CKER. n. s. [from click.] A low word for the servant of a salesman, who stands at the door to invite customers.

CLI'CKET.† n. s. [old Fr. cliquet.]

1. The ring, knocker, or hammer of a door. Cotgrave, and Skinner.
2. Formerly, a key.

This freshe May of which I spake of yore,
In warm wex hath enprinted the cliket
That January bare of the smal wicket.
Chaucer, March. Tale.

CLI'ENT.† n. s. [Fr. client; Lat. cliens, cluo, from the Gr. κλύω, to hear.]

1. One who applies to an advocate for counsel and defence.

There is due from the judge to the advocate some commendation, where causes are well handled; for that upholds in the client the reputation of his counsel. Bacon, Ess.

Advocates must deal plainly with their clients, and tell the true state of their case.
Bp. Taylor, Rule of living holy.

2. It may be perhaps sometimes used for a dependant in a more general sense, as it was used among the Romans.

I do think they are your friends and clients,
And fearful to disturb you. B. Jonson.

CLIE'NTAL.* adj. [from client.] Dependant.

In order to continue the cliental bond, and not to break up an old and strong confederacy and thereby disperse the tribe.
Burke, Abridg. Eng. Hist. ii. 7.

CLI'ENTED. particip. adj. [from client.] Supplied with clients.

This due occasion of discouragement, the worst conditioned and least clienled petivoguers, do yet, under the sweet bait of revenge, convert to a more plentiful prosecution of actions.
Carew, Surv. of Cornwall.

CLI'ENTELE.† n. s. [old Fr. clientèle, Lat. clientela.] The condition or office of a client. A word scarcely used, Dr. Johnson says, citing the authority only of Ben Jonson. It is, however, repeatedly used by a better writer than the facetious bard.

Those of the Roman clientele are not more careful and punctual in scanning and observing the rules and practice of their espousals, than ours here are incurious in both.
Bp. Hall, Cases of Conscience, iv. 6.

There's Varus holds good quarters with him;
And, under the pretext of clientele,
Will be admitted. B. Jonson.

CLI'ENTSHIP. n. s. [from client.] The condition of a client.

Patronage and clientship among the Romans always descended: the plebeian houses had recourse to the patrician line which had formerly protected them. Dryden.

CLIFF.† n. s. [clivus, Lat. clıf, clıȝ, Sax. part. cleoȝeb from cleoȝan, to cleave; Icel. kliufa, the same; Goth. klyft, a segment. "In our ancient language, the cut-off or broken mountains on the sea-sides are more rightly and properly called cliffs, than by the name of rocks or hills; that appellation being more fitting unto the inland mountains; but the name of clifft, coming from our verb to cleave, is unto these more aptly given, for that they seem unto our view as clefft or cloven from the part that sometime belonged unto them. And albeit many cliffs are in many places of the sea-shore to be seen, as well as at Dover; yet are they not seen so to be answered, and corresponded unto by others right over against them." Verstegan, Restit. of Dec. Intell. ch. 4.]

1. A steep rock; a rock, according to Skinner, broken and craggy. [rupes.]

The Leucadians did use to precipitate a man from a high cliff into the sea. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

Mountaineers, that from Severus came,
And from the craggy cliffs of Tetrica. Dryden.

Where-ever 'tis so found scattered upon the shores, there is it as constantly found lodged in the cliffs thereabouts. Woodward.

2. The name of a character in musick. Properly CLEF. [Fr.]

A bird
Whom art had never taught cliffs, moods, or notes.
Ford, Lover's Melancholy.

Cliff is a mark in musick at the beginning of the lines of a song; and is the indication of the the pitch, and bespeaks what kind of voice, as base, tenour, or treble, it is proper for. Sir J. Hawkins.

CLI'FFY.* adj. [from cliff.] Broken; craggy.

Calling them craggie or cleffie mountains, as being full of downe-falls and hollow places.
Harmar, Tr. of Beza's Serm. (1587,) p. 301.

Beneath the shade of Vecta's cliffy isle. Dyer.

CLIFT.† n. s.

1. The same with CLIFF; now disused, Dr. Johnson says; and he notices only the usage of it by Spenser. It has, however, another meaning.

Down he tumbled, like an aged tree,
High growing on the top of rocky clift.
Spenser, F. Q.

2. A crack; a fissure.

I will put thee in a clift of the rock.
Exod. xxxiii. 22.

CLI'FTED.* adj. [from clift.] Broken.

The swarming populace spread every wall,
And cling, as if with claws they did enforce
Their hold, thro' clifted stones, stretching and staring,
As if they were all eyes, and every limb
Would feed its faculty of admiration.
Congreve, Mourning Bride, i. 3.

CLI'FTY.* adj. The same as CLIFFY.

The rocks below widen considerably, and their clifty sides are fringed with weed. Penant.

CLIMA'CTER.† n. s. [old Fr. climactère, from Gr. κλιμακτὴρ.] A certain space of time, or progression of years, which is supposed to end in a critical and dangerous time.

Elder times, settling their conceits upon climacters, differ from one another. Brown, Vulg. Err.

CLIMACTE'RICK.† } n. s. [from climacter.]
CLIMACTE'RICAL. } A certain number of years, at the end of which some great change is supposed to befal the body; sometimes applied to things; even by Johnson himself, who gives, in his dictionary, this word as an adjective, when the examples of Brown, Dryden, and Pope, which he produces, shew that it is a substantive.

Certain observable years are supposed to be attended with some considerable change in the body; as the seventh year; the twenty-first, made up of three times seven; the forty-ninth, made up of seven times seven; the sixty-third, being nine times seven; and the eighty-first, which is nine times nine: which two last are called the grand climactericks.

The numbers seven and nine multiplied into themselves, do make up sixty-three, commonly esteemed the great climacterical of our lives.
Brown, Vulg. Err.

Many abbey lands have survived the dangerous climacterical of the third generation.
Fuller, Ch. Hist. B. 6.

Your lordship being now arrived at your great climacterique, yet give no proof of the least decay of your excellent judgement and comprehension.
Dryden.

My mother is something better, though, at her advanced age, every day is a climacterick. Pope.

It had been a task worthy of the moral philosophers to have considered with equal care the climactericks of the mind; to have pointed out the time at which every passion begins and ceases to predominate, and noted the regular variations of desire, and the succession of one appetite to another. Johnson, Rambler, No. 151.

CLI'MATE.† n. s. [old Fr. climat, from Gr. κλίμα.]

1. A space upon the surface of the earth, measured from the equator to the polar circles; in each of which spaces the longest day is half an hour longer than in that nearer to the equator. From the polar circles to the poles, climates are measured by the increase of a month.
2. In the common and popular sense, a region, or tract of land, differing from another by the temperature of the air.

Betwixt th' extremes, two happier climates hold,
The temper that partakes of hot and cold. Dryden.

On what new happy climate are we thrown?
Dryden.

This talent of moving the passions cannot be of any great use in the northern climates. Swift.

To CLI'MATE. v. n. To inhabit. A word only in Shakspeare.

The blessed gods,
Purge all infection from our air, whilst you
Do climate here. Shakspeare.

CLI'MATURE. n. s. The same with CLIMATE. Not in use.

Such harbingers preceding still the fates,
Have heav'n and earth together demonstrated
Unto our climatures and countrymen. Shakspeare.

CLI'MAX. n. s. [κλίμαξ.] Gradation; ascent: a figure in rhetorick, by which the sentence rises gradually; as Cicero says to Catiline, Thou do'st nothing, movest nothing, thinkest nothing; but I hear it, I see it, and perfectly understand it.

Choice between one excellency and another is difficult; and yet the conclusion, by a due climax, is evermore the best. Dryden, Juv. Dedication.

Some radiant Richmond every age has grac'd,
Still rising in a climax, 'till the last,
Surpassing all, is not to be surpast. Granville.

To CLIMB. v. n. pret. clomb or climbed; part. clomb or climbed. It is pronounced like clime. [climan, climban, Sax. klim- men, Dutch.] To ascend up any place; to mount by means of some hold or footing. It implies labour and difficulty, and successive efforts.

You tempt the fury of my three attendants,
Lean famine, quartering steel, and climbing fire.
Shakspeare.

When shall I come to th' top of that same hill?—
—You do climb up it now. Look, how we labour.
Shakspeare.

Jonathan climbed up upon his hands, and upon his feet. 1 Sam. xiv. 13.

As a thief
Into the window climbs, or o'er the tiles,
So clomb the first grand thief into God's fold.
Milton, P. L.

Thou sun! of this great world both eye and soul,
Acknowledge him thy greater; sound his praise
In thy eternal course, both when thou climb'st,
And when high noon hast gain'd, and when thou fall'st. Milton, P. L.

No rebel Titan's sacrilegious crime,
By heaping hills on hills, can thither climb.
Roscommon.

Black vapours climb aloft, and cloud the day.
Dryden.

What controuling cause
Makes waters, in contempt of nature's laws,
Climb up, and gain the aspiring mountain's height?
Blackmore.

To CLIMB. v. a. To ascend; to mount.

Is't not enough to break into my garden,
Climbing my walls, in spite of me the owner?
Shakspeare.

Thy arms pursue
Paths of renown, and climb ascents of fame. Prior.

Forlorn he must, and persecuted fly;
Climb the steep mountain, in the cavern lie. Prior.

CLI'MBABLE.* adj. [from climb. Pronounced, and formerly written, climable.] Ascendible. Sherwood.

CLI'MBER.† n. s. [from climb.]

1. One that mounts or scales any place or thing; a mounter; a riser.

I wait not at the lawyer's gates,
Ne shoulder climbers down the stairs
Carew's Survey.

Lowliness is young ambition's ladder,
Whereto the climber upward turns his face. Shaks.

Pretended learning — in publick is the common climber into every chair, where either religion is preached, or law reported.
Milton, Doct. and Disc. of Divorce.

2. A plant that creeps upon other supports.

Ivy, briony, honey-suckles, and other climbers, must be dug up. Mortimer.

3. The name of a particular herb.

The seeds are gathered into a little head, ending in a kind of rough plume; whence it is called by the country people old man's beard. Miller.

To CLI'MBER. v. n. [from clamber.] To mount with effort; to climb.

In scaling the youngest to pluck off his becke,
Beware how ye climber for breaking your neck.
Tusser.

CLI'MBING.* n. s. [from climb.] The act of ascending any place.

As the climbing of a sandy way is to the feet of the aged, so is a wife full of words to a quiet man. Ecclus. xxv. 20.

CLIME. n. s. [contracted from climate, and therefore properly poetical.] Climate; region; tract of earth.

He can spread thy name o'er land and seas,
Whatever clime the sun's bright circle warms.
Milton, Sonn. 8.

They apply the celestial description of other climes unto their own. Brown, Vulg. Err.

Of beauty sing, her shining progress view,
From clime to clime the dazzling light pursue.
Granville.

We shall meet
In happier climes, and on a safer shore. Addison.

Health to vigorous bodies, or fruitful seasons, in temperate climes, are common and familiar blessings. Atterbury.

To CLINCH.† v. a. [clýnza, Sax. to knock, Junius. Clingo, in Festus, to encompass; Minsheu. These are given by Dr. Johnson. But the true etymology seems to be the Swedish klinka, a bolt; whence their verb, klinka, to clinch.]

1. To hold in the hand with the fingers bent over it.

Simois rowls the bodies and the shields
Of heroes, whose dismember'd hands yet bear
The dart aloft, and clinch the pointed spear.
Dryden.

2. To contract or double the fingers.

Their tallest trees are about seven feet high, the tops whereof I could but just reach with my fist clinched. Swift.

3. To bend the point of a nail in the other side.

Thou hast hit the nail on the head, and I will give thee six pots for't, though I ne'er clinch shoe again. Beaum. and Fl. Martial Maid.

4. To confirm; to fix: as, to clinch an argument.

To CLINCH.* v. n. To hold fast upon.

The savages held out a stick on which the birds clinched, and were immediately tied by a small string. Tr. of Buffon, Hist. of Birds, vi. 165.

CLINCH. n. s. [from the verb.]

1. A word used in a double meaning; a pun; an ambiguity; a duplicity of meaning, with an identity of expression. How it obtains this meaning is difficult to find. A nail caught on the other side, and doubled, is a nail clinched: a word taken in a different meaning, and doubled in sense, is likewise a clinch.

Such as they are, I hope they will prove, without a clinch, luciferous; searching after the nature of light. Boyle.

Pure clinches the suburbian muse affords,
And Panton waging harmless war with words.
Dryden.

Here one poor word a hundred clinches makes.
Pope.

2. That part of the cable which is fastened to the ring of the anchor.

CLI'NCHER. n. s. [from clinch.] A cramp; a holdfast; a piece of iron bent down to fasten planks.

The wimbles for the work, Calypso found;
With those he pierc'd 'em, and with clinchers bound. Pope.

To CLING.† v. n. pret. I clung; part. I have clung. [klynger, Danish, Dr. Johnson says. He might have added the Sax. clinzan.]

1. To hang upon by twining round; to stick to; to hold fast upon.

The broil long doubtful stood;
As two spent swimmers that do cling together,
And choak their art. Shakspeare.

The fontanel in his neck was described by the clinging of his hair to the plaister.
Wiseman, Surgery.

When they united and together clung
When undistinguish'd in one heap they hung.
Blackmore.

See in the circle, next Eliza plac'd,
Two babes of love, close clinging to her waist.
Pope.

That they may the closer cling,
Take your blue ribbon for a string. Swift.

2. To adhere as followers, or friends.

Most popular consul he is grown, methinks:
How the rout cling to him. B. Jonson, Catiline.

To CLING.† v. a. To dry up; to consume; to waste. [Geclungen peop, a withered tree.] See CLUNG. Common in this sense throughout the north.

——— A virtue rare,
That makes wealth slave to need,
And gold become his thrall;
Clings not his guts with niggish fare,
To keep his chest withall.
Lord Surrey's Ecclesiastes, before 1567, ch. 5.

If thou speak'st false,
Upon the next tree shalt thou hang alive,
'Till famine cling thee. Shakspeare, Macbeth.

CLI'NGY. adj. [from cling. Apt to cling; Adhesive.

CLI'NICAL.† } adj. [Fr. clinique, from Gr.
CLI'NICK. } κλίνω, to lie down.] Those that keep their beds; those that are sick, past hopes of recovery. A clinical lecture is a discourse upon a disease, made by the bed of the patient.

A clinical convert is one that is converted on his death-bed. This word occurs often in the works of Bishop Taylor. See the substantive.

CLI'NICK.* n. s. [The Clinici, in the primitive church, were those that would not be baptized till they were ready to die. Hammond's Works, vol. iv. p. 515.] One on his death-bed.

We are all clinicks in this point; would fain have a baptism in reserve, a wash for all our sins, when we cannot possibly commit them any more.
Abp. Sancroft, Serm. p. 100.

Bring to us a clinick, or a lunatick, or a demoniack, and we will instantly restore him sound, and in health, without any other conjuration and charm than that of his powerful name.
Killingbeck, Serm. p. 131.

To CLINK.† v. a. [perhaps softened from clank, or corrupted from click, Dr. Johnson says. I would rather suppose click a corruption of clink. However, clink is the Teut. klincken, to ring, to make a shrill noise; Germ. also klingen.] To strike so as to make a small sharp noise. One of our oldest verbs.

I shall clinken you so mery a bell,
That I shall waken all this compagnie.
Chaucer, Shipm. Tale, Prol.

And let me the canakin clink. Shaksp. Othello.

Five years! a long lease for the clinking of pewter.
Shakspeare.

To CLINK. v. n. To utter a small, sharp, interrupted noise.

The sever'd bars,
Submissive clink against your brazen portals.
Prior.

Underneath th' umbrella's oily shed,
Safe thro' the wet on clinking pattens tread.
Gay, Trivia.

CLINK.† n. s. [from the verb.]

1. A sharp successive noise; a knocking.

I heard the clink and fall of swords. Shaksp.

2. It seems in Spenser to have some unusual sense. I believe the knocker of a door, Dr. Johnson says. If he had looked into the contemporary exposition of Spenser's old words, he would have found that it is used by the poet for a key-hole.

Tho' creeping close, behind the wicket's clink,
Privily he peeped out through a chink.
Spenser, Shep. Cal.

CLI'NQUANT.† adj. [Fr.] Dressed in embroidery, in spangles, false glitter, tinsel finery.

To-day the French,
All clinquant, all in gold, like heathen gods,
Shone down the English. Shaksp.

A clinquant petticoat of some rich stuff,
To catch the eye. Beaum. & Fl. Maid in the Mill.

To CLIP.† v. a. [clippan, Saxon, from the Goth. klypa, to strain closely. See To CLASP.]

1. To embrace, by throwing the arms round; to hug; to enfold in the arms.

He, that before shunn'd her, to shun such harms
Now runs and takes her in his clipping arms. Sid.

Here I clip
The anvil of my sword, and do contest
Hotly, and nobly with thy love. Shaksp.

O nation, that thou couldst remove
That Neptune's arms, who clippeth thee about.
Shakspeare.

Enter the city, clip your wives; your friends,
Tell them your feats. Shakspeare.

The jades
That drag the tragick melancholy night,
Who with their drowsy, slow, and flagging wings,
Clip dead men's graves. Shaksp.

The oak's not envious of the sailing cedar,
The lusty vine not jealous of the ivy,
Because she clips the elm. B. & Fl. Lover's Prog.

The male resteth on the back of the female, clipping and embracing her with his legs about the neck and body. Ray.

2. To cut with sheers. [klipper, Danish; klippen, Dutch; apparently from the same radical sense, since sheers cut by inclosing and embracing. The Sax. clýpan also is to clip or cut.]

Your sheers come too late to clip the bird's wings, that already is flown away. Sidney.

Then let him, that my love shall blame,
Or clip love's wings, or quench love's flame.
Suckling.

He clips hope's wings, whose airy bliss
Much higher than fruition is. Denham.

But love had clipp'd his wings, and cut him short,
Confin'd within the purlieus of his court.
Dryden, Fables.

If mankind had had wings, as perhaps some extravagant atheist may think us deficient in that, all the world must have consented to clip them.
Bentley.

By this lock, this sacred lock, I swear,
Which never more shall join its parted hair,
Clipp'd from the lovely head where late it grew.
Pope.

He spent every day ten hours dozing, clipping papers, or darning his stockings. Swift.

3. Sometimes with off.

We should then have as much feeling upon the clipping off a hair, as the cutting of a nerve.
Bentley, Serm.

4. It is particularly used of those who diminish coin, by paring the edges.

This design of new coinage, is just of the nature of clipping. Locke.

5. To curtail; to cut short.

That they added, changed, or clipped any thing from the tenor of their commission.
Harmar, Tr. of Beza's Serm. (1587,) p. 401.

All my reports go with the modest truth,
Nor more, nor clipt, but so. Shaksp. K. Lear.

Mrs. Mayoress clipp'd the king's English.
Addison, Spect.

Even in London, they clip their words after one manner about the court, another in the city, and a third in the suburbs. Swift.

6. To confine; to hold; to contain.

Where is he living, clipt in with the sea,
Who calls me pupil? Shaksp. Hen. IV. P. I.

To CLIP. v. n. A phrase in falconry.

Some falcon stoops at what her eye design'd
And with her eagerness the quarry miss'd,
Streight flies at check, and clips it down the wind.
Dryden.

CLIP.* n. s. [from the verb.] An embrace.

Finding these northern climes do coldly him embrace,
Not us'd to frozen clips, he strave to find some part,
Where with most ease and warmth he might employ his art. Sidney, Astrophel and Stella.

CLI'PPER.† n. s. [from clip.]

1. One that debases coin by cutting.

It is no English treason to cut
French crowns, and to-morrow the king
Himself will be a clipper. Shaksp.

No coins please some medallists more than those which had passed through the hands of an old Roman clipper. Addison.

2. A barber. Huloet.

CLI'PPING. n. s. [from clip.] The part cut or clipped off.

Beings purely material, without sense or thought, as the clippings of our beards, and parings of our nails. Locke.

To CLISH-CLASH.* v. n. [A reduplication of clash, in imitation of the sound. See To CLASH.] To sound like the clashing of swords.

The weapons clish-clash.
Mirrour for Magistrates, p. 481.

CLI'VER. n. s. An herb. More properly written cleaver.

It grows wild, the seeds sticking to the clothes of such as pass by them. It is sometimes used in medicine.
Miller.

CLOAK. n. s. [lach, Saxon.]

1. The outer garment, with which the rest are covered.

You may bear it,
Under a cloke that is of any length. Shaksp.

Their clokes were cloath of silver, mix'd with gold. Dryden.

All arguments will be as little able to prevail, as the wind did with the traveller to part with his cloak, which he held only the faster. Locke.

Nimbly he rose, and cast his garment down;
That instant in his cloak I wrapt me round.
Pope, Odyssey.

2. A concealment; a cover.

Not using your liberty for a cloak of maliciousness. 1 Peter, ii. 16.

To CLOAK.† v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To cover with a cloak.
2. To hide; to conceal.

Most heavenly fair, in deed and view,
She by creation was, 'till she did fall;
Thenceforth she sought for helps to cloak her crimes withal. Spenser, F. Q.

Neither let incest be coloured or covered with the cloked pretence of matrimonie.
Martin, Marr. of Priests, (1554,) ch. 10.

The most deboist and barbarous,
Believe it, the most void of all humanity,
Howe'r his cunning cloak it to his uncle.
Beaum. and Fl. Four Plays in One.

CLO'AKBAG. n. s. [from cloak and bag.] A portmanteau; a bag in which clothes are carried.

Why do'st thou converse with that trunk of humours, that stuffed cloakbag of guts? Shaksp.

I have already fit
('Tis in my cloakbag) doublet, hat, hose, all
That answers to them. Shakspeare.

CLO'CHARD.* n. s. [Fr. cloche, a bell; clocher, to ring a bell. V. Dict. Languedoc.] A belfry.

King Edward the Third built, in the little sanctuary, a clochard of stone and timber; and placed therein three bells for the use of St. Stephen's chapel. Weever, Fun. Mon. p. 491.

CLO'AKEDLY.* adv. [from the verb.] In a disguised or concealed manner.

The French ambassador came to declare, first how the emperour wronged divers of his master's subjects and vassals; arrested also his merchants, and did cloakedly begin war.
K. Edward VI. Journal, Burnet's Hist. Ref. ii.

CLOCK.† n. s. [clocc. Welsh, from clôch, a bell, Welsh and Armorick; cloche, French; cluc̣a, Sax.]

1. The instrument which, by a series of mechanical movements, tells the hour by a stroke upon a bell.

If a man be in sickness or pain, the time will seem longer without a clock or hour-glass than with it. Bacon.

The picture of Jerome usually described at his study, is with a clock hanging by.
Brown, Vulg. Err.

I told the clocks, and watch'd the wasting light.
Dryden.

2. It is an usual expression to say, What is it of the clock, for What hour is it? Or ten o'clock for the tenth hour.

What is't o'clock? ——
——Upon the stroke of four.
Shakspeare, K. Rich. III.

Macicaus set forward about ten o'clock in the night. Knolles, Hist. of the Turks.

About nine of the clock at night the king marched out of the North-port.
Clarendon, b. viii.

3. The clock of a stocking; the flowers or inverted work about the ankle.

His stockings with silver clocks were ravished from him. Swift.

4. An insect; a sort of beetle. Dict.
5. The sound which the hen makes in calling her chickens. See To CLOCK.

To CLOCK.* v. a. [Sax. cloccan; Teut. klocken; old Fr. cloucloquer; Lat. glocio.] To call, as the hen calls her chickens. See To CLUCK.

So long doth the great brood-hen clock her chickens, as she takes them to be her's. Ld. Northampton, Proceed. against Garnet, Ff. 4. b.

To CLOCK.* v. n. To make a noise like the hen.

That eggs were made before the hardy cock
Began to tread, or brooding hen to clock.
The Silkewormes, 1599.

CLO'CKMAKER. n. s. [clock and maker.] An artificer whose profession is to make clocks.

This inequality has been diligently observed by several of our ingenious clockmakers, and equations been made and used by them. Derham.

CLO'CKSETTER.* n. s. [from clock and set.] One who regulates the clock.

Old time the clocksetter, that bald sexton time.
Shakspeare, K. John.

CLO'CKWORK. n. s. [clock and work.] Movements by weights or springs, like those of a clock.

So if unprejudic'd you scan
The goings of this clockwork, man;
You find a hundred movements made
By fine devices in his head:

But 'tis the stomach's solid stroke,
That tells this being, what's o'clock. Prior.
Within this hollow was Vulcan's shop, full of fire and clockwork. Addison, Guardian.
You look like a puppet moved by clockwork. Arbuthnot.

CLOD. n. s. [clud, Sax. a little hillock; klotte, Dutch.]

1. A lump of earth or clay; such a body of earth as cleaves or hangs together.
The earth that casteth up from the plough a great clod, is not so good as that which casteth up a smaller clod. Bacon.
I'll cut up, as plows
Do barren lands, and strike together flints
And clods, the ungrateful senate and the people. B. Jonson.
Who smooths with harrows, or who pounds with rakes
The crumbling clods. Dryden.

2. A turf; the ground.
Byzantians boast, that on the clod,
Where once their sultan's horse has trod,
Grows neither grass, nor shrub, nor tree. Swift.

3. Any thing concreted together in a cluster.
Fishermen who make holes in the ice to dip up fish with their nets, light on swallows congealed in clods of a slimy substance, and carrying them home to their stoves, the warmth restoreth them to life and flight. Carew.

4. A lump; a mass of metal.
One at the forge
Labouring, two massy clods of iron and brass
Had melted. Milton, P. L.

5. Any thing vile, base, and earthy; as the body of man, compared to his soul.
And ye high heavens, the temple of the gods,
In which a thousand torches, flaming bright,
Do burn, that to us wretched earthly clods,
In dreadful darkness, lend desired light. Spenser, Epithal.
The spirit of man,
Which God inspir'd cannot together perish
With this corporeal clod. Milton, P. L.
How the purer spirit is united to this clod, is a knot too hard for our degraded intellects to untie. Glanville.
In moral reflections there must be heat as well as dry reason, to inspire this cold clod of clay, which we carry about with us. Burnet, Theory.

6. A dull, gross, stupid fellow; a dolt.
The vulgar! a scarce animated clod,
Ne'er pleas'd with aught above 'em. Dryden.

To CLOD. v. n. [from the noun.] To gather into concretions; to coagulate; for this we sometimes use clot.
Let us go find the body, and from the stream,
With lavers pure, and cleansing herbs, wash off
The clodded gore. Milton, S. A.

To CLOD. v. a. [from the noun.] To pelt with clods.

CLO'DDY.† adj. [Sax. clubiz.]

1. Consisting of earth or clods; earthy; muddy; miry; mean; gross; base.
The glorious sun,
Turning, with splendour of his precious eye,
The meagre cloddy earth to glittering gold. Shakspeare.

2. Full of clods unbroken.
These lands they sow always under furrow about Michaelmas, and leave it as cloddy as they can. Mortimer, Husbandry.

This idea, which we may call the goddess of painting and of sculpture, descends upon the marble and the cloth, and becomes the original of these arts. Dryden, Pref. Dufresnoy.

4. Any texture put to a particular use.

The king stood up under his cloth of state, took the sword from the protector, and dubbed the Lord Mayor of London knight. Sir J. Hayward.

I'll make the very green cloth to look blue.
B. Jonson.

5. Dress; raiment.

I'll ne'er distrust my God for cloath and bread
While lilies flourish, and the raven's fed. Quarles.

6. Cloth taken absolutely, commonly means a texture of wool.

7. In the plural. Dress; habit; garment; vesture; vestments. Including whatever covering is worn on the body. In this sense always clothes. Pronounced clo's.

He with him brought Pryene, rich array'd
In Claribellaes clothes. Spenser, F. Q. ii. iv. 28.

Take up these clothes here quickly: carry them to the laundress in Datchet mead.
Shakspeare, Merry Wives of Windsor.

Strength grows more from the warmth of exercise than of cloaths. Temple.

8. The covering of a bed.

Gazing on her midnight foes,
She turn'd each way her frighted head,
Then sunk it deep beneath the clothes. Prior.

To CLOTHE. v. a. pret. I clothed, or clad; particip. clothed, or clad. [from cloth.]

1. To invest with garments; to cover with dress, from cold and injuries.

An inhabitant of Nova Zembla having lived in Denmark, where he was clothed, took the first opportunity of making his escape into nakedness.
Addison, Freeholder.

The Britons in Cæsar's time painted their bodies, and cloathed themselves with the skins of beasts. Swift.

With superior boon may your rich soil
Exuberant nature's better blessings pour
O'er every land, the naked nations clothe,
And be the exhaustless granary of a world.
Thomson.

2. To adorn with dress.

We clothe and adorn our bodies: indeed, too much time we bestow upon that. Our souls also are to be clothed with holy habits, and adorned with good works. Ray on Creation.

Embroider'd purple clothes the golden beds.
Pope, Statius.

3. To invest, as with clothes.

I put on righteousness, and it clothed me.
Job, xxix. 14.

Hast thou clothed his neck with thunder?
Job, xxxix. 19.

I will also clothe her priests with salvation.
Psalm cxxxii. 16.

If thou beest he; but O how fall'n! how chang'd
From him, who in the happy realms of light,
Cloth'd with transcendant brightness, did'st outshine
Myriads though bright! Milton, P. L.

They leave the shady realms of night,
And, cloth'd in bodies, breathe your upper light.
Dryden.

Let both use the clearest language in which they can clothe their thoughts. Watts on the Mind.

4. To furnish or provide with clothes.

Drousiness shall clothe a man with rags.
Proverbs, xxiii. 21.

To CLOTHE. v. n. To wear clothes.

Care no more to clothe and eat. Shaksp. Cymb.

CLO'THIER. n. s. [from cloth.] A maker of cloth.

The clothiers all, not able to maintain
The many to them 'longing, have put off
The spinsters, carders, fullers, weavers.
Shakspeare, Henry VIII.

His commissioners should cause clothiers to take wool, paying only two parts of the price.
Hayward.

They shall only spoil the clothier's wool, and beggar the present spinners, at best.
Graunt's Bills of Mortality.

CLO'THING. n. s. [from To clothe.] Dress; vesture; garments.

Thy bosom might receive my yielded spright,
And thine with it, in heaven's pure clothing drest,
Through clearest skies might take united flight.
Fairfax.

Your bread and clothing, and every necessary of life, entirely depend upon it. Swift.

CLO'THSHEARER. n. s. [from cloth and shear.] One who trims the cloth, and levels the nap.

My father is a poor man, and by his occupation a cloth shearer. Hakewill on Provid. p. 436.

CLO'THWORKER.* n. s. [from cloth and work.] A maker of cloth.

Clothworkers, plaisterers, and other inferiour trades, in their policy this way exceed those of a higher rank.
Scott's Essay on Drapery, &c. (1655.) p. 165.

CLO'TPOLL. n. s. [from clot and poll.]

1. Thickskull; blockhead.

What says the fellow, there? call the clott-poll back. Shakspeare.

2. Head in scorn.

I have sent Cloten's clotpoll down the stream,
In embassy to his mother. Shaksp. Cymbeline.

To CLO'TTER. v. n. [klotteren, Dutch.] To concrete; to coagulate; to gather into lumps.

He dragged the trembling sire,
Sliddering through clottered blood and holy mire.
Dryden, Æneid.

CLO'TTY. adj. [from clot.] Full of clods; concreted; full of concretions.

The matter expectorated is thin, and mixed with thick, clotty bluish streaks.
Harvey on Consumptions.

Where land is clotty, and a shower of rain soaks through, you may make use of a roll to break it.
Mortimer.

CLOUD.† n. s. [The derivation is not known. Minsheu derives it from claudo, to shut; Somner from clod; Casaubon from αχλὺς, darkness; Skinner from kladde, Dutch, a spot. So far Dr. Johnson. To these may be added Junius, who derives it from the Greek κλύδων, a wave, because of the resemblance of a cloud to a wave. Serenius cites the old Goth. glâte, a clear vapour; and laud, moisture. But Mr. H. Tooke thinks it the Sax. participle ge-hlod, covered; the word being thus formed, gehloud, gloud, cloud.]

1. The dark collection of vapours in the air.

Now are the clouds that lower'd upon our house,
In the deep bosom of the ocean buried.
Shakspeare, Rich. III.

As a mist is a multitude of small but solid globules, which therefore descend; so a vapour, and therefore a watry cloud, is nothing else but a congeries of very small and concave globules, which therefore ascend, to that height in which they are of equal weight with the air, where they remain suspended, 'till, by some motion in the air, being broken, they descend in solid drops; either small, as in a mist, or bigger, when many of them run together, as in rain. Grew's Cosmology.

Clouds are the greatest and most considerable of all the meteors, as furnishing water and plenty to the earth. They consist of very small drops of water, and are elevated a good distance above the surface of the earth; for a cloud is nothing but a mist flying high in the air, as a mist is nothing but a cloud here below.
Locke, Elem. Nat. Philos.

How vapours, turn'd to clouds, obscure the sky;
And clouds, dissolv'd, the thirsty ground supply.
Roscommon.

The dawn is overcast, the morning low'rs,
And heavily in clouds brings on the day. Addison.

2. The veins, marks, or stains in stones, or other bodies.

3. Any state of obscurity or darkness.

Cromwell, our chief of men, who through a cloud
Not of war only, but detractions, rude, &c.
Milton, Sonn. xvi.

Though poets may of inspiration boast,
Their rage, ill govern'd, in the clouds is lost.
Waller.

The bishop of London did cut down a noble cloud of trees at Fulham: the lord chancellor told him that he was "a good expounder of dark places."
Aubrey, Relat. of Ld. Bacon's Apophthegms.

How can I see the brave and young,
Fall in the cloud of war, and fall unsung? Addison.

4. Any thing that spreads wide; as a croud, a multitude.

The objection comes to no more than this, that amongst a cloud of witnesses, there was one of no very good reputation. Atterbury.

To CLOUD.† v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To darken with clouds; to cover with clouds; to obscure.

2. To make of sullen and gloomy appearance.

Be not dishearten'd then, nor cloud those looks,
That wont to be more cheerful and serene.
Milton, P. L.

What sullen fury clouds his scornful brow?
Pope, Statius.

3. To obscure; to make less evident.

If men would not exhale vapours to cloud and darken the clearest truths, no man could miss his way to heaven for want of light.
Decay of Piety.

4. To variegate with dark veins.

The handle smooth and plain
Made of the clouded olive's easy grain.
Pope, Odyssey.

5. To sully; to defame.

I would be not a stander-by to hear
My sovereign mistress clouded so.
Shakspeare, Winter's Tale.

To CLOUD.† v. n. To grow cloudy; to grow dark with clouds.

[Her] beams upon his hairless face are fix'd,
As if from thence they borrow'd all their shine:
Were never four such lamps together mix'd,
Had not his clouded with his brows' repine;
But her's, which through the crystal tears gave light,
Shone like the moon, in water seen by night.
Shakspeare, Ven. and Adonis.

CLO'UDBERRY. n. s. [from cloud and berry; chamæmorus.] The name of a plant, called also knotberry. Miller.

CLO'UDASCENDING.* adj. [from cloud and ascend.] Mounting to the clouds.

Like tall cedars mounted on
Cloud-ascending Lebanon. Sandys, Ps. 92.

CLO'UDBORN.* adj. [from cloud and born.] Born of a cloud.

Like cloud-born centaurs, from the mountain's height
With rapid course descending to the fight,
They rush along; the rattling woods give way;
The branches bend before the sweepy sway.
Dryden, Virg. Æn. 7.

CLO'UDCAPT. adj. [from cloud and cap.] Topped with clouds; touching the clouds.

The cloudcapt towers, the gorgeous palaces,
The solemn temples, the great globe itself,
Yea, all which it inherits, shall dissolve. Shaksp.

CLO'UDCOMPELLING.† adj. [A word formed in imitation of νεφεληγέρετης, ill understood.]

1. An epithet of Jupiter, by whom clouds were supposed to be collected.

Health to both kings, attended with a roar
Of cannons, echo'd from the affrighted shore;
With loud resemblance of his thunder, prove
Bacchus the seed of cloudcompelling Jove. Waller.

Supplicating move
Thy just complaint to cloudcompelling Jove. Dryd.

2. Simply, collecting clouds.

Abyssinia's cloud-compelling cliffs.
Thomson, Autumn.

CLO'UDCOVERED.* adj. [from cloud and cover.] Wrapt in clouds.

Witness, thou Sinai! whose cloud-cover'd height,
And shaken basis, own'd the present God.
Young, Night Th. 7.

CLO'UDECLIPSED.* adj. [from cloud and eclipse.] Eclipsed by the intervention of a cloud.

Why her two suns were cloud-eclipsed so,
Nor why her fair cheeks over-wash'd with woe.
Shakspeare, Rape of Lucrece.

CLO'UDDISPELLING.* adj. [from cloud and dispel.] Having power to disperse.

The northern breath, that freezes floods, he binds,
With all the race of cloud-dispelling winds.
Dryden, Ovid.

CLO'UDKISSING.* adj. [from cloud and kiss.] Touching, as it were, the clouds.

Threatening cloud-kissing Ilion with annoy.
Shakspeare, Rape of Lucrece.

At length we gaine
A steepe cloud-kissing rocke, whose horned crowne
With proud imperiall looke beholds the maine.
Mir. for Mag. p. 650.

CLO'UDTOPT.* adj. [from cloud and top.] Having the top covered with clouds.

Mountains, ye mourn in vain
Modred, whose magick song
Made huge Plinlimmon bow his cloud-topt head.
Gray, The Bard.

CLO'UDTOUCHING.* adj. [from cloud and touch.] Ascending, as it were, to the clouds.

Cloud-touching mountains to new seats are borne
From their foundations, by his fury torne.
Sandys, Job, p. 14.

Propt by thy hand,
Cloud-touching mountains stedfast stand.
Sandys, Ps. p. 101.

CLO'UDILY. adv. [from cloudy.]

1. With clouds; darkly.

2. Obscurely; not perspicuously.

Some had rather have good discipline delivered plainly, by way of precepts, than cloudily enwrapped in allegories. Spenser, on Ireland.

He was commanded to write so cloudily by Cornutus. Dryden.

CLO'UDINESS. n. s. [from cloudy.]

1. The state of being covered with clouds; darkness.

You have such a February face,
So full of frost, of storm and cloudiness. Shaksp.

The situation of this island exposes it to a continual cloudiness, which in the summer renders the air colder, and in the winter warm.
Harvey on Consumptions.

2. Want of brightness.

I saw a cloudy Hungarian diamond made clearer by lying in a cold liquor; wherein, he affirmed, that upon keeping it longer, the stone would lose more of its cloudiness. Boyle.

CLO'UDLESS.† adj. [from cloud.] Without clouds; clear; unclouded; bright; luminous; lightsome; pure; undarkened.

As the morning light,
The cloudless morning, so should be thine house.
Peele, David and Bethsabe, 1599.

This Partridge soon shall view in cloudless skies,
When next he looks thro' Galilæo's eyes. Pope.

How many such there must be in the vast extent of space, a naked eye in a cloudless night might give us some faint glimpse. Cheyne, Phil. Princ.

CLO'UDY.† adj. [from cloud.]

1. Covered with clouds; obscured with clouds; consisting of clouds.

As Moses entered into the tabernacle, the cloudy pillar descended, and stood at the door.
Exodus, xxxiii. 9.

At last his sail-broad vans
He spreads for flight, and in the surging smoke
Uplifted spurns the ground; thence many a league,
As in a cloudy chair, ascending rides.
Milton, P. L.

2. Dark; obscure; not intelligible.

If you content yourself frequently with words instead of ideas, or with cloudy and confused notions of things, how impenetrable will that darkness be? Watts on the Mind.

3. Gloomy of look, not open, nor cheerful.

So my storm-beaten heart likewise is cheer'd
With that sun-shine, when cloudy looks are clear'd.
Spenser.

Witness my son, now in the shade of death,
Whose bright outshining beams thy cloudy wrath
Hath in eternal darkness folded up. Shakspeare.

4. Marked with spots or veins.

5. Not bright; wanting lustre, or clearness.

I saw a cloudy diamond. Boyle.

Before the wine grows cloudy, shake the hogshead, and carry a glass of it to your master.
Swift, Direct. to the Butler.

CLOVE. the preterite of cleave. See To CLEAVE.

Gyon's angry blade so fierce did play
On the other's helmet, which as Titan shone,
That quite it clove his plumed crest in tway.
Spenser, F. Q.

CLOVE.† n. s. [clou, Fr. a nail, from the similitude of a clove to a nail, Dr. Johnson says; but it is perhaps from the Sax. clufe.]

1. A valuable spice brought from Ternate in the East Indies. It is the fruit or seed of a very large tree.

Clove seems to be the rudiment or beginning of a fruit growing upon clove-trees.
Brown, Vulg. Err.

2. Some of the parts into which garlick separates, when the outer skin is torn off. [In this sense it is derived from clove, the preterite of cleave.]

'Tis mortal sin an onion to devour;
Each clove of garlick is a sacred pow'r.
Tate, Juvenal.

CLOVE-GILLYFLOWER. n. s. [from its smelling like cloves.]

This genus may be divided into three classes: 1. The clove-gillyflower, or carnation. 2. The pink. 3. The sweet William. The carnation or clove-gillyflower, are distinguished into four classes. The first, called flakes, having two colours only, and their stripes large, going quite through the leaves. The second, called bizars, have flowers striped, or variegated with three or four different colours. The third are piquetts: these flowers have always a white ground, and are spotted with scarlet, red, purple, or other colours. The fourth are called painted ladies: these have their petals of a red or purple colour on the upper side, and are white underneath. Of each of these classes there are numerous varieties. The true clove-gillyflower has been long in use for making a cordial syrup. There are two or three varieties commonly brought to the markets, which differ greatly in goodness; some having very little scent, when compared with the true sort. Miller.

CLO'VEN.† part. pret. [from cleave. Sax. cloꝑen.] See To CLEAVE.

There is Aufidius, list you what work he makes
Among your cloven army. Shakspeare.
Now, heap'd high,
The cloven oaks and lofty pines do lie. Waller.
A chap-fallen beaver, loosely hanging by
The cloven helm, and arch of victory. Dryden.

CLO'VEN-FOOT.* adj. [Sax. cluꝑen-ꝑoꝛe.] Relating to a foot divided into two parts. See CLOVEN-FOOTED.

I think there are two more trusty characters to distinguish the apparition of an evil from a good angel, than the cloven-foot vulgar opinion affixeth to the devil. Spenser on Prodigies, p. 231.

CLO'VEN-FOOTED. } adj. [cloven and foot,
CLO'VEN-HOOFED. } or hoof.] Having the foot divided into two parts; not a round hoof; bisulcous.

There are the bis ulcous or cloven-hoofs; as camels and beavers. Brown, Vulg. Err.
The cloven-footed fiend is banish'd from us.
Dryden.
Great variety of water fowl, both whole and cloven-footed, frequent the waters.
Ray on the Creation.

CLO'VER. } n. s. [more properly
CLO'VER-FLOWER.* } claver, clæꝑep, Sax.
CLO'VER-GRASS. } klaver, Dutch. See CLAVER. The Sax. exhibits also clyꝑep. The word is, no doubt, from the verb cleꝑan, to cleave, from the appearance of the cleaved leaves.]

1. A species of trefoil.

The even mead, that erst brought sweetly forth
The freckled cowslip, burnet, and green clover.
Shakspeare.
Nature shall provide
Green grass and fatt'ning clover for their fare.
Dryden, Virg.
Clover improves land, by the great quantity of cattle it maintains. Mortimer's Husbandry.
The crow-flower, and thereby the clover-flower they stick. Drayton, Polyolb. S. 15.
My Blouzelinda is the blithest lass,
Than primrose sweeter, or the clover-grass. Gay.

2. To live in CLOVER, is to live luxuriously; clover being extremely delicious and fattening to cattle.

Well, Laureat, was the night in clover spent.
Ogle.

CLO'VERED.† adj. [from clover.] Covered with clover.

Flocks thick nibbling thro' the clover'd vale.
Thomson, Summer.
Through the deep groves I hear the chaunting birds,
And through the clover'd vale the various lowing herds. T. Warton, Ode 8.

CLOUGH.† n. s. [clough, Saxon; cloiche, Irish, a rock.] The cleft of a hill; a cliff. In composition a hilly place, Dr. Johnson says. In Northumberland, it means a valley between two hills; a narrow glen. The old Norm. or Fr. clough is a valley, whence perhaps the the introduction of the word into Domesday Book.

A clough, or clowgh, is a kind of breach or valley down a slope from the side of a hill.
Verstegan, Restit. of Decayed Intell. ch. 9.

CLOUGH. n. s. [in commerce.] An allowance of two pounds in every hundred weight for the turn of the scale, that the commodity may hold out weight when sold by retail.

CLOUT.† n. s. [clut, Saxon.]

1. A cloth for any mean use.

His garment, nought but many ragged clouts,
With thorns together pinn'd, and patched was.
Spenser, F. Q.
A clout upon that head
Where late the diadem stood. Shakspeare, Hamlet.
In power of spittle and a clout,
When-e'er he please to blot it out. Swift.

2. A patch on a shoe or coat.

No man putteth a clout of boistrous cloth into an olde clothing, for it doith away the fulnesse of the cloth, and a worse brekynge is made.
Wicliffe, St. Matt. ix.

3. Anciently, the mark of white cloth at which archers shot. [clouette, Fr.]

He drew a good bow: he shot a fine shoot: he would have clapt in the clout at twelve score.
Shakspeare, Hen. IV. P. II.

4. An iron plate to keep an axle-tree from wearing.

5. A blow; as, a clout on the ear: a vulgarism. But see To CLOUT.

To CLOUT.† v. a. [from the noun. "To sette peces to a thynge, or clowten." Prompt. Parv. To clout boots or shoes, is to strengthen them with clout or hob-nails, old Fr. clou, clouët, a little nail; and sometimes with a thin plate of iron, called a clout.]

1. To patch; to mend coarsely.

Can you clout me a payre of botes?
I wolde have them well underlayed, and easily,
For I use alwaye to goe on the one side.
Old Morality of Hycke Scorner.
Wynchester, when he either preacheth or disputeth, how he clowteth the old broken holes with patches of papistry.
Bale, Yet a Course, &c. fol. 98. b.
I thought he slept, and put
My clouted brogues from off my feet, whose rudeness
Answer'd my steps too loud. Shakspeare, Cymb.
The dull swain
Treads on it daily with his clouted shoon.
Milton, Com.

2. To cover with a cloth.

Milk some unhappy ewe,
Whose clouted leg her hurt doth shew.
Spenser, Shep. Cal.

3. To join awkwardly or coarsely together.

All their divine service is notably patched up and clouted therewith, [idolatry.]
Harmer, Tr. of Beza's Serm. p. 412
Many sentences of one meaning clouted up together. Ascham.

To CLOUT.* v. a. [perhaps from the Dutch, klouw, a blow or stroke, most properly with the fist; klouwen, to strike or bang.] To beat; to strike.

I wis, with his fist he wolde all-to clout you.
Old Morality of Hycke Scorner.
Pay him o'er the pate, clout him for all his courtesies. Beaum. and Fl. Women pleas'd.
The late queen of Spain took off one of her chapines, and clowted Olivarez about the noddle with it. Howell, Lett. ii. 43.

CLO'UTED.† particip. adj. Congealed; coagulated: corruptly used for clotted.

With flawns, and clowted creame, and country dainties stored. Drayton, Polyolb. S. 14.
I've seen her skim the clouted cream,
And press from spongy curds the milky stream.
Gay.

CLO'UTERLY.† adj. [probably by corruption from louterly, Dr. Johnson says. But it is rather from the Teut. kloete, a stupid fellow.] Clumsy; awkward: as, a clouterly fellow.

The single wheel plough is a very clouterly sort.
Mortimer's Husbandry.
Let us observe Spenser with all his rusty, obsolete words; with all his rough-hewn, clowterly verses; yet take him throughout, and we shall find in him a graceful and poetick majesty.
Phillips, Theatr. Poet. 1675. Pref.

CLOWN.† n. s. [imagined by Skinner and Junius to be contracted from colonus. It seems rather a Saxon word, corrupted from lown; loen, Dutch, a word nearly of the same import. Lye, in his additions to Junius, deduces it from the Cimbr. luin, idle, stupid, slow. Serenius proposes the old Goth. klunnalegr, rude, and klenne, a slave.]

1. A rustick; a country fellow; a churl.

He came with all his clowns, horst upon eart-jades Sidney.
The clowns, a boist'rous, rude, ungovern'd crew,
With furious haste to the loud summons flew.
Dryden.

2. A coarse ill-bred man.

In youth a coxcomb, and in age a clown.
Spectator.
A country squire, represented with no other vice but that of being a clown, and having the provincial accent. Swift.

3. Formerly, a domestick fool, or licensed jester; an eccentric character in the old mysteries and moralities; the buffoon of the morris dance; the fool in the ancient exhibitions, or dumb shews, at fairs; and thence perhaps, in modern times, the laughter-stirring clumsy mimick in our pantomimes.

To CLOWN.* v. n. To affect the behaviour of a clown.

Beshrew me, he clowns it properly indeed.
B. Jonson, Every Man out of his Humour.
When Tarlton clown'd it in a pleasant vein,
And with conceits did good opinion gain;
Upon the stage, his merry humour's shop,
Clowns knew the clown by his great clownish slop.
The Letting of Humors' Blood, &c. 1611, Epigr. 31.

CLO'WNAGE.* n. s. [from clown.] The behaviour of a clown.

And he to serve me thus! ingratitude,
Beyond the coarseness yet of any clownage
Shewn to a lady! B. Jonson, Tale of a Tub.

CLO'WNERY.† n. s. [from clown.] Ill-breeding; churlishness; rudeness; brutality.

That's a court indeed,
Not mix'd with clowneries us'd in common houses.
Chapman's Bussy D'Ambois.

The fool's conceit hath both clownery and ill-nature. L'Estrange.

CLO'WNISH.† adj. [from clown.]

1. Consisting of rusticks or clowns; relating to them.

I come not to eat with ye, and to surfeit
In these poor clownish pleasures.
Beaum. and Fl. The Prophetess.

Young Silvia beats her breast, and cries aloud
For succour from the clownish neighbourhood.
Dryden.

2. Coarse; rough; rugged.

But with his clownish hands their tender wings
He brusheth off. Spenser, F. Q. i. i. 23.

3. Uncivil; ill-bred; ill-mannered.

What if we essay'd to steal
The clownish fool out of your father's court? Shaks.

4. Clumsy; ungainly.

There was amongst his nearest attendants, one Henry Cuffe, a man of secret ambitious ends of his own, and of proportionate counsels smothered under the habit of a scholar, and slubbered over with a certain rude and clownish fashion, that had the semblance of integrity.
Wotton, Parallel, &c.

With a grave look, in this odd equipage,
The clownish mimick traverses the stage. Prior.

CLO'WNISHLY.† adv. [from clownish.] Coarsely; rudely; brutally. Sherwood.

CLO'WNISHNESS.† n. s. [from clownish.]

1. Rusticity; coarseness; unpolished rudeness.

Even his Dorick dialect has an incomparable sweetness in its clownishness. Dryden.

If the boy should not make legs very gracefully, a dancing master will cure that defect, and wipe off that plainness which the à-la-mode people call clownishness. Locke.

2. Incivility; brutality.

'Tis clownishness, they say, to reject any,
And folly too. Fanshawe, Past. Fid. i. 2.

CLOWN'S MUSTARD. n. s. An herb. Dict.

To CLOY.† v. a. [enclouer, Fr. from the Lat. claudere, to shut, i. e. so to fill, as that there is no place left for any more. To cloy with pleasure, is common; but to cloy with woe, not so. Yet Milton uses the latter expression.] To nail up; to stop up.

1. To satiate; to sate; to fill beyond desire; to surfeit; to fill to loathing.

The length of those speeches had not cloyed Pyrocles, though he were very impatient of long deliberations. Sidney.

The very creed of Athanasius, and that sacred hymn of glory, are reckoned as superfluities, which we must in any case pare away, lest we cloy God with too much service. Hooker. v. § 42.

Who can cloy the hungry edge of appetite,
By bare imagination of a feast! Shakspeare.

For cloyd with woes and trouble store,
Surcharg'd my soul doth lie. Milton, Ps. lxxxviii.

Continually varying the same sense, and taking up what he had more than enough inculcated before, he sometimes cloys his readers instead of satisfying them. Dryden.

Whose little store her well taught mind does please,
Nor pinch'd with want, nor cloy'd with wanton ease. Roscommon.

Intemperance in eating and drinking, instead of delighting and satisfying nature, doth but load and cloy it. Tillotson.

Settle, cloy'd with custard and with praise.
Is gather'd to the dull of ancient days. Pope.

2. It seems to have, in the following passage, another sense: perhaps to strike the beak together, Dr. Johnson says. But it means to claw the beak, an accustomed action, Mr. Steevens says, with hawks and eagles. Cloy is used for cley, which, as well as clee, in our old language, is the same as claw. See CLEES.

His royal bird
Prunes the immortal wing, and cloys his beak,
As when his god is pleas'd Shakspeare.

3. To nail up guns, by striking a spike into the touch-hole. It is also a term used among farriers, when a horse is pricked with a nail in shoeing. Kersey. [old Fr. cloier, to prick.] To the latter of these senses may be referred the following passage in Spenser.

That foe of his, [the boar,]
Which with his cruel tuske him deadly cloy'd.
Spenser, F. Q. iii. vi. 48.

CLO'YLESS. adj. [from cloy.] Of which too much cannot be had; that cannot cause satiety.

Epicurean cooks
Sharpen with cloyless sauce his appetite. Shaks.

CLO'YMENT. n. s. [from cloy.] Satiety; repletion beyond appetite.

Alas! their love may be called appetite:
No motion of the liver, but the palate,
That suffers surfeit, cloyment, and revolt.
Shakspeare.

CLUB.† n. s. [clwppa, Welsh; kluppel, Dutch.]

1. A heavy stick; a staff intended for offence.

He strove his combred club to quit
Out of the earth. Spenser, F. Q.

As he pulled off his helmet, a butcher slew him with the stroak of a club. Hayward.

Arm'd with a knotty club another came.
Dryden.

2. The name of one of the suits of cards.

The clubs black tyrant first her victim died,
Spite of his haughty mien and barb'rous pride.
Pope.

3. [From cleopan, to divide. Skinner.] The shot or dividend of a reckoning, paid by the company in just proportions.

A fuddling couple sold ale: their humour was to drink drunk, upon their own liquour: they laid down their club, and this they called forcing a trade.
L'Estrange.

4. An assembly of good fellows, meeting under certain conditions, Dr. Johnson says; and he cites, in proof of this, only the example from Dryden; in which factious clubs, however, can hadly be said to consist of good fellows. Nor is club of so confined a meaning as Dr. Johnson represents. For, under the adjective good, he describes "good fellows as companionable, sociable, merry fellows;" such, we may suppose, as Goldsmith's "club of choice spirits" consisted of, and not as members of the "humdrum club, where a man might sit in silence," Goldsmith's Ess. 4. In short, a club is not always an "assembly of good fellows" in Dr. Johnson's meaning; but an association of persons subjected to particular rules.

What right has any man to meet in factious clubs to vilify the government?
Dryden's Medal, Dedication.

The end of our club is to advance conversation and friendship, and to reward deserved persons with our interest and our recommendations. We admit none but men of wit and interest.
Swift, Letters.

This club of duellists, consisting only of men of honour, did not continue long, most of the members of it being put to the sword, or hanged, soon after its institution. Spectator, No. 9.

The club of ugly faces was instituted originally at Cambridge, in the merry reign of Charles II.
Spectator, No. 78.

Soon after his [Johnson's] return to London, which was in February 1764, was founded that club which existed long without a name, but at Mr. Garrick's funeral became distinguished by the title of THE LITERARY CLUB.
Boswell, Life of Johnson.

5. Concurrence; contribution; joint charge.

He's bound to vouch them for his own,
Though got by implicite generation,
And general club of all the nation. Hudibras.

6. An old term for a booby. Grose's Glossary, under Hertfordshire clubs and clouted shoon. See also CLUBBISH.

To CLUB.† v. n. [from the noun.]

1. To contribute to a common expence in settled proportions.

A taverne-haunter—sending for bottles of wine, and clubbing. White's First Cent. of Malignant Priests, 1643, p. 21.

This——was in a less proportion than what was paid by the inhabitants, who were chiefly concerned to pay for their own ease: I should not, my lord, be against the parson's continuing to club with them.
Bp. Nicolson, to the E. of Thanet, 1706.

2. To join to one effect; to contribute separate powers to one end.

'Till grosser atoms, tumbling in the stream
Of fancy, madly met, and clubb'd into a dream.
Dryden.

Every part of the body seems to club and contribute to the seed, else why should parents, born blind or deaf, sometimes generate children with the same imperfections? Ray.

Let sugar, wine, and cream together club,
To make that gentle viand, syllabub. King.

The owl, the raven, and the bat,
Clubb'd for a feather to his hat. Swift.

To CLUB. v. a. To pay a common reckoning.

Fibres being distinct, and impregnated by distinct spirits, how should they club their particular informations into a common idea?
Collier on Thought.

Plums and directors, Shylock and his wife,
Will club their testers now to take your life. Pope.

CLU'BBED.* adj. [from club.] Heavy, like a club.

When I bete my knaves,
She bringeth me the grete clobbed staves.
Chaucer, Monkes Tale, Prol.

CLU'BBER.* n. s. See CLUBBIST.

CLU'BBISH.* adj. [from club. An old adjective for clownish. Sherwood.] Rustick.

The highest trees be soonest blowen downe:
Ten kings do die before one clubbish clowne.
Mir. for Mag. p. 231.

I indeed did rule the clubbish train. Ibid. p. 474.

CLU'BBIST.* n. s. [from club.] One who belongs to a particular association. The word is modern; it was formerly a clubber, forgotten and disused; as in Characters annexed to two Essaies on Love and Marriage, 1657.

The difference between the clubbists and the old adherents to the monarchy of this country is hardly worth a scuffle. Burke on a Regicide Peace.

CLU'BFIST.* n. s. [from club and fist.] A large fist; applied contemptuously to persons.

The racscall rude, the rogue, the clubfist gript
My slender arme, and pluckt me on in hast.
Mir. for Mag. p. 40.

CLUBFI'STED.* adj. [from clubfist.] Having a large fist.

As Logick is clubfisted and crabbed, so she is terrible at first sight. Howell's Lett. i. v. 9.

CLUBFO'OTED.* adj. [from club and foot.] Short in the foot, or crooked in the foot; "crumpfooted." Cotgrave.

CLUBHE'ADED. adj. [club and head.] Having a thick head.

Small clubheaded anterinæ. Derham.

CLUBLA'W. n. s. [club and law.] Regulation by force; the law of arms.

The enemies of our happy establishment seem to have recourse to the laudable method of club-law, when they find all other means for enforcing the absurdity of their opinions to be ineffectual. Addison, Freeholder.

CLU'BMAN.* n. s. [from club and man.] One who carries a club.

Alcides, surnam'd Hercules,
The only clubman of his time.
Trag. of Soliman and Perseda.

CLU'BROOM. n. s. [club and room.] The room in which a club or company assembles.

These ladies resolved to give the pictures of their deceased husbands to the clubroom. Addison, Spectator.

To CLUCK.† v. n. [cloccian, Welsh; clochat, Armorick; cloccan, Saxon; klocken, Dutch.] To call chickens; as a hen.

Ducklings, though hatched by a hen, if she brings them to a river, in they go, though the hen clucks and calls to keep them out. Ray on the Creation.

To CLUCK.* v. a. To call, as a hen calls chickens. The following example has been given by Dr. Johnson under the verb neuter. See also To CLOCK.

She, poor hen, fond of no second brood,
Has cluck'd thee to the wars. Shakspeare, Coriol.

A few Christians, by clucking themselves into a conventicle, shall presently seem a complete body to themselves. Bp. Ganden's Hieraspistes, 1653, p. 125.

CLUE.* n. s. The same as CLEW, which see. "A clue of yarn or thread." Huloet.

Speak, is't so?
If it be not, you have wound a goodly clue.
Shakspeare, All's Well.

CLUMP.† n. s. [formed from lump, Dr. Johnson says. It is rather from the Germ. klump, a mass, a clod. The Su. klamp is also an unshapen piece of wood. Both perhaps from the Icel. klimpa.]

1. A shapeless piece of wood, or other matter, nearly equal in its dimensions.
2. A cluster of trees; a tuft of trees or shrubs: anciently a plump.

The small and circular clumps of firs, which I see planted upon some fine large swells, put me often in mind of a coronet placed on an elephant's or camel's back. Shenstone.

To CLU'MPER.* v. a. [Germ. klumpern.] To form into clumps or masses.

Vapours which now themselves consort
In several parts, and closely do conspire,
Clumper'd in balls of clouds.
More, Song of the Soul, Infin. of Worlds.

CLUMPS.† n. s. A numbscull. Skinner. In Lincolnshire, clumps is idle, lazy, unhandy. Grose. Perhaps a corruption of clumsy, which see. But clumperton was formerly our word for a clown. Sherwood. Clumpse is defined both by Sherwood and Cotgrave asleep, benummed.

CLU'MSILY. adv. [from clumsy.] Awkwardly; without readiness; without nimbleness; without grace.

He walks very clumsily and ridiculously. Ray on Creation.

This lofty humour is clumsily and inartificially managed when affected. Collier on Pride.

CLU'MSINESS. n. s. [from clumsy.] Awkwardness; ungainliness; want of readiness, nimbleness, or dexterity.

The drudging part of life is chiefly owing to clumsiness and ignorance, which either wants proper tools, or skill to use them. Collier on Fame.

CLU'MSY.† adj. [This word, omitted in other etymologists, is rightly derived by Bailey from lompsch, Dutch, stupid. In English, lump, clump, lumpish, clumpish, clumpishly, clumsily, clumsy. Still we may go to the Germ. klump, as the original; and not omit the Su. klampig, which means clumsy.] Awkward; heavy; artless; unhandy; without dexterity, readiness, or grace. It is used either of persons, or actions, or things.

The matter ductile and sequacious, apt to be moulded into such shapes and machines, even by clumsy fingers. Ray.

But thou in clumsy verse, unlick'd, unpointed,
Hast shamefully defy'd. Dryden.

That clumsy outside of a porter,
How could it thus conceal a courtier? Swift.

CLUNG.† The preterite and participle of cling, formerly also written clong. [Sax. ȝeclunȝne.]

CLUNG.† adj. [clunȝu, Sax.] Wasted with leanness; shrunk up with cold. See the citation from Shakspeare's Macbeth in To CLING. The word is yet used in the north of England for any thing shrivelled or shrunk. It is the past part of cling, rather than an adjective.

To CLUNG.† v. n. [clinȝan, Sax.]

1. To dry as wood does, when it is laid up after it is cut. See To CLING.
2. To adhere; to remain fixed.

Globes entire
Of crudled smoke, and heavy clunging mists.
More, Song of the Soul, Infin. of Worlds.

CLU'STER. n. s. [clyꝛcep, cluꝛcep, Sax. klister, Dutch.]

1. A bunch; a number of things of the same kind growing or joined together.

Grapes will continue fresh and moist all winter, if you hang them cluster by cluster in the roof of a warm room. Bacon.

A swelling knot is rais'd;
Whence, in short space, itself the cluster shows,
And from earth's moisture, mixt with sun-beams, grows. Denham.

The saline corpuscles of one liquor do variously act upon the tinging corpuscles of another, so as to make many of them associate into a cluster, whereby two transparent liquors may compose a coloured one. Newton.

An elm was near, to whose embraces led,
The curling vine her swelling clusters spread. Pope.

2. A number of animals gathered together.

As bees
Pour forth their populous youth about the hive
In clusters. Milton, P. L.

There with their clasping feet together clung,
And a long cluster from the laurel hung. Dryden.

3. A body of people collected: used in contempt.

We lov'd him; but like beasts
And coward nobles, gave way to your clusters,
Who did hoot him out o' the city. Shakspeare.

My friend took his station among a cluster of mob, who were making themselves merry with their betters. Addison.

To CLU'STER. v. n. [from the noun.] To grow in bunches; to gather into bunches, to congregate.

Forth flourish'd thick the clustering vine.
Milton, P. L.

Great father Bacchus to my song repair;
For clustering grapes are thy peculiar care.
Dryden.

Or from the forest, falls the cluster'd snow,
Myriads of gems. Thomson, Winter.

To CLU'STER.† v. a. To collect any thing into bodies.

Clouds cluster'd darkness, lightnings terrours stream'd. Sir W. Alexander's Hours, i. 73.

CLU'STER-GRAPE. n. s. [from cluster and grape.]

The small black grape is by some called the currant, or cluster-grape; which I reckon the forwardest of the black sort. Mortimer, Husbandry.

CLU'STERY.† adj. [from cluster.] Growing in clusters; full of clusters. Cotgrave, and Sherwood.

To CLUTCH.† v. a. [Of uncertain etymology, Dr. Johnson says. It is from the Sax. ȝe-læccan, to snatch, to seize; ȝeclihꝺ hanꝺ is the hand closed, the grasp or seizure having been made.]

1. To hold in the hand; to gripe; to grasp.

Is this a dagger that I see before me,
The handle toward my hand? Come, let me clutch thee. Shakspeare, Macbeth.

I'll trust the sea first,
When with her hollow murmurs she invites me
And clutches in her storms.
Beaum. and Fl. False One.

They,
Like moles within us, heave and cast about;
And, 'till they foot and clutch their prey,
They never cool. Herbert.

2. To comprize; to grasp.

A man may set the poles together in his head, and clutch the whole globe at one intellectual grasp. Collier on Thought.

3. To contract; to double the hand, so as to seize and hold fast.

Not that I have the power to clutch my hand,
When his fair angels would salute my palm.
Shakspeare, K. John.

CLUTCH.† n. s. [from the verb.]

1. The gripe; grasp; seizure.

His cloak hangs on his shoulders much like a fiddler's;—and he feares to touch the sides on't, or give it a wispe under his arme, for feare his dirty clutch should grease it. Characters about 1661, 12mo.

2. Generally in the plural, the paws, the talons.

It was the hard fortune of a cock to fall into the clutches of a cat. L'Estrange.

3. Hands, in a sense of rapacity and cruelty.

Your greedy slav'ring to devour,
Before 'twas in your clutches pow'r. Hudibras.
Set up the covenant on crutches,
'Gainst those who have us in their clutches.
Hudibras.
I must have great leisure, and little care of myself, if I ever more come near the clutches of such a giant. Stilling fleet.

CLU'TTER.† n. s. [See CLATTER. Dr. Johnson offers no etymology. Serenius gives the old Goth. klutr, debate, dispute. The Teut. verb kloteren or kleuteren, to beat or knock often, may be also looked upon as nearly allied to our word. Others give a Welsh etymon: "Cluther, clutters, in heaps. Welsh, cluder." Craven Dialect, 1824.] A noise; a bustle; a busy tumult; a hurry; a clamour. A low word.

He saw what a clutter there was with huge, over-grown pots, pans, and spits. L'Estrange.
The favourite child that just begins to prattle,
Is very humoursome, and makes great clutter,
'Till he has windows on his bread and butter.
King.
Prithee, Tim, why all this clutter?
Why ever in these raging fits? Swift.

To CLU'TTER.† v. n. [from the noun.] To make a noise, or bustle.

All that they
Bluster'd and clutter'd for, you play.
Lovelace, Luc. Posth. 1659, p. 73.

To CLU'TTER.* v. a. To hurry together; to put into confusion.

If I have not spoken of your Majesty encomiastically, your Majesty will be pleased to ascribe it to the law of a history, which clutters not praises together upon the first mention of a name, but rather disperses them, and weaves them, throughout the whole narration. L. Bacon to K. J. 1. Sir T. Mathews's Lett. (1660,) p. 32.

CLY'STER.† n. s. [Fr. clystère, Gr. κλυστὴρ from κλύζω, to wash.] A liquid remedy, or injection, introduced into the intestines by the fundament.

If nature relieves by a diarrhœa, without sinking the strength of the patient, it is not to be stopt, but promoted gently by emollient clysters.
Arbuthnot.

CLY'STER-PIPE.* n. s. The tube or pipe, by which a clyster is injected. "A certain bird, called Ibis, about the banks of the Nile, first taught the Egyptians the way of administering clysters; for this bird has been often observed, by means of his crooked bill intromitted into the anus, to inject salt water, as with a syringe, into its own bowels, and thereby to exonerate its paunch when too much obstructed." Greenhill's Art of Embalming, 1705, p. 232. Shakspeare uses the word clyster-pipe, in a contemptuous sense.

To CLY'STERIZE.* v. n. [old Fr. clysteriser.] To apply a clyster.
Cotgrave, and Sherwood.

CLY'STERWISE.* adv. In the manner of a clyster.

Grant an entire efficacy to this balsamick liquor, thus clysterwise immitted into the intestines.
Greenhill, Art of Embalming, p. 273.

To COACE'RVATE.† v. a. [coacervo, Latin.] To heap up together.

The collocation of the spirits in bodies, whether the spirits be coacervate or diffused.
Bacon, Nat. Hist.

If you could pry into my memory, you should discover there a huge magazine of your favours you have been pleased to do me, present and absent, safely stored up and coacervated, to preserve them from mouldering away in oblivion.
Howell, Lett. i. i. 33.

COACERVA'TION.† n. s. [old Fr. coacervation.] The act of heaping, or state of being heaped together.

The fixing of it is the equal spreading of the tangible parts, and the close coacervation of them.
Bacon, Nat. Hist.

COACH.† n. s. [coche, Fr. kotczy, among the Hungarians, by whom this vehicle is said to have been invented. Minsheu. Formerly written coch, see COACHMAKER; and, soon after its general use in this country, called quitch. "He kept his coach, which was rare in those days, [in the time of queen Elizabeth;] they then vulgarly called it a quitch." Aubrey's relation of Dr. Aubrey, Anec. ii. 219. Burton seems to distinguish the coach from a caroche. "They shall have gowns, tires, jewels, coaches, and caroches." Anat. of Mel. p. 500. See CAROCHE.] A carriage of pleasure or state, distinguished from a chariot by having seats fronting each other.

Basilius attended for her in a coach, to carry her abroad to see some sports. Sidney.
A better would you fix?
Then give humility a coach and six. Pope.
Suppose that last week my coach was within an inch of overturning in a smooth even way, and drawn by very gentle horses. Swift.

To COACH.† v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To carry in a coach.

When I run,
Ride, sail, am coach'd, know I how far I have gone;
And my mind's motion not?
B. Jonson, Underwoods.
The needy poet sticks to all he meets,
Coach'd, carted, trod upon; now loose, now fast,
And carry'd off in some dog's tail at last. Pope.

2. To draw together, as horses harnessed to a coach.

For wit, ye may be coach'd together.
Every Woman in her Humour, 1609.

To COACH.* v. n. To ride in a coach.

Affecting genteel fashions, coaching it to all quarters. Waterhouse's Apol. for Learn. 1653, p. 157.

CO'ACHBOX. n. s. [coach and box.] The seat on which the driver of the coach sits.

Her father had two coachmen: when one was in the coach-box, if the coach swung but the least to one side, she used to shriek.
Arbuthnot, Hist. of J. Bull.

CO'ACHFUL.* n. s. [from coach and full.] A coach filled with persons.

Under the first are comprehended all those who are carried down in coachfuls to Westminster Hall.
Addison, Spect. No. 21.

COACH-HIRE. n. s. Money paid for the use of a hired coach.

You exclaim as loud as those that praise,
For scraps and coach-hire, a young noble's plays.
Dryden.
My expences in coach-hire make no small article.
Spectator.

COACH-HORSE.* n. s. [coach and horse.] A horse designed principally for drawing a coach.

They drew together like coach-horses.
Narrative of the King's Entertainment, 1603.

'Tis the swaggering coach-horse Anaides, that draws with him there. B. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels.

COACH-HOUSE. n. s. [coach and house.] The house in which the coach is kept from the weather.

Let him lie in the stable or the coach-house.
Swift.

CO'ACHMAKER.† n. s. [coach and maker. Formerly coachwright. "Our only and true Salomon, who hath devised and built this coch by his trusty and faithful cochwrights and carpenters." Harmar, Tr. of Beza's Serm. p. 364.] The artificer whose trade is to make coaches.

Her chariot is an empty hazel-nut,
Made by the joyner, Squirrel, or old Grub,
Time out of mind, the fairies coach-makers.
Shakspeare.
Take care of your wheels: get a new sett bought, and probably the coach-maker will consider you.
Swift.

CO'ACHMAN.† n. s. [from coach and man. The old word was coacher. "His coche was pluckt in pieces by evil cochers." Harmar, Tr. of Beza's Serm, p. 375.] The driver of a coach.

Thy nags, the leannest things alive,
So very hard thou lov'st to drive;
I heard thy anxious coachman say,
It cost thee more in whips than hay. Prior.
She commanded her trembling coachman to drive her chariot near the body of her king. South.

COA'CHMANSHIP.* n. s. [from coachman.] The skill of a coachman.

In two or three years he acquired the usual advantages of this sort of education, such as the arts of sporting, billiards, and coachmanship. Jenyns.

To COA'CT.† v. n. [from con and act.] To act together; to act in concert. Not used.

But if I tell how these two did coact,
Shall I not lie in publishing a truth? Shakspeare.

COA'CTED.* part. adj. [Lat. coactus.] Forced.

Speak to him, fellow, speak to him. I'll have none of this coacted, unnatural dumbness in my house, in a family where I govern.
B. Jonson, Epicœne.

COA'CTION.† n. s. [old Fr. coaction.] Compulsion; force, either restraining or impelling.

Christ left all men in liberty to marry, if they list; forbidding all men fyrmely to make any law of coaction or of separation, where God hath set fredome in marriage.
Bale, Acts of Eng. Votaries, (1560,) i. 16.
Feede the flocke of Christ, as much as in you lyeth; not taking care thereof by coaction, but willingly.
Woolton's Christian Manuell, (1576.) D. ii.
All outward coaction is contrary to the nature of liberty. Burnet on the Articles, Art. 17.
His services not flowing naturally from propensity and inclination, but being drawn and forced from him by terrour and coaction.
South, Serm. ii. 53.
It had the passions in perfect subjection; and though its command over them was persuasive and political, yet it had the force of coaction and despotical. South.

COA'CTIVE.† adj. [from coact.]

1. Having the force of restraining or impelling; compulsory; restrictive.

The Levitical priests in the old law, never arrogated unto themselves any temporal or coactive power. Ralegh.
They do all intend coactive jurisdiction in the exteriour court of the church.
Bp. Bramhall, Schism Guarded, p. 136.

There may be considered in them the power of jurisdiction; in foro externo, and coactive.
Bp. Barlow, Remains, p. 612.

2. Acting in concurrence. Obsolete.

Imagination,
With what's unreal thou coactive art. Shaksp.

COA'CTIVELY.* adv. [from coactive.] In a compulsory or restrictive manner.

All legislative, judiciary, and dispensative power, coactively, in the exteriour court of the church over English subjects.
Bp. Bramhall, Schism Guarded, p. 177.

COADJU'MENT. n. s. [from con and adjumentum, Lat.] Mutual assistance. Dict.

COADJU'TANT. adj. [from con and adjuto.] Helping; co-operating.

Thracius coadjutant, and the roar
Of fierce Euroclydon. Philips.

COADJU'TOR.† n. s. [old Fr. coadjuteur.]

1. A fellow-helper; an assistant; an associate; one engaged in the assistance of another.

I should not succeed in a project, whereof I have had no hint from my predecessors the poets, or their seconds or coadjutors the criticks.
Dryden.

Away the friendly coadjutor flies.
Garth's Dispensary.

A gownman of a different make,
Whom Pallas, once Vanessa's tutor,
Had fix'd on for her coadjutor. Swift.

2. [In the canon law.] One who is empowered or appointed to perform the duties of another.

A bishop that is unprofitable to his diocese ought to be deposed, and no coadjutor assigned him. Ayliffe.

Valerius procured Augustine in his life-time to be designed bishop of Hippo, and to be joined fellow-bishop with himself, though it was flatly against the canons. For a coadjutor commonly proves an hinderer; and by his envious clashing, doth often dig his partner's grave with whom he is joined. Fuller, Holy State, p. 273.

I find a learned and late canonist has very much about coadjutors; but it is for coadjutors to archdeacons, and dignified men, below the order of bishops. Bp. Barlow, Remains, p. 160.

COADJU'TRIX.* n. s. [from coadjutor.] She who is a fellow-helper.

She is admirably qualified to be his companion, confidant, counsellor, and coadjutrix. Smollett.

COADJU'VANCY. n. s. [from con and adjuvo, Lat.] Help; concurrent help; contribution of help; co-operation.

Crystal is a mineral body, in the difference of stones, made of a lentous percolation of earth, drawn from the most pure and limpid juice thereof, owing to the coldness of the earth, some concurrence, and coadjuvancy, but not immediate determination and efficiency. Brown, Vulg. Err.

COADUNI'TION. n. s. [from con, ad, unitio, Lat.] The conjunction of different substances into one mass.

Bodies seem to have an intrinsick principle of, or corruption from the coadunition of particles endued with contrary qualities.
Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

COADVE'NTURER.* n. s. [from con and adventurer.] A fellow-adventurer.

There is a worthy captain in this town, who was coadventurer in that expedition.
Howell, Lett. ii. 61.

To COAFFO'REST.* v. a. [from con and afforest.] To convert ground into forest.

Henry Fitz-Empresse (viz. the second) did coafforest much land, which continued all his reign, though much complained of.
Howell, Lett. iv. 16.

Unfortunate Druina, and all her coafforested territories. Howell, Lett. iv. 23.

COA'GENT.* n. s. [from con and agent.] An associate; one co-operating with another.

Your doom is then
To marry this coagent of your mischiefs.
Beaum. and Fl. Knight of Malta.

To COAGME'NT.† v. a. [old Fr. coaugmenter, from con and agmen, Lat.] To congregate or heap together. I have only found the participle in use.

Had the world been coagmented from that supposed fortuitous jumble, this hypothesis had been tolerable. Glanville.

COAGMENTA'TION. n. s. [from coagment.] Collection, or coacervation into one mass; union; conjunction.

The third is the skin and coat, which rests in the well joining, cementing, and coagmentation of words; when as it is smooth, gentle, and sweet, &c. B. Jonson, Discoveries.

COA'GULABLE. adj. [from coagulate.] That is capable of concretion.

Stones that are rich in vitriol, being often drenched with rainwater, the liquor will then extract a fine and transparent substance, coagulable into vitriol. Boyle.

To COA'GULATE. v. a. [coagulo, Lat.] To force into concretions; as, by the affusion of some other substance, to turn milk.

Roasted in wrath and fire,
And thus o'ersized with coagulate gore. Shaksp.

Vivification ever consisteth in spirits attenuate, which the cold doth congeal and coagulate.
Bacon, Nat. Hist.

Bitumen is found in lumps, or coagulated masses, in some springs. Woodward, Nat. Hist.

The milk in the stomach of calves, which is coagulated by the runnet, is again dissolved and rendered fluid by the gall in the duodenum.
Arbuthnot.

To COA'GULATE. v. n. To run into concretions, or congelations.

Spirit of wine commixed with milk, a third part spirit of wine, and two parts milk, coagulateth little, but mingleth; and the spirit swims not above. Bacon.

About the third part of the oil olive, which was driven over into the receiver, did there coagulate into a whitish body, almost like butter. Boyle.

COAGULA'TION.† n. s. [old Fr. coagulation.]

1. Concretion; congelation; the act of coagulating; the state of being coagulated.

From insensible attractions of most minute particles at the smallest distance, are derived cohesion, dissolution, coagulation, animal secretion, fermentation, and all chemical operations.
Bp. Berkely, Siris, § 236.

2. The body formed by coagulation.

As the substance of coagulations is not merely saline, nothing dissolves them but what penetrates and relaxes at the same time. Arbuthnot.

COA'GULATIVE. adj. [from coagulate.] That has the power of causing concretion, or coagulation.

To manifest the coagulative power, we have sometimes in a minute arrested the fluidity of new milk, and turned it into a curdled substance, only by dexterously mingling with it a few drops of good oil of vitriol. Boyle.

COA'GULATOR. n. s. [from coagulate.] That which causes coagulation.

Coagulators of the humours are those things which expel the most fluid parts, as in the case of incrassating, or thickening; and by those things which suck up some of the fluid parts, as absorbents. Arbuthnot.

COAK. n. s. See COKE.

COAL.† n. s. [col, Sax. kol, Germ, kole, Dut. kul, Danish.]

1. The common fossil fewel.

Coal is a black, sulphurous, inflammatory matter, dug out of the earth, serving for fewel, common in Europe, though the English coal is of most repute. One species of pit coal is called cannel, or canole coal, which is found in the northern counties; hard, glossy and light, apt to cleave into thin flakes, and, when kindled, yields a continual blaze till it be burnt out. Chambers.

Coals are solid, dry, opake, inflammable substances, found in large strata, splitting horizontally more easily than in any other direction; of a glossy hue, soft and friable, not fusible, but easily inflammable, and leaving a large residuum of ashes. Hill on Fossils.

But age, enforc'd, falls by her own consent:
As coals to ashes, when the spirit's spent.
Denham.

We shall meet with the same mineral lodged in coals, that elsewhere we found in marle.
Woodward, Nat. Hist.

2. The cinder of scorched wood; charcoal.

Whatsoever doth so alter a body, as it returneth not again to that it was, may be called alteratio major: as when cheese is made of curds, or coals of wood, or bricks of earth. Bacon.

3. Fire; any thing inflamed or ignited.

You are no surer, no,
Than is the coal of fire upon the ice,
Or hailstones in the sun. Shakspeare.

You have blown this coal betwixt my lord and me. Shakspeare.

The rage of jealousy then fir'd his soul,
And his face kindled like a burning coal.
Dryden.

4. To call over the coals. An expression, not yet disused, signifying to call to a severe account; in allusion perhaps to the ancient ordeal of the burning ploughshare.

To COAL. v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To burn wood to charcoal.

Add the tinner's care and cost, in buying the wood for this service, felling, framing, and piling it to be burnt; in fetching the same when it is coaled, through such far, foul, and cumbersome ways. Carew, Surv. of Cornwall.

Charcoal of roots, coaled into great pieces, lasts longer than ordinary charcoal. Bacon.

2. To delineate with a coal.

Marvailing, he coaled out rhymes upon the wall, near to the picture. Camden.

COAL-BLACK. adj. [coal and black.] Black in the highest degree; of the colour of a coal.

As burning Ætna, from his boiling stew,
Doth belch out flames, and rocks in pieces broke
And ragged ribs of mountains molten new,
Enwrapt in coal-black clouds and filthy smoak.
Spenser, F. Q.

Ethiopians and negroes become coal-black from fuliginous efflorescencies, and complectional tinctures. Brown.

Coal-black his colour, but like jet it shone;
His legs and flowing tail were white alone.
Dryden.

COAL-BOX. n. s. [coal and box.] A box to carry coals to the fire.

Leave a pail of dirty water, a coal-box, a bottle, a broom, and such other unsightly things. Swift.

COAL-FISH. n. s. [asellus niger.] A species of beardless gadus.

COAL-HOUSE.* n. s. [from coal and house.] A place to put coals in.

Bonner's conscience made his palace a coal-house, and a dungeon.

Junius, Sin Stigmatized, p. 812.

COAL-MINE. n. s. [from coal and mine.] A mine in which coals are dug; a coal-pit.

Springs injure land, that flow from coal-mines.

Mortimer.

COAL-MINER.* n. s. [from coal and mine.] One who works in a coal mine.

Like coalminers about a line, when the candles burning blue tell the damp cometh, they will fasten upon the bait. Junius, Sin Stigm. p. 295.

COAL-PIT. n. s. [from coal and pit.] A pit made in the earth, generally to a great depth, for digging coals.

A leaf of the polypody kind, found in the sinking of a coalpit. Woodward.

COAL-SHIP.* n. s. [from coal and ship.] A ship that carries coals; what is now termed a collier.

The pirate never spends his shot upon coal-ships, but lets fly at the rich merchant.

Junius, Sin Stigm. p. 389.

COAL-STONE. n. s. [from coal and stone.] A sort of cannel coal. See COAL.

Coal-stone flames easily, and burns freely; but holds and endures the fire much longer than coal. Woodward.

COAL-WORK. n. s. [coal and work.] A coalery; a place where coals are found.

There is a vast treasure in the old English, from whence authors may draw constant supplies; as our officers make their surest remits from the coal-works and the mines. Felton.

CO'ALERY. n. s. [from coal.] A place where coals are dug.

Two fine stalactitæ were found hanging from a a black stone, at a deserted vault in Benwell coalery. Woodward.

To COALE'SCE†. v. n. [old Fr. coalescer, coalesco, Latin.]

1. To unite in masses by a spontaneous approximation to each other.

When vapours are raised, they hinder not the transparency of the air, being divided into parts too small to cause any reflection in their superfices; but when they begin to coalesce, and constitute globules, those globules become of a convenient size to reflect some colours. Newton.

2. To grow together; to join.

COALE'SCENCE.† n. s. [from coalesce.] The act of coalescing; concretion; union.

That he should not be aware of the future coalescence of these bodies into one.

Glanville, Pre-exist. of Souls, ch. 2.

But in the second consideration it is symptoma morbi, nempe solutæ unitatis, when by reason of the breaking of the Golden Bowl, and shrinking up into itself, there immediately follows a coalescence of all the vessels thereof.

Smith, Portraiture of Old Age, p. 224.

From these modes of natural coalescence arises the grammatical regimen of the verb by its nominative, of the accusative by its verb.

Harris, Hermes, ii. § 3.

COALE'SCENT.* adj. [coalescens, Lat.] joined; united.

The human and divine nature of Christ being coalescent into one person. Annot. on Glanville's Lux Orient. 1682, p. 159.

COALI'TION. n. s. [from coalesco, coalitum, Latin.] Union in one mass or body; conjunction of separate parts in one whole.

The world's a mass of heterogeneous consistencies, and every part thereof a coalition of distinguishable varieties. Glanville.

In the first coalition of a people, their prospect is not great: they provide laws for their present exigence. Hale.

'Tis necessary that these squandered atoms should convene and unite into great masses: without such a coalition the chaos must have reigned to all eternity. Bentley.

CO'ALY. adj. [from coal.] Containing coal.

Or coaly Tine, or ancient hallow'd Dee.

Milton, Vas. E.

COAPTA'TION. n. s. [from con and apto, Lat.] The adjustment of parts to each other.

In a clock the hand is moved upon the dial, the bell is struck, and the other actions belonging to the engine are performed by virtue of the size, shape, bigness, and coaptation of the several parts. Boyle.

The same method makes both prose and verse beautiful, which consists in the judicious coaptation and ranging of the words. Broome.

To COA'RCT.† } v. a. [coarcto, Latin;
To COA'RCTATE. } coarcter, old Fr.]

1. To straighten; to confine into a narrow compass.

Rancour coarcted, and long detained in a narrow roome, at the last brasteth out with intolerable violence, and bringeth all to confusion.

Sir T. Elyot, Gov. fol. 6.

The wind finding the room in the form of a trunk, and coarcted therein, forced the stones of the window like pellets, clean through it. Bacon.

2. To contract power; to restrain.

If a man coarcts himself to the extremity of an act, he must blame and impute it to himself that he has thus coarcted or straightened himself so far. Ayliffe.

COARCTA'TION.† n. s. [from coarct; old Fr. coarctacion.]

1. Confinement; restraint to a narrow space.

The greatest winds, if they have no coarctation, or blow not hollow, give an interiour sound. Bacon.

2. Contraction of any space.

Straighten the artery never so much, provided the sides of it do not meet, the vessel will continue to beat below, or beyond the coarctation. Ray.

3. Restraint of liberty.

Election is opposed not only to coaction, but also to coarctation, or determination to one. Bp. Bramhall.

COARSE.† adj. [The Goth. kaurids, heavy, depressed, seems akin to this word. "kauridai slepa, they were heavy with sleep," St. Luke, ix. 32.]

1. Not refined; not separated from impurities or baser parts.

I feel
Of what coarse metal ye are molded. Shakspeare.

2. Not soft or fine; used of cloth, of which the threads are large.

In cloth is to be considered wool, the matter of it, whether it be coarse or fine.

Scott's Essay on Drapery, (1635,) p. 5.

3. Rude; uncivil; rough of manners.

Those who have been polished in France, make use of the most coarse uncivilized words in our language, and utter themselves often in such a manner as a clown would blush to hear.

Addison, Spect. No. 119.

4. Gross; not delicate.

'Tis not the coarser tye of human law
That binds their peace. Thomson, Spring.

5. Inelegant; rude; unpolished.

Praise of Virgil is against myself, for presuming to copy, in my coarse English, his beautiful expressions. Dryden.

6. Not nicely expert; unfinished by art or education.

Practical rules may be useful to such as are remote from advice, and to coarse practitioners, which they are obliged to make use of.

Arbuthnot on Aliments.

7. Mean; not nice; not elegant; vile.

Ill consort, and a coarse perfume,
Disgrace the delicacy of a feast. Roscommon.

A coarse and useless dunghill weed,
Fix'd to one spot, to rot just as it grows.

Otway, Orphan.

From this coarse mixture of terrestrial parts,
Desire and fear by turns possess their hearts.

Dryden, Virg.

CO'ARSELY.† adv. [from coarse.]

1. Without fineness; without refinement.

2. Meanly; not elegantly.

John came neither eating nor drinking, but fared coarsely and poorly, according to the apparel he wore. Brown, Vulg. Err.

3. Rudely; not civilly.

The good cannot be too much honoured, nor the bad too coarsely used. Dryden, Fab. Pref.

4. Inelegantly.

Be pleased to accept the rudiments of Virgil's poetry, coarsely translated; but which yet retains some beauties of the author.

Dryden, Virg. Ded.

5. Not delicately; grossly.

There is a gentleman, that serves the count,
Reports but coarsely of her. Shakspeare, All's Well.

CO'ARSENESS. n. s. [from coarse.]

1. Impurity; unrefined state.

First know the materials whereof the glass is made; then consider what the reason is of the coarseness or dearness. Bacon, Essays.

2. Roughness; want of fineness.

3. Grossness; want of delicacy.

Friends (pardon the coarseness of the illustration) as dogs in couples, should be of the same size. L'Estrange.

4. Roughness; rudeness of manners.

A base wild olive he remains;
The shrub the coarseness of the clown retains.

Garth.

5. Meanness; want of nicety;

Consider the penuriousness of the Hollanders, the coarseness of their food and raiment, and their little indulgences of pleasure. Addison on the War.

To COASSU'ME.* v. a. [from con and assume.] To take upon one's self one thing or quality together with another.

Was it not enough to assume our nature, and the properties belonging to that nature, and the actions arising from those properties, but thou must coassume the weakness of nature, of properties, of actions?

Walsall, Life and Death of Christ, (1615,) B. 6. b.

COAST.† n. s. [coste, Fr. costa, Lat.]

1. The edge or margin of the land next the sea; the shore. It is not used for the banks of less waters.

He sees in English ships the Holland coast.

Dryden.

2. The border, limit, or frontier of a country. This meaning is given in our ancient lexicography; and what our present version of the N. Test. renders coasts, Wicliffe renders countries or ends. This sense is unnoticed by Dr. Johnson.

The four coasts and quarters of the world.

Huloet.

Herod — slew all the children that were in Bethlehem, and in all the coasts thereof.
St. Matt. ii. 16.

The Jews — raised persecution against Paul and and Barnabas, and expelled them out of their coasts. Acts, xiii. 50.

3. It seems to be taken by Newton for side, like the French coste. It was likewise so used by Bacon. And we still use the expression of a coast of mutton.

The south-east is found to be better for ripening of trees than the south-west; though the south-west be the hottest coast. Bacon.

Some kind of virtue, lodged in some sides of the crystal, inclines and bends the rays towards the coast, of unusual refraction; otherwise the rays would not be refracted towards that coast rather than any other coast, both at their incidence and at their emergence, so as to emerge by a contrary situation of the coast. Newton, Opt.

4. The COAST is clear. A proverbial expression. The danger is over; the enemies have marched off.

Going out, and seeing that the coast was clear, Zelmane dismissed Musidorus. Sidney.

The royal spy, when now the coast was clear,
Sought not the garden, but retired unseen. Dryd.

To COAST.† v. n. [old Fr. costoyer, old Eng. costay, Ch.]

1. To sail close by the coast; to sail within sight of land.

But steer my vessel with a steady hand,
And coast along the shore in sight of land.
Dryden, Virgil.

The ancients coasted only in their navigation, seldom taking the open sea. Arbuthnot on Coins.

2. To approach; to draw near. See To ACCOST.

Where towards me a sorry wight did coast.
Spenser, Daphnaida.

And all in haste she coasteth to the cry.
Shakspeare, Ven. and Adonis.

To COAST.† v. a.

1. To sail by; to sail near to.

Nearchus, the admiral of Alexander, not knowing the compass, was fain to coast that shore.
Brown, Vulg. Err.

The greatest entertainment we found in coasting it, were the several prospects of woods, vineyards, meadows, and corn fields, which lie on the borders of it. Addison on Italy.

2. To keep close to; to pursue.

William Douglas still coasted the Englishmen, doing them what damage he might.
Holinshed's Chron. iii. 352.

We'll gallop to Segovia,
And if we light of no news there, hear nothing;
We'll e'en turn fairly home, and coast the other side. Beaum. & Fl. The Pilgrim.

My lord is coasted one way,
My father, though his hurts forbad his travel,
Hath took another.
Beaum. and Fl. Lover's Progress.

CO'ASTER. n. s. [from coast.] One that sails near the shore.

In our small skiff we must not launch too far; We here but coasters, not discoverers, are. Dryden.

COAT.† n. s. [cotte, Fr. cotta, Ital. Dr. Johnson says. To these may be added the Germ. cutt, probably from the Celt. kutten, to cover; Goth. kot. The Armorick cod is a garment which covers the breast. The Lat. cocta is termed a coat: "Interior tunica cocta vocatur," Poggii Facetiæ, p. 462. Low Lat. cota and cotta. V. Du Cange.]

1. The upper garment.

He was armed with a coat of mail, and the weight of the coat was five thousand shekels of brass.
1 Sam. xvi. 5.

The coat of many colours they brought to their father, and said, This have we found: know now whether it be thy son's coat or no.
Genesis, xxxvii. 30.

2. Petticoat; the habit of a boy in his infancy; the lower part of a woman's dress.

A friend's younger son, a child in coats, was not easily brought to his book. Locke.

3. The habit or vesture, as demonstrative of the office.

For his intermeddling with arms, he is the more excuseable, because many of his coat, in those times, are not only martial directors, but commanders. Howell, Vocal Forest.

Men of his coat should be minding their prayers,
And not among ladies to give themselves airs.
Swift.

4. The hair or fur of a beast; the covering of any animal. So a hawk of the first coat, two years old.

He clad
Their nakedness with skins of beasts; or slain,
Or, as the snake, with youthful coat repaid;
And thought not much to clothe his enemies.
Milton, P. L.

Give your horse some powder of brimstone in his oats, and it will make his coat lie fine.
Mortimer's Husbandry.

You have given us milk
In luscious streams, and lent us your own coat
Against the winter's cold. Thomson, Spring.

5. Any tegument; tunick; or covering.

The eye is defended with four coats or skins.
Peacham.

The optick nerves have their medullary parts terminating in the brain, their teguments terminating in the coats of the eye.
Derham, Physico-Theol.

Amber is a nodule, invested with a coat, called rock amber. Woodward on Fossils.

6 That on which the ensigns armorial, are portrayed. [allied to the Gr. σκύτος, a shield.]

The herald of love's mighty king,
In whose coat armour richly are display'd
All sorts of flowers the which on earth do spring.
Spenser.

Cropp'd are the flower-de-luces in your arms;
Of England's coat one half is cut away.
Shakspeare, Hen. VI. P. I.

Those other glorious notes,
Inscribed in touch, or marble, or the coats
Painted or carv'd upon our great men's tombs,
Or in their windows, do but prove the wombs
That bred them graves. B. Jonson, Forest.

At each trumpet was a banner bound,
Which, waving in the wind, display'd at large
Their master's coat of arms and knightly charge.
Dryden.

7. A card, called rightly a coat-card, and corruptly a court-card. See COAT-CARD.

Some may be coats, as in the cards.
B. Jonson, New Inn.

O, Gnotho, how is't? here's a trick of discarded cards of us! We were rank'd with coats, as long as old master lived. Massinger, Old Law.

To COAT.† v. a. [from the noun.] To cover; to invest; to overspread; as, to coat a retort; to coat a ceiling.

The ill man rides through all confidently; he is coated and booted for it. B. Jonson, Discoveries.

A victor he, from the deep phalanx pierc'd
Of iron-coated Macedon.
Thomson, Liberty, iii. 262.

COAT-CARD.* n. s. This expression is taken from the dress or coat, in which the king, queen, and knave, principal cards, are represented; and not from court, as it has often been pretended. See 7th sense of COAT.

Mad. We call'd him a coat-card
O'the last order.
Pen. jun. What's that? a knave?
Mad. Some readings have it so; my manuscript Doth speak it varlet. B. Jonson, Staple of News.

To COAX.† v. a. [B. Jonson and others write it cokes. It may be a corruption of our word cock or cocker. But Bishop Kennet and Lye think it formed from cog, a boat; whence cogciones, and cociones; and so applying the custom of sailors begging money by pretences of shipwreck and other losses to coaxing or wheedling men out of their charity. This will hardly be received. Lye applies the same to the verb COG. But Serenius refers coax to the Swed. kuska, to entice, from kus, a kiss. This may be further carried to the M. Goth. bikukjan.] To wheedle; to flatter; to humour. A low word.

Here he used to hunt; — and sometimes, to cokes the neighbouring rusticks, give them a buck he had hunted. Heath's Flagellum, 1679, p. 159.

The nurse had changed her note; she was nuzzling and coaxing the child; that's a good dear, says she. L'Estrange.

I coax! I wheedle! I'm above it.
Farquhar, Rec. Officer.

COAX.* n. s. [from the verb.] A dupe; the person wheedled.

Go! you're a brainless coax, a toy, a fop.
Beaum. and Fl. Wit at sev. Weapons.

Why, we will make a cokes of this wise master,
We will, my mistress, an absolute fine cokes,
And mock, to air, all the deep diligences
Of such a solemn and effectual ass.
B. Jonson, The Devil is an Ass.

COAXA'TION.* n. s. [from coax.] The art of coaxing, or flattering for any particular purpose.

CO'AXER. n. s. [from the verb.] A wheedler; a flatterer.

COB. A word often used in the composition of low terms; corrupted from cop, Sax. kopf, Germ. the head or top.

COB.† n. s.

1. A sort of sea fowl, called also sea-cob; the sea-mew. Phillips.

2. In some provinces, and probably in old language, a spider; whence cobweb. [Dutch, cob, a spider.]

3. A horse not castrated. In our northern dialect, cob is a testicle. It is also used for a strong pony.

4. A coin, so called perhaps from its roundness: so cob-nut, a corruption of the Sax. cop, a head.

He then drew out a large leathern bag, and poured out the contents, which were silver cobs, upon the table. Sheridan's Life of Swift, § 1.

CO'BALT.† n. s. A brittle metal, of a greyish colour; used in the state of oxide to give a beautiful blue colour to porcelain and glass.

Cobalt is plentifully impregnated with arsenick; contains copper and some silver. Being sublimed, the flores are of a blue colour: these German mineralists call zaffir. Woodward.

Cobalt is a dense, compact, and ponderous mineral, very bright and shining, and much resembling some of the antimonial ores It is found in Germany, Saxony, Bohemia, and England; but ours is a poor kind. From cobalt are produced the three sorts of arsenick, white, yellow, and red; as also zaffre and smalt. Hill on Fossils.

To CO'BBLE. v. a. [kobler, Danish.]

1. To mend any thing coarsely; used generally of shoes.

If you be out, sir, I can mend you. — Why, sir, cobble you. Shakspeare, Jul. Cæs.

They'll sit by th' fire, and presume to know
What's done i'th' capitol; making parties strong,
And feeble such as stand not in their liking,
Below their cobbled shoes. Shakspeare, Coriol.

Many underlayers, when they could not live upon their trade, have raised themselves from cobbling to fluxing. L'Estrange.

2. To do or make any thing clumsily, or unhandily.

Reject the nauseous praises of the times;
Give thy base poets back their cobbled rhimes.
Dryden.

Is it not a firmer foundation for contentment and tranquillity, to believe that all things were at first created, and are since continually ordered and disposed for the best, and that principally for the benefit and pleasure of man; than that the whole universe is mere bungling and blundering; — nothing effected for any purpose or design, but all ill favouredly cobbled and jumbled together? Bentley, Serm. 1.

CO'BBLE, or CO'BLE.* n. s.

1. A fishing boat. [Sax. cuople.]

Every day the cobles, or little fishing boats, are drawn on shore. Pennant.

2. A pebble; still used in this sense, in the north of England. "As hard as a cobble."

Their hands shook swords, their slings held cobbles round. Fairfax, Tasso, xx. 29.

CO'BBLER. n. s. [from cobble.]

1. A mender of old shoes.

Not many years ago it happened that a cobbler had the casting vote for the life of a criminal. Addison on Italy.

2. A clumsy workman in general.

What trade are you? —
Truly, sir, in respect of a fine workman, I am but, as you would say, a cobbler.
Shakspeare, Julius Cæsar.

3. In a kind of proverbial sense, any mean person.

Think you the great prerogative t' enjoy
Of doing ill, by virtue of that race;
As if what we esteem in cobblers base,
Would the high family of Brutus grace?
Dryden, Juv.

CO'BBY.* adj. Headstrong; tyrannical. Cumberland. In Northumberland, it means stout, hearty, brisk: in Derbyshire, well, or in good spirits, clever, &c., as, "I'm pretty cobby t'day." Grose. Mr. Brockett, N. Country Words, writes it cobby or coppy: the latter form reminds us of cop, the head, as a probable etymon.

CO'BCOALS. n. s. pl. Large round coals. North. Grose.

CO'BIRONS. n. s. pl. [cob and iron.] Irons with a knob at the upper end.

The implements of the kitchen; as spits, ranges, cobirons, and pots. Bacon, Phys. Rem.

CO'BISHOP. n. s. [con and bishop.] A co-adjutant bishop.

Valerius, advanced in years, and a Grecian by birth, not qualified to preach in the Latin tongue, made use of Austin as a cobishop, for the benefit of the church of Hippo. Ayliffe.

CO'BLOAF.* n. s. A crusty uneven loaf. North. Shakspeare applies the word contemptuously to personal appearance, where Ajax calls Thersites "a cobloaf," Tr. and Cressida. A corruption of cop; a loaf with a large head.

CO'BNUT.† n. s. [cob and nut.]

1. A boy's game; the conquering nut.

2. A large nut; what some now call the nut of the Barcelona hazle, and what was formerly "the name of a walnut." Barret.

COBO'B.* n. s. See CABOB.

CO'BSTONES.* n. s. Large stones. North. Grose.

CO'BSWAN.† n. s. [cob, and swan.] The head or leading swan, Dr. Johnson says. I should rather suppose the male swan. See COB.

I'm not taken
With a cobswan, or a high-mounting bull,
As foolish Leda and Europa were.
B. Jonson, Catiline.

CO'BWEB.† n. s. [kopweb, Dutch; atter-coppa, Sax. atter-cop, Cumb. the spider's web.]

1. The web or net of a spider: from cob, a spider. [See COB.]

The luckless Clarion,
With violent swift flight, forth carried
Into the cursed cobweb, which his foe
Had framed for his final overthrow. Spenser.

Is supper ready, the house trimmed, rushes strewed, and cobwebs swept?
Shakspeare, Taming of the Shrew.

The spider in the house of a burgher, fell presently to her net-work of drawing cobwebs up and down. L'Estrange.

2. Any snare, or trap; implying insidiousness and weakness.

For he a rope of sand could twist,
As tough as learned Sorbonist;
And weave fine cobwebs fit for scull
That's empty when the moon is full. Hudibras.

Laws are like cobwebs, which may catch small flies; but let wasps and hornets break through. Swift.

CO'BWEB.* adj. This word is often used adjectively, both simply and figuratively, denoting any thing fine, slight, or flimsy; whence the application of it to lawn, a fashionable article of female dress in elder times. In Norfolk, a cobweb morning is a misty morning.

Break through such tender cobweb niceties,
That oft entangle these blind buzzing flies.
More, Philos. Poems, p. 319.

Item, a charm surrounding fearfully
Your partie-per-pale picture one half drawn
In solemn cyprus, th' other cobweb lawn.
B. Jonson, Epig.

The worst are good enough for such a trifle,
Such a proud piece of cobweb lawn.
Beaum. and Fl. Scornful Lady.

Chronology at best is but a cobweb law, and he broke through it with his weight. Dryden.

Opinion's feeble coverings, and the veil
Spun from the cobweb fashion of the times
To hide the feeling heart.
Akenside, Pleas. of Imag. B. 2.

CO'BWEBBED.* adj. [from cobweb. Employed by one of our forgotten poets, and borrowed by Young.] Covered with the webs of spiders.

Who loves the golden mean, doth safely want
A cobwebb'd cot, and wrongs entail'd upon 't.
Lovelace, Lucasta, Posth. p. 57.

The cobwebb'd cottage, with its ragged wall
Of mouldering mud, is royalty to me.
Young, Night Th. 1.

COCA. See CACAO, and COCOA.

COCCI'FEROUS. adj. [from κοκκός, and fero, Lat.] All plants or trees are so called that have berries. Quincy.

*CO'CCULUS INDICUS. n. s. [Lat.] A poisonous narcotick berry, known mostly now to poachers, who have got a trick of intoxicating fish therewith, so as to take them out of the water with their hands; for which reason these berries are called baccæ piscatoriæ, fisher-berries. Chambers.

CO'CCYX.* n. s. [Lat. coccyx, the cuckoo.] In anatomy, a bone joined to the extremity of the os sacrum; so called, as some think, from its resemblance to the beak of a cuckoo.

CO'CHINEAL. n. s. [cochinilla. Span. a woodlouse.]

An insect gathered upon the opuntia, and dried: from which a beautiful red colour is extracted. Hill.

CO'CHLEARY. adj. [from cochlea, Lat. a screw.] Screw-form; in the form of a screw.

That at St. Dennis, near Paris, hath wreathy spires, and cochleary turnings about it, which agreeth with the description of the unicorn's horn in Ælian. Brown, Vulg. Err.

CO'CHLEATED. adj. [from cochlea, Lat.] Of a screwed or turbinated form.

Two pieces of stone, struck forth of the cavity of the umbilici of shells, of the same sort with the foregoing: they are of a cochleated figure. Woodward on Fossils.

COCK.† n. s. [cocc, Saxon; coq, French; κόκκυξ, Gr. whence κοκκύζω, to crow like a cock.]

1. The male to the hen; a domestick fowl, remarkable for his gallantry, pride, and courage.

Cocks have great combs and spurs; hens, little or none. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

True cocks o' th' game,
That never ask for what, or whom, they fight;
But turn 'em out, and shew 'em but a foe,
Cry liberty, and that's a cause of quarrel. Dryd.

The careful hen
Calls all her chirping family around,
Fed and defended by the fearless cock.
Thomson, Spring.

2. The male of any small birds.

Calves and philosophers, tygers and statesmen, cock sparrows and coquets, exactly resemble one another in the formation of the pineal gland. Arbuthnot and Pope.

3. The weathercock, that shews the direction of the wind by turning.

You cataracts and hurricanoes spout,
'Till you have drench'd our steeples, drown'd the cocks! Shakspeare.

4. A spout to let out water at will, by turning the stop. The handle had probably a cock on the top. Things that were contrived to turn seem anciently to have had that form, whatever was the reason.

When every room [strelsy,
Hath blaz'd with lights, and bray'd with min-
I have retir'd me to a wasteful cock,
And set mine eyes at flow. Shakspeare.

It were good there were a little cock made in the belly of the upper glass. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

Thus the small jett, which hasty hands unlock,
Spirts in the gard'ner's eyes who turns the cock.
Pope.

5. The notch of an arrow.
6. The part of the lock of a gun that strikes with the flint. [From cocca, Ital. the notch of an arrow. Skinner. Perhaps from the action, like that of a cock pecking; but it was, I think, so called when it had not its present form.]

With hasty rage he snatch'd
His gunshot, that in holsters watch'd,
And bending cock, he levell'd full
Against th' outside of Talgol's skull. Hudibras.

A seven-shot gun carries powder and bullets for seven charges and discharges. Under the breech of the barrel is one box for the powder; a little before the lock another for the bullets; behind the cock a charger, which carries the powder from the box to a funnel at the further end of the lock. Grew.

7. A conquerour; a leader; a governing man.

Sir Andrew is the cock of the club since he left us. Addison.

My schoolmaster call'd me a dunce and a fool;
But at cuffs I was always the cock of the school.
Swift.

8. Cockcrowing; a note of the time in a morning.

We were carousing till the second cock. Shaks.

He begins at curfew, and goes 'till the first cock. Shakspeare.

9. A cockboat; a small boat.

They take view of all sized cocks, barges, and fisherboats hovering on the coast.
Carew, Surv. of Cornwall.

The fishermen that walk upon the beach,
Appear like mice; and yond tall anchoring bark,
Diminish'd to her cock; her cock, a buoy,
Almost too small for sight. Shakspeare.

10. A small heap of hay. [Properly cop.]

As soon as the dew is off the ground, spread the hay again, and turn it, that it may wither on the other side: then handle it, and, if you find it dry, make it up into cocks. Mortimer.

11. The form of a hat. [From the comb of the cock.]

You see many a smart rhetorician turning his hat in his hands, moulding it into several different cocks. Addison.

12. The style or gnomon of a dial.
Chambers.
13. The needle of a balance.
14. Cock on the Hoop. Triumphant; exulting. [Some think that this expression is taken from one who madly draws the cock out of a barrel, and lays it on the hoop or top of the cask, letting all the liquor run to waste. But Cotgrave, under the old Fr. adjective hupé, gives us "copped, crested; hence also, proud, cocket, loftie, statelie, that bears himselfe high, that thinks well of himselfe." This etymology will probably be preferred.]

Now I am a frisker, all men on me look;
What should I do but set cock on the hoop?
Camden, Remains.

You'll make a mutiny among my guests!
You will set cock a hoop! Shaks. Rom. and Jul.

For Hudibras, who thought h' had won
The field, as certain as a gun,
And having routed the whole troop,
With victory was cock a hoop. Hudibras.

15. Cock and a Bull. An expression yet in use, though unnoticed in our dictionaries; denoting tedious, unmeaning stories; mere babble.

Some men's sole delight is, to take tobacco, and drink all day long in a tavern or ale-house, to discourse, sing, jest, roar, talk of a cock and a bull over a pot, &c. Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 271.

To Cock. v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To set erect; to hold bolt upright, as a cock holds his head.

This is that muscle which performs the motion so often mentioned by the Latin poets, when they talk of a man's cocking his nose, or playing the rhinoceros. Addison.

Our Lightfoot barks, and cocks his ears;
O'er yonder stile see Lubberkin appears.
Gay, Pastorals.

Dick would cock his nose in scorn,
But Tom was kind and loving. Swift.

2. To set up the hat with an air of petulance and pertness.

Dick, who thus long had passive sat,
Here strok'd his chin and cock'd his hat. Prior.

An alert young fellow cock'd his hat upon a friend of his who entered. Addison, Spect.

3. To mould the form of the hat.
4. To fix the cock of a gun ready for a discharge.

Some of them holding up their pistols cocked, near the door of the house, which they kept open.
Dryden, Ded. Æn.

5. To raise hay in small heaps.

Sike mirth in May is meetest for to make,
Or summer shade, under the cocked hay.
Spenser, Shep. Cal.

To Cock.† v. n.

1. To strut; to hold up the head, and look big, or menacing, or pert.

Now in our times — war is made as much by money as by sword; and he that may longest pay his soldiers, goeth victor away. And if they be both disposed to cock it throughly, yet when they both be made bankrupts, then they must needs conclude a peace.
Sir T. Smith, Orat. III. Append. to his Life.

Belshazzar was found wanting of days attainable by his age and constitution, in that he was found cocking up against God.
Archd. Arnway's Alarum, (1661.) p. 161.

Sir Fopling is a fool so nicely writ,
The ladies would mistake him for a wit;
And when he sings, talks loud, and cocks, would cry,
I vow, methinks, he's pretty company. Dryden.

Every one cocks and struts upon it, and pretends to overlook us. Addison, Guardian.

2. To train or use fighting cocks.

Cries out 'gainst cocking, since he cannot bet.
B. Jonson.

3. To cocker; to indulge too much.

Where cocking dads make sawcie lads
In youth to rage, to beg in age.
Tusser, in his own Life, p. 162.

Cock, in composition, signifies small or little.

Cocka'de.† n. s. [from cock.] A ribband worn in the hat.

Pert infidelity is wit's cockade.
Young, Night Thoughts, 7.

Cocka'ded.* adj. [from cockade.] Wearing a cockade in the hat.

A pamper'd spendthrift, whose fantastick air,
Well-fashion'd figure, and cockaded brow,
He took in change. Young, Night Th. 5.

Co'ckal.* n. s. Formerly used for the die itself, and for a game similar to that at dice; the "play at the huckle bone," as Barret calls it.

The ancients used to play at cockal, or casting of hucklebones, which is done with smooth sheep's bones.
Kinder's Sanct. of Salvation, (1658,) p. 368.

Cockals, which the Dutch call teelings, are different from dice; for they are square with four sides, and dice have six. Ibid.

Cockato'o.* n. s. [probably from the Fr. caqueteur, a prattler; though Sir T. Herbert offers a punning, but not admissible, etymology.] A bird of the parrot kind.

Here are also — [in the Mauritius] herons white and beautiful; — cacatoes, a sort of parrot, whose nature may well take name from κακὸν ᾠὸν, it is so fierce and so indomitable.
Sir T. Herbert, Trav. p. 383.

She had two little dogs on a cushion in her lap, and a cockatoo on her shoulder.
Gray, Lett. to Dr. Warton.

Co'ckatrice.† n. s. [from cock and αττερ, Sax. a serpent; or rather from the old Fr. cocatrice.] A serpent supposed to rise from a cock's egg.

They will kill one another by the look, like cockatrices. Shakspeare.

This was the end of this little cockatrice of a king, that was able to destroy those that did not espy him first. Bacon.

This cockatrice is soonest crushed in the shell; but, if it grows, it turns to a serpent and a dragon.
Bp. Taylor.

My wife! 'tis she, the very cockatrice!
Congreve.

Co'ckboat.† n. s. A small boat belonging to a ship. Formerly cogboat. See Cog. And sometimes cocket. [low Lat. coca; Armor. coket.]

That invincible armada, which having not fired a cottage of ours at land, nor taken a cockboat of ours at sea, wandered through the wilderness of the northern seas. Bacon.

Did they think it less dishonour to God to be like a brute, or a plant, or a cockboat, than to be like a man. Stillingfleet.

Co'ckbrained.* adj. Giddy; rash; hairbrained.

His instances out of the common law are all so quite beside the matter which he would prove, as may be a warning to all clients how they venture their business with such a cockbrained solicitor.
Milton, Colasterion.

Co'ckbroth. n. s. Broth made by boiling a cock.

Diet upon spoon-meats; as veal or cockbroths prepared with French barley.
Harvey on Consumptions.

Co'ckcrowing. n. s. [cock and crow.] The time at which cocks crow; the morning.

Ye know not when the master of the house cometh; at even, or at midnight, or at the cock-crowing, or in the morning. St. Mark, xiii. 35.

To CO'CKER.† v. a. [coqueliner, French, Dr. Johnson says. It may, however, be a word of northern origin. Goth. bikukjan, to kiss. "Ni swaif bikukjan fotuns meinans," St. Luke, vii. 45. Hath not ceased to kiss my feet.] To cade; to fondle; to indulge.

Cocker thy child, and he shall make thee afraid.
Ecclus. xxx. 9.

Shall a beardless boy,
A cocker'd silken wanton brave our fields?
Shakspeare, K. John.

What should I do,
But cocker up my genius, and live free
To all delights my fortune calls me to.
B. Jonson, For.

He that will give his son sugar-plumbs to make him learn, does but authorize his love of pleasure and cocker up that propensity which he ought to subdue. Locke on Education.

Bred a fondling and an heiress;
Dress'd like any lady may'ress,
Cocker'd by the servants round,
Was too good to touch the ground. Swift.

Co'CKER. n. s. [from cock.] One who follows the sport of cockfighting.

Co'CKER.* n. s. A sort of spatterdash. The word is yet used in the north of England.

Now doth he inly scorne his Kendal green,
And his patch'd cockers now despised been.
Bp. Hall, Sat. B. 4. S. 6.

Co'CKEREL. n. s. [from cock.] A young cock.

Which of them first begins to crow? — The old cock? — The cockerel. Shakspeare.

What wilt thou be, young cockerel, when thy spurs
Are grown to sharpness? Dryden.

Co'CKERING.* n. s. [from cocker.] Indulgence. Barret and Sherwood.

What discipline is this, Paræus, to nourish violent affections in youth, by cockering and wanton indulgencies, and to chastise them in mature age with a boyish rod of correction.
Milton, Doct. and Disc. of Divorce.

Most children's constitutions are spoiled by cockering and tenderness. Locke on Education.

Co'CKET.* adj. [from To cock.] Brisk; pert; "to wax cocket." Sherwood.

Co'CKET.† n. s. [Of uncertain derivation, Dr. Johnson says. Possibly, in the sense of acquittance, the warrant being delivered to the merchant, from "quo quietus recessit," according to the form of acquittances or discharges given at the Exchequer, usually concluding, abindè recessit quietus.]

1. A seal belonging to the king's custom-house: likewise a scroll of parchment, sealed and delivered by the officers of the customhouse to merchants, as a warrant that their merchandize is entered. Cowel.

The greatest profit did arise by the cocket of hides; for wool and woolfells were ever of little value in this kingdom. Davies.

2. A cock-boat. [old Fr. cocquet. See Cock-boat.] Sherwood.

Co'CKFIGHT.† } n. s. [cock and fight.] A
Co'CKFIGHTING. } battle or match of cocks.

In cockfights, to make one cock more hardy, and the other more cowardly. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

All we have seen compar'd to his experience,
Has been but cudgel-play or cock-fighting.
Beaum. and Fl. The Captain.

At the seasons of foot ball and cockfighting, these little republics resume their national hatred to each other. Addison.

Co'CKHORSE. adj. [cock and horse.] On horseback; triumphant; exulting.

Alma, they strenuously maintain,
Sits cockhorse on her throne, the brain. Prior.

Co'CKING.* n. s. [from To cock.] The sport of cockfighting.

The cocking holds at Derby.
Beaum. and Fl. Monsieur Thomas.

CO'CKLE.† n. s. [coquille, French, cochlea, Lat. κόχλος, Gr. from κόχλω, to turn round. Dr. Johnson has given a second definition of this word, viz. a little or young cock, of which he gives a pretended example from Spenser's Shep. Calendar: "as cockle on his dunghill, &c." But, in truth, Spenser has no such word. The true reading is, "as cocke on his dunghill crowing crancke," Septemb. ver. 46.] A small testaceous fish.

It is a cockle, or a walnut shell. Shakspeare.

We may, I think, from the make of an oyster, or cockle, reasonably conclude, that it has not so many, nor so quick senses, as a man. Locke.

Three common cockle shells, out of gravel pits. Woodward.

Co'CKLE-STAIRS. n. s. Winding or spiral stairs. Chambers.

Co'CKLE.† n. s. [coccel, Sax.; lolium, zizania, Lat.] A weed that grows in corn. The same with cornrose; a species of poppy.

Let thistles grow instead of wheat, and cockle instead of barley. Job, xxxi. 40.

You make mountains not of mole-hills, but of motes; long harvest for a small deal not of corn, but of cockle; and (as one said at the shearing of hogs) great cry for a little, and that not very fine, wool. Hayward, Answ. to Doleman, ch. 7.

In soothing them we nourish, 'gainst our senate,
The cockle of rebellion, insolence, sedition.
Shakspeare.

Good seed degenerates, and oft obeys
The soil's disease, and into cockle strays. Donne.

To Co'CKLE.† v. a. [from cockle.] To contract into wrinkles like the shell of a cockle; "to crumple." Sherwood.

Showers soon drench the camblet's cockled grain. Gay.

Co'CKLED. adj. [from cockle.] Shelled; or perhaps cochleate, turbinated.

Love's feeling is more soft and sensible,
Than are the tender horns of cockled snails.
Shakspeare.

Co'CKLER.* n. s. [from cockle.] One whose trade it is to take and sell cockles. Used in the north of England.

An old fisherman, mending his nets, told me a moving story; how a brother of the trade, a cockler, as he styled him, driving a little cart with two daughters, &c. Gray, Lett. to Dr. Wharton.

Co'CKLOFT.† n. s. [cock and loft.] The room over the garret, in which fowls are supposed to roost, unless it be rather corrupted from coploft, the cop or top of the house. It is written cotloft by Fuller in his Holy State, and cockleloft repeatedly by Anthony Wood in his life of himself.

The word cænaculum in the most usual and latest Roman sense is still meant of the garret, or cockloft as we call it; which was indeed the most contemptible part of the house, and of no better use than to be hired out to very ordinary and common people.
Gregory's Notes on Scripture, p. 16.

If the lowest floors already burn,
Cocklofts and garrets soon will take their turn.
Dryden, Juv.

My garrets, or rather my cocklofts indeed, are very indifferently furnished; but they are rooms to lay lumber in. Swift.

Co'CKMASTER. n. s. [cock and master.] One that breeds game cocks.

A cockmaster bought a partridge, and turned it among the fighting cocks. L'Estrange.

Co'CKMATCH. n. s. [cock and match.] Cockfight for a prize.

At the same time that the heads of parties preserve towards one another an outward shew of good breeding, their tools will not so much as mingle at a cockmatch. Addison.

Though quail-fighting is what is most taken notice of, they had doubtless cockmatches also. Arbuthnot and Pope.

Co'CKNEY.† n. s. [A word of which the original is much controverted. The French use an expression, Païs de Cocaigne, for a country of dainties.

Paris est pour un riche un païs de Cocaigne. Boileau.

Of this word they are not able to settle the original. It appears, whatever was its first ground, to be very ancient, being mentioned in an old Normanno-Saxon poem:

Far in see by west Spayng.
Is a lond yhote Cocayng.

On which Dr. Hickes has this remark: "Nunc coquin, coquine. Quæ olim apud Gallas otio, gulæ & ventri deditos, ignavum, ignavam, desidiosum, desidiosam, segnem significabant. Hinc urbanos utpote à rusticis laboribus ad vitam sedentariam, & desidiosam avocatos pagani nostri olim cokaignes, quod nunc scribitur cockneys, vocabant. Et poëta hic noster in monachos, & moniales, ut segne genus hominum, qui desidiæ dediti, ventri indulgebant, & coquinæ amatores erant, malevolentissime invehitur, monasteria & monasticam vitam, in descriptione terræ Cockaineæ, perabolice perstringens." So far Dr. Johnson. — The etymology of this word has indeed exercised the conjectures of the learned in various ways. Meric Casaubon would refer it to the Greek οἰκογένης, (oicogenes,) one born and bred at home. Gratifying as such an origin must be, in point of classical antiquity, to those who are still called cockneys, it would now be difficult to find a believer in this imposing and sonorous etymon! — One of our oldest lexicographers thus defines a cockney, "molliculus, ineptus, delicatus, qui nescit res discernere, et qui se inaniter jactat," an effeminate, foolish fellow, who knows not how to distinguish things, and who is also very conceited, Huloet; who, in a similar manner, explains to play the cockney, to play the fool. After him comes Barret, late in the reign of Elizabeth, who defines a cockney, "a child tenderly brought up, a dearling." This may seem to countenance the opinion of those, who derive the word from cocker or cock; and which Decker, a writer contemporary with Barret, in his "Knight's Conjuring," boldly affirms to be the derivation. "'Tis not their fault, but our mothers', our cockering mothers', who for their labour make us to be called cockneys." Pegge, in his Anecdotes of the Eng. Language, inclines to this etymology; deducing it, however, from the old Fr. coqueliner, to fondle, particip. coqueliné, whence, by dropping the penultimate, coquené. Mr. Douce thinks, that the word may have once been a term of fondness used towards male children, (in London more particularly,) as pigsney in like manner has been applied to a woman. Mr. Ellis, in his specimens of the Early English Poets, deduces it, in conformity to a remark made by Mr. Tyrwhitt that the word is probably borrowed originally from the kitchen, i. e. from coquina; and he cites a passage from Pierce Plowman's Visions, "I have no salt bacon, ne no cokeney, collops for to make," to shew that cockney means a cook, and that therefore the intelligence which the inhabitants of the metropolis displayed in the culinary art might have procured them the appellation of cockneys from the uplandish or country-men. But cokeney, in the passage which he cites, unfortunately means nothing more than a little cock, as Mr. Douce also has observed; the dish to be prepared, but not the cook to dress it. The authority of Bishop Percy and Mr. Tyrwhitt in thus also assigning, in the old ballad of The Turnament of Tottenham, the meaning of cook to cockney, has been rightly questioned by Mr. Douce.

At that feast where they served in rich array,
Every five and five had a cokeney:

Where it signifies a little cock, or perhaps a peacock, a favourite dish among our ancestors. Cotgrave, under the word COQUINE, calls a "cockney a simper-de-cockit, a nice thing." The citation of Camden in his Britannia,

Were I in my castle of Bungey
Upon the river of Waveney
I would ne care for the king of Cockeney;

shews, whencesoever the triplet comes, that London was known by this name; and hence a cockney might be assumed for a Londoner. After all, there is most reason to believe, that this contemptuous or satirical expression originates in that imaginary region of luxury and idleness formerly called Cocaigne, or Plenty; as in the poem cited by Hickes. Probably the festival of the Cocagna at Naples may have suggested the poem as well as the word. See Keysler's Trav. vol. ii. p. 369. Hobbes, in allusion to the old poem, has "the land of Cockany, where fowls ready roasted cry, come and eat me;" for, among the delicacies of this happy country, ready roasted geese fly into the house, exclaiming, all hot, all hot!

The gees irosted on the spitte,
Flee to that abbai, god hit wot,
And gredith, [crieth,] Gees al hote!

Perhaps, no apology is necessary for so long a remark on cockney; which, however, is now falling into little use.]

1. A native of London, by way of contempt.

So the cockney did to the eels, when she put them i'the pasty alive. Shakspeare, King Lear.

For who is such a cockney in his heart,
Proud of the plenty of the southern part,
To scorn that union, by which we may
Boast 'twas his countryman that writ this play?
Dorset.

Hence I believe it was, that that synod's geography was as ridiculous as a cockney's, to whom all is Barbary beyond Brainford, and Christendome endeth at Greenwich.
Whitlock, Mann. of the English, (1654,) p. 221.

The cockney travelling into the country, is surprized at many common practices of rural affairs.
Watts.

2. Any effeminate, ignorant, low, mean, despicable citizen.

I am afraid this great lubber, the world, will prove a cockney. Shakspeare, Twelfth Night.

Co'CKNEYLIKE.* adj. Resembling the manners or character of a cockney.

Some again draw this mischief on their heads by too ceremonious and strict diet, being over precise, cockney-like, and curious in their observations of meats, times, &c. Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 73.

Co'CKPIT. n. s. [cock and pit.]

1. The area where cocks fight.

Can this cockpit hold,
The vasty field of France? Shakspeare.

And now have I gained the cockpit of the western world, and academy of arms, for many years.
Howell, Vocal Forest.

2. A place on the lower deck of a man of war, where are sub-divisions for the purser, the surgeon, and his mates.
Harris.

Co'CK'SCOMB. n. s. [cock and comb.] A plant.

Co'CK'SHEAD. n. s. A plant, named also sainfoin. Miller.

Co'CKSHUT.† n. s. [from cock and shut.] The close of the evening, at which time poultry go to roost, Dr. Johnson says. Minsheu calls it twilight, either in the morning, or the evening. See Minsh. in TWILIGHT. In like manner cock-leet (cock-light) is day-break, and sometimes the dusk of the evening, in some parts of the west of England. But Archdeacon Nares says, that cockshut is the name of a net used to catch, or shut in, woodcocks, in the twilight of the evening, when those birds go out to feed. See Nares's Gloss. in V. COCKSHUT.

Surrey and himself,
Much about cockshut time, from troop to troop,
Went through the army. Shakspeare.

Co'CKSPUR. n. s. Virginian hawthorn. A species of medlar. Miller.

Co'CKSURE.† adj. Confidently certain; without fear or diffidence. A word of contempt, Dr. Johnson says. But it seems not to have been used as such originally; but in the present sense of safe, sure, beyond doubt or danger. The word is also not an adverb as Dr. Johnson states, but an adjective. See, under SURE, To make sure.

Whiles the red hat doth endure,
He maketh himself cocksure;
The red hat with his lure
Bringeth all things under cure. Skelton.

A few priests, men in white rochets, ruled all; who with setting up of six-foot roods, and rebuilding of rood-lofts, thought to make all cocksure.
Sir T. Smith, Orat. IV. Append. to his Life.

We steal, as in a castle, cocksure. Shakspeare.

I thought myself cocksure of his horse, which he readily promised me. Pope, Letters.

Co'CKSWAIN.† n. s. [cogzrpaine, Saxon.] The officer who has the command of the cockboat. Corruptly COXON.

Their majesties, lord Carteret, and Sir John Norris, embarked in Sir John's barge, and his captain steered the boat as cockswain.
Drummond's Travels, p. 70.

Co'CKWEED. n. s. [from cock and weed.] The name of a plant, called also Dittander or Pepperwort.

Co'COA.† n. s. [cacaotal, Span. and therefore more properly written cacao. Dr. Johnson.—The word is coca, and coco, both in Spanish and Portuguese: "Coca de India," Dict. Portug. 1701. See also Coco in Dict. de Leng. Castellana.]

A species of palm-tree, cultivated in the East and West Indies. The bark of the nut is made into cordage, and the shell into drinking bowls. The kernel affords them a wholesome food, and the milk contained in the shell a cooling liquor. The leaves are used for thatching their houses, and are wrought into baskets. Miller.

The cacao or chocolate nut is a fruit of an oblong figure, is composed of a thin but hard and woody coat or skin, of a dark blackish colour; and of a dry kernel, filling up its whole cavity, fleshy, dry, firm, and fattish to the touch, of a dusky colour, an agreeable smell, and a pleasant and peculiar taste. It was unknown to us till the discovery of America. The tree is of the thickness of a man's leg, and but a few feet in height; its bark rough, and full of tubercles; and its leaves six or eight inches long, half as much in breadth, and pointed at the ends. The flowers are succeeded by the fruit, which is large and oblong, resembling a cucumber, five, six, or eight inches in length, and three or four in thickness, when fully ripe, of a purple colour. Within the cavity of this fruit are lodged the cocoa nuts, usually about thirty in number. Hill's Mat. Medica.

Amid' those orchards of the sun,
Give me to drain the cocoa's milky bowl,
And from the palm to draw its freshening wine.
Thomson.

Co'CTILE. adj. [coctilis, Lat.] Made by baking, as a brick.

Co'CTION. n. s. [coctio, Lat.] The act of boiling.

The disease is sometimes attended with expectoration from the lungs, and that is taken off by a coction and resolution of the feverish matter, or terminates in suppurations or a gangrene.
Arbuthnot on Diet.

COD.† } n. s. [asellus.] A sea fish.
Co'DFISH. }

She that in wisdom never was so frail,
To change the cod's head for the salmon's tail.
Shakspeare, Othello.

COD.† n. s. [cobbe, Sax.]

1. Any case or husk in which seeds are lodged.

I remember the wooing of a peascod instead of her; from whom I took two cods, and giving her them again, said, Wear these for my sake.
Shakspeare, As you Like it.

Thy corn thou there may'st safely sow,
Where in full cods last year rich pease did grow.
May.

They let pease lie in small heaps as they are reaped, 'till they find the hawm and cod dry.
Mortimer, Husbandry.

2. A pillow. [Goth. kodde; Sax. cobbe; cneopan on hiſ mycele cobbe, to consult his pillow. Sax. Chron. Lye, edit Manning.] The word is yet used in the north of England for a cushion or pillow.

To Cod. v. n. [from the noun.] To inclose in a cod.
All codded grain being a destroyer of weeds, an improver of land, and a preparer of it for other crops. Mortimer.

Co'dders. n. s. pl. [from cod.] Gatherers of pease. Dict.

To Co'ddle.† See To Codle.

Co'ddy.* adj. [from cod.] Husky. Sherwood.

Co'dger.* n. s. [perhaps from the Span. coger, "to gather, to get as he can," Minsheu; whence cogedor, a gatherer. Lat. colligere.] Contemptuously used for a miser, one who rakes together all he can.

Code. n. s. [codex, Lat.]
1. A book.
2. A book of the civil law.
We find in the Theodosian and Justinian code the interest of trade very well provided for.
Arbuthnot on Coins.
Indentures, cov'nants, articles they draw,
Large as the fields themselves; and larger far
Than civil codes with all their glosses are.
Pope, Sat.

CO'DICIL. n. s. [codicillus, Lat.] An appendage to a will.
The man suspects his lady's crying,
Was but to gain him to appoint her,
By codicil, a larger jointure. Prior.

Codici'llary.* adj. [from codicil.] Of the nature of a codicil.
An unfinished paper not established as codicillary. Phillimore's Reports, vol. ii. p. 30.

Codi'lle. n. s. [codille, Fr. codillo, Span.] A term at ombre, when the game is won.
She sees, and trembles at the approaching ill,
Just in the jaws of ruin, and codille.
Pope, Rape of the Lock.

To CO'DLE.† v. a. [coquo, coctulo, Lat. Skinner.] To parboil; to soften by the heat of water.
Dear prince Pippin,
Down with your noble blood; or, as I live,
I'll have you codled. Beaum. and Fl. Philaster.

To Co'dle.* v. a. [perhaps from the old Fr. cadeler, to breed up tenderly; or a corruption of coll. See To Coll.] To make much of.

Co'dling.† n. s. [from To codle.] An apple, generally codled, to be mixed with milk, Dr. Johnson says; and, it may be added, an apple not quite ripe. The fruit, at present styled a codling, is said to have been unknown to our gardens in the time of queen Elizabeth.
In July come gilliflowers of all varieties, early pears and plums in fruit, gennitings and codlings.
Bacon, Essays.
Not yet old enough for a man, nor young enough for a boy; as a squash is before 'tis a peascod, or a codling when 'tis almost an apple.
Shakspeare, Twelfth Night.
Their entertainment at the height,
In cream and codlings rev'ling with delight.
King's Cookery.
He let it lie all winter in a gravel walk, south of a codling hedge. Mortimer, Husbandry.
A codling, ere it went his lip in,
Wou'd strait become a golden pippin. Swift.

Coe'fficacy. n. s. [con and efficacia, Lat.] The power of several things acting together to produce an effect.
We cannot in general infer the efficacy of those stars, or coefficacy particular in medications.
Brown, Vulg. Err.

Coeffi'ciency. n. s. [con and efficio, Lat.] Co-operation; the state of acting together to some single end.
The managing and carrying on of this work, by the spirit's instrumental coefficiency, requires, that they be kept together, without distinction or dissipation. Glanville, Scepsis.

COEFFI'CIENT.† n. s. [con and efficiens, Lat.]
1. That which unites its action with the action of another.
2. [In algebra.] Such numbers or given quantities, that are put before letters, or unknown quantities, into which letters they are supposed to be multiplied, and so do make a rectangle, or product with the letters; as $4a$, bx, cxx; where 4 is the coefficient of $4a$; b of bx, and c of cxx. Chambers.
3. In fluxions.
The coefficient of any generating term (in fluxions) is the quantity arising by the division of that term, by the generated quantity. Chambers.
From thence are derived rules for obtaining the fluxions of all other products and powers; be the coefficients or the indexes what they will, integers or fractions, rational or surd.
Bp. Berkley, Analyst, § ix.

Coeffi'ciently.* adv. [from coefficient.] In a co-operating manner.

Coe'lder.* n. s. [from con and elder.] An elder of the same rank.
The elders which are among you I exhort, who also am an elder, 1 Pet. v. 1. He exhorts, not commands: He also is an elder, i. e. as others are. In the original it is συμπρεσβυτερος, coelder.
Trapp's Popery truly stated, P. i. § 5.

Co'eliack Passion.† [old Fr. coeliaque, from Gr. κοιλία, the belly.] A diarrhœa, or flux, that arises from the indigestion or putrefaction of food in the stomach and bowels, whereby the aliment comes away little altered from what it was when eaten, or changed like corrupted stinking flesh. Quincy.

Cœmetery. See Cemetery.

Coe'mption. n. s. [coemptio, Lat.] The act of buying up the whole quantity of any thing.
Monopolies and coemption of wares for resale, where they are not restrained, are great means to enrich. Bacon, Essays.

Cœnoby.* See Cenoby.

To Coenjo'y.* v. a. [from con and enjoy.] To enjoy together.
I wish my soul no other felicity, when she hath shaken off these rags of flesh, than to ascend to his, and co-enjoy the same bliss.
Howell, Lett. i. vi. 7.

CO'EQUAL. adj. [from con and equalis, Lat.] Equal; being of the same rank or dignity with another.
Henry the Fifth did sometime prophecy,
If once he came to be a cardinal,
He'll make his cap coequal with the crown.
Shakspeare, Hen. VI.

Coequa'lity.† n. s. [from coequal.] The state of being equal
The co-equality and co-eternity of the Son with the Father was denied. Hooker, Eccl. Pol.
The Unity in Trinity, and the Trinity in Unity is to be worshipped; namely, on account of their perfect co-eternity and co-equality.
Waterland on the Ath. Creed.

To COE'RCE. v. a. [coerceo, Lat.] To restrain; to keep in order by force.
Punishments are manifold, that they may coerce this profligate sort. Ayliffe, Parergon.

Coe'rcible. adj. [from coerce.]
1. That may be restrained.
2. That ought to be restrained.

Coe'rcion.† n. s. [old Fr. cohërcion, coërtion.] Penal restraint; check.
The coercion or execution of the sentence in ecclesiastical courts, is only by excommunication of the person contumacious.
Hale, Common Law.
Government has coercion and animadversion upon such as neglect their duty; without which coercive power, all government is toothless and precarious. South.

Coe'rcive. adj. [from coerce.]
1. That has the power of laying restraint.
All things on the surface spread, are bound
By their coercive vigour to the ground.
Blackmore.
2. That has the authority of restraining by punishment.
For ministers to seek that themselves might have coercive power over the church, would have been hardly construed. Hooker, Pref.
The virtues of a general, or a king, are prudence, counsel, active fortitude, coercive power, awful command, and the exercise of magnanimity, as well as justice. Dryden.

COESSE'NTIAL. adj. [con and essentia, Lat.] Participating of the same essence.
The Lord our God is but one God, in which indivisible unity we adore the Father, as being altogether of himself; we glorify that consubstantial word which is the Son; we bless and magnify that coessential Spirit eternally proceeding from both, which is the Holy Ghost. Hooker.

Coessentia'lity.† n. s. [from coessential.] Participation of the same essence.
The appellation of the Son of God, assumed by him, [Christ,] implies the same kind of relation to him, as that of a man to his father; that is, it implies coessentiality with God, and therefore equality of nature, and consequently divinity in its full extent.
Burgess, Serm. on the Div. of Christ, 1790, p. 41.

Coesse'ntially.* adv. [from coessential.] In a coessential manner.

Coesta'blishment.* n. s. [from con and establish.] Joint establishment.
The morals of the community will be better secured by an exclusive establishment, at the publick expence, of the teachers of one sect, than by a coestablishment of the teachers of different sects of christians.
Bp. of Landaff's (Watson's) Charge, 1791, p. 11.

Coeta'nean.* n. s. [from con and ætas.] One of the same time or age with another.
Old major Stansby, of Hants, a most intimate friend and neighbour, and coetanean of the late earle of Southampton.
Aubrey, Anecd. of Sir W. Ralegh, ii. 516.

COETA'NEOUS. adj. [con and ætas, Lat.] Of the same age with another: with to.

Eve was old as Adam, and Cain their son coetaneous unto both. Brown, Vulg. Err.

Every fault hath penal effects, coetaneous to the act. Government of the Tongue, § 5.

Through the body every member sustains another; and all are coetaneous, because none can subsist alone. Bentley, Serm.

COETE'RNAL.† adj. [old Fr. coëternel, from con, and æternas, Lat.] Equally eternal with another.

Or of the eternal coeternal beam. Milton, P. L.

COETE'RNALLY. adv. [from coeternal.] In a state of equal eternity with another.

Arius had dishonoured his coeternally begotten Son. Hooker, v. § 52.

COETE'RNITY.† n. s. [from coeternal.] Having existence from eternity equal with another eternal being.

The eternity of the Son's generation, and his coeternity and consubstantiality with the Father, when he came down from heaven, and was incarnate. Hammond, Fundamentals.

Vain therefore was that opinion of a real matter coeval with God as necessary for production of the world by way of subject, as the Eternal and Almighty God by way of efficient — This coeternity of matter opposeth God's independency. Pearson on the Creed, Art. I.

COE'VAL. adj. [coævus, Lat.]

1. Of the same age.

Even his teeth and white, like a young flock,
Coeval and new shorn, from the clear brook
Recent. Prior.

2. Of the same age with another: followed by with.

This religion cannot pretend to be coeval with man. Hale, Origin of Mankind.

The monthly revolutions of the moon, or the diurnal of the earth upon its own axis, by the very hypothesis are coeval with the former. Bentley.

Silence! coeval with eternity;
Thou wert, ere nature first began to be:
'Twas one vast nothing all, and all slept fast in thee! Pope.

3. Sometimes by to.

Although we had no monuments of religion ancienter than idolatry, we have no reason to conclude, that idolatrous religion was coeval to mankind. Hale, Origin of Mankind.

COE'VAL.† n. s. [from the adjective.] A contemporary; but properly one not only living at the same time, but of the same time of life.

Even Tully himself was taunted at by his coevals. Hakewill on Providence, p. 29.

As it were not enough to have outdone all your coevals in wit, you will excel them in good nature. Pope.

COE'VOUS. adj. [coævus, Lat.] .One of the same age.

Then it should not have been the first, as supposing some other things coevous to it. South, Serm.

To COEXI'ST. v. n. [con and existo, Lat.]

1. To exist at the same time.

The three stars that coexist in heavenly constellations, are a multitude of stars. Hale, Origin of Mankind.

Of substances no one has any clear idea, farther than of certain simple ideas coexisting together. Locke.

2. Followed by with.

It is sufficient that we have the idea of the length of any regular periodical appearances, which we can in our minds apply to duration, with which the motion or appearance never co-existed. Locke.

COEXI'STENCE. n. s. [from coexist.]

1. Having existence at the same time with another: with to.

Locke, who in the preceding lines has coexisted with, has here coexistence to.

The measuring of any duration, by some motion, depends not on the real coexistence of that thing to that motion, or any other periods of revolution. Locke.

2. More commonly followed by with.

We can demonstrate the being of God's eternal ideas, and their coexistence with him. Grew, Cosmol.

COEXI'STENT. adj. [from coexist.]

1. Having existence at the same time with another: with to.

To the measuring the duration of any thing by time, it is not requisite that that thing should be coexistent to the motion we measure by, or any other periodical revolution. Locke.

2. Sometimes with.

This proves no antecedent necessity, but coexistent with the act. Bp. Bramhall, Answer to Hobbes.

Time is taken for so much of duration as is coexistent with the motions of the great bodies of the universe. Locke.

All that one point is either future or past, and no parts are coexistent or contemporary with it. Bentley.

To COEXTE'ND.† v. a. [con and extendo, Latin.] To extend to the same space or duration with another.

Every motion is, in some sort, coextended with the body moved. Grew, Cosmol.

Has your English language one single word that is coextended through all these significations? Bentley, Phil. Lips. ii. § 35.

COEXTE'NSION. n. s. [from coextend.] The act or state of extending to the same space or duration with another.

Though it be a spirit, I find it is no inconvenience to have some analogy, at least of coextension with my body. Hale.

COEXTE'NSIVE.* adj. [from con and extensive.] Having the same extent.

The objects of the society are coextensive with the true spirit of christian charity. Bp. Winchester, (North,) Serm. (1790.)

COEXTE'NSIVELY.* adv. [from coextensive.] In a coextensive manner.

CO'FFEE.† n. s. [It is originally Arabick, pronounced caheu by the Turks, and cahuah by the Arabs; and by us formerly written coffa, and cauphé. See Blount's Voyage to the Levant, p. 27. and Burton's Anat. of Mel. p. 397. See also COFFEE-HOUSE.] The tree is a species of Arabick jessamine.

It is found to succeed as well in the Carribbee islands as in their native place of growth: but whether the coffee produced in the West Indies will prove as good as that from Mocha in Arabia Felix, time will discover. Miller.

Coffee denotes a drink prepared from the berries, very familiar in Europe, for these eighty years, and among the Turks for one hundred and fifty. Thevenot, the traveller, was the first who brought it into France, and a Greek servant, called Pasqua, brought into England by Mr. Daniel Edwards, a Turky merchant, in 1652, to make his coffee, first set up the profession of coffeeman, and introduced the drink among us. Chambers.

They have in Turky a drink called coffee, made of a berry of the same name, as black as soot, and of a strong scent, but not aromatical; which they take, beaten into powder, in water, as hot as they can drink it. This drink comforteth the brain and heart, and helpeth digestion. Bacon.

To part her time 'twixt reading and bohea,
Or o'er cold coffee trifle with the spoon. Pope.

CO'FFEEHOUSE.† n. s. [coffee and house.] A house of entertainment where coffee is sold, and the guests are supplied with newspapers. Burton is one of the earliest users of this compound. Coffee, however, was still a novelty in England so late as 1650, as the remark of Anthony Wood shews.

They [the Turks] spend much time in those coffa-houses, which are somewhat like our alehouses and taverns. Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 397.

This yeare (1650) Jacob a Jew opened a coffey house at the Angel in the parish of S. Peter in the East, Oxon; and there it was by some, who delighted in noveltie, drank. Life of A. Wood, p. 65.

At ten, from coffeehouse or play,
Returning, finishes the day. Prior.

It is a point they do not concern themselves about, farther than perhaps as a subject in a coffeehouse. Swift.

CO'FFEEMAN. n. s. [coffee and man.] One that keeps a coffeehouse.

Consider your enemies the Lacedemonians; did ever you hear that they preferred a coffeeman to Agesilaus? Addison.

CO'FFEEPOT.† n. s. [coffee and pot.] The covered pot in which coffee is boiled; or the pot into which the coffee, when boiled, is poured.

It is doubtless as hard to make a coffee-pot shine in poetry as a plough. Dr. Warton, Ess. on Pope.

CO'FFER.† n. s. [coppe, Saxon; cofre, old Fr. a chest; Lat. cophinus; Gr. κόφινος, a basket.]

1. A chest generally for keeping money.

Two iron coffers hung on either side,
With precious metal full as they could hold. Spenser, F. Q.

The lining of his coffers shall make coats
To deck our soldiers for these Irish wars. Shakspeare, Rich. II.

If you destroy your governour that is wealthy, you must chuse another, who will fill his coffers out of what is left. L'Estrange.

2. Treasure.

He would discharge it without any burthen to the queen's coffers, for honour sake. Bacon, Advice to Villiers.

3. [In architecture.] A square depressure in each interval between the modillions of the Corinthian cornice, usually filled with some enrichment. Chambers.

4. [In fortification.] A hollow lodgement across a dry moat, from six to seven foot deep, and from sixteen to eighteen broad; the upper part being made of pieces of timber, raised two foot above the level of the moat; which little elevation has hurdles laden with earth for its covering, and serves as a parapet with embrasures. Chambers.

To CO'FFER.† v. a. [old Fr. coffrer.] To treasure up in chests.

Treasure, as a war might draw forth, so a peace succeeding might coffer up. Bacon, Hen. VII.

Co'FFERER.* n. s. [from coffer.] One who places treasure in a chest or coffer.

Ye fortune's cofferers, ye powers of wealth,
You do your rent-rolls most felonious wrong!
Young, Night Thoughts, 2.

Co'FFERER of the King's Household.† n. s. A principal officer of his majesty's court, next under the comptroller, that, in the compting-house and elsewhere, hath a special oversight of other officers of the household, for their good demeanour in their offices. Cowel.

He [Sir T. Pope] is likewise said to have been appointed cofferer to the household.
Warton, Life of Sir T. Pope, p. 41.

CO'FFIN.† n. s. [coffin, Fr. cophinus, Lat. κόφινος, Gr. a basket; which is the ancient application of our word. "Yit understonden not ye, neither han mynde of fyve looves unto fyve thousynde men; and how many coffyns ye taken?" Wicliffe, St. Matt. xvi. Barret writes the word cophin, under BIER.]

1. The box or chest in which dead bodies are put into the ground. It is used both of wood and other matter.

He went as if he had been the coffin that carried himself to his sepulchre. Sidney.

Not a flower sweet
On my black coffin let there be strown.
Shakspeare, Twelfth Night.

One fate they have,
The ship their coffin, and the sea their grave.
Waller.

The joiner is fitting screws to your coffin. Swift.

2. A mould of paste for a pye.

Of the paste a coffin will I rear,
And make two pasties of your shameful heads.
Titus Andron.

3. A paper case, in form of a cone, used by grocers.

4. In farriery.

COFFIN of a horse, is the whole hoof of the foot above the coronet, including the coffin bone. The coffin bone is a small spongy bone, inclosed in the midst of the hoof, and possessing the whole form of the foot. Farrier's Dict.

To Co'FFIN.† v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To inclose in a coffin.

Would'st thou have laugh'd had I come coffin'd home,
That weep'st to see me triumph?
Shakspeare, Coriolanus.

Let me lie
In prison, and here be coffin'd, when I die.
Donne.

2. Simply, to enclose; to confine.

Devotion is not coffin'd in a cell,
Nor chok'd by wealth.
John Hall, Poems, (1646.) p. 59.

3. To cover, as with paste for a pye. See COFFIN.

And coffin'd in crust 'till now she was hoary.
B. Jonson, Masq. of Gipsies, Metamorph.

Co'FFINMAKER. n. s. [coffin and maker.] One whose trade is to make coffins.

Where will be your sextons, coffinmakers, and plummers? Tatler.

COFO'UNDER.* n. s. A joint founder.

The ancestors of Sir E. Sackville, Knight of the Bath and Earl of Dorset, were great benefactors, or rather cofounders of this religious structure.
Weever, Fun. Monum. p. 613.

COG.* n. s. See To COG. A piece of deceit; prevarication; trick.

So letting it pass for an ordinary cog amongst them, a half-witted man may see there is nothing makes for them or their advantage.
Watson's Quodlibets of Religion and State, (1602,) p. 338.

To COG.† v. a. [A word of uncertain original, derived by Skinner from coqueliner, French; by Lye from cogge. See To COAX.]

1. To flatter; to wheedle; to sooth by adulatory speeches.

I'll mountebank their loves,
Cog their hearts from them, and come home belov'd
Of all the trades in Rome.' Shakspeare, Coriolanus.

He plays the most notorious hobby horse, jesting and frisking in the luxury of his nonsense with such poor fetches to cog a laughter from us.
Milton, Colasterion.

But if some fortune cog them into love,
In what a fifteenth sphere then do they move!
John Hall, Poems, (1646,) p. 11.

To COG a die. To secure it, so as to direct its fall; to falsify.

Notwithstanding this cogged number of his provincial synods, and private decrees, (as Volusion terms them,) all the time of the first 700 years, the freedom of this practice continued in many parts of the Christian world.
Bp. Hall, Hon. of the Married Clergy, p. 248.

But then my study was to cog the dice,
And dexterously to throw the lucky sice.
Dryden, Pers. Sat.

For guineas in other men's breeches,
Your gamesters will palm and will cog. Swift.

Ye gallants of Newgate, whose fingers are nice
In diving in pockets, or cogging of dice. Swift.

3. To obtrude by falsehood.

The outcry is, that I abuse his demonstration by a falsification, by cogging in the word.
Tillotson, Preface.

I have cogged in the word to serve my turn.
Stilling fleet.

Fustian tragedies, or insipid comedies, have, by concerted applauses, been cogged upon the town for masterpieces. Dennis.

To COG. v. n. To lie; to wheedle.

Now stealeth he, now will he crave,
And now will he cosen and cog. Tusser.

Mrs. Ford, I cannot cog; I cannot prate, Mrs. Ford: now shall I sin in my wish.
Shakspeare, Merry Wives of Windsor.

COG.† n. s. [perhaps from the Lat. cogo, to force.] The tooth of a wheel, by which it acts upon another wheel.

He cannot adapt the cogs of his wheels, his screws, his pullies. Dean Tucker's Cui Bono.

To COG. v. a. [from the noun.] To fix cogs in a wheel.

COG.* n. s. [Goth. kogge; Teut. kogghe, a light boat; Welsh, ewch, a boat; low Lat. cogo, "navigii genus quod cogs Anglici dicunt, Galli coquets." Du Cange. This word cogo is also written coggo, cogga, coca, cocka. Hence our cock-boat. Chaucer gives the old word cogge; and it is yet used on the Yorkshire coast.] A cock-boat; a little boat.

And for the cogg was narrow, small, and strait,
Alone he row'd, and bade his squires there wait.
Fairfax, Tass. xiv. 58.

Co'GENCY. n. s. [from cogent.] Force; strength; power of compelling; conviction.

Maxims and axioms, principles of science, because they are self-evident, have been supposed innate; although nobody ever shewed the foundation of their clearness and cogency. Locke.

COGE'NIAL.* adj. [from con and genus. The same as congenial, which see.] Cognate; kindred.

Coccaie is often cited by Rabelais, a writer of a cogenial cast, Warton, Hist. of Eng. Poetry, ii. 357.

CO'GENT.† adj. [old Fr. cogent; cogens, Latin.] Forcible; resistless; convincing; powerful; having the power to compel conviction.

Such is the cogent force of nature. Prior.

They have contrived methods of deceit, one repugnant to another, to evade, if possible, this most cogent proof of a Deity. Bentley.

Co'GENTLY. adv. [from cogent.] With resistless force; forcibly; so as to force conviction.

They forbid us to hearken to those proofs, as weak or fallacious, which our own existence, and the sensible parts of the universe, offer so clearly and cogently to our thoughts. Locke.

Co'GGER.† n. s. [from To cog.] A flatterer; a wheedler. Sherwood.

Co'GGERY.* n. s. [from cog.] Trick; falsehood; deceit.

This is a second false surmise or coggerie of the Jesuits to keep the ignorant in error.
Watson's Quodlibets of Religion and State, (1602,) p. 195.

Therefore can I not but often smile in my sleeve to hear and see the Jesuits' coggery in every thing.
Ibid. p. 221.

Co'GGING.* n. s. [from cog.] Cheat; fallacy; imposture. Sherwood.

Nay, nay, I do beseech you leave your cogging.

Co'GGLESTONE. n. s. [cugolo, Ital.] A little stone; a small pebble. Skinner.

Co'GITABLE. adj. [from cogito, Latin.] That may be thought on; that may be the subject of thought.

To CO'GITATE.† v. n. [cogito, Lat.] To think.

As the life of the body is entertained in still cogitating, so is our spirit nourished in reducing to memory her function. Donne, Hist. of the Septuagint, (1633,) p. 101.

COGITA'TION. n. s. [cogitatio, Latin.]

1. Thought; the act of thinking.

Having their cogitations darkened, and being strangers from the life of God, from the ignorance which is in them. Hooker.

A picture puts me in mind of a friend; the intention of the mind in seeing, is carried to the object represented, which is no more than simple cogitation or apprehension of the person.
Stilling fleet.

This Descartes proves, that brutes have no cogitation, because they could never be brought to signify their thoughts by any artificial signs.
Ray on the Creation.

These powers of cogitation, and volition, and sensation, are neither inherent in matter as such, nor acquirable to matter by any motion and modification of it. Bentley.

2. Purpose; reflection previous to action.

The king, perceiving that his desires were intemperate, and his cogitations vast and irregular, began not to brook him well. Bacon, Henry VII.

3. Meditation; contemplation; mental speculation.

On some great charge employ'd
He seem'd, or fixt in cogitation deep.
Milton, P. L.

Co'GITATIVE.† adj. [from cogito, Latin.]

1. Having the power of thought and reflection.

And though the philosophers have usually distinguished them into more, as into the common sense, the phansie, both estimative, and cogitative; yet really and truly they are but one.
Smith, Portraiture of Old Age, p. 42.

If these powers of cogitation and sensation are neither inherent in matter, nor acquirable to matter, they proceed from some cogitative substance, which we call spirit and soul. Bentley.

2. Given to thought and deep meditation.

The earl had the closer and more reserved countenance, being by nature somewhat more cogitative.
Wotton, Parallel of Lords Essex and Buckingham.

CO'GNATE.* adj. [Lat. cognatus.] Kindred; partaking of the same nature.

Which atoms are still hovering up and down, and never rest till they meet with some pores proportionable and cognate to their figures, where they acquiesce. Howell, Lett. iv. 50.

Some neuter cognate substantive.
Johnson's Noctes Nottinghamicæ, p. 82.

Imbrute, I believe, is a word of Milton's coinage. So was the cognate compound "imparadised" supposed to be, till Bentley brought an instance from Sidney's Arcadia.
Warton, Notes on Milton's Smaller Poems.

COGNA'TION.† n. s. [cognatio, Lat.; cognation, old Fr.]

1. Kindred; descent from the same original.

Much moved hereto upon the account of his cognation with the Æacides and kings of Molossus.
Sir T. Brown's Miscell. Tracts, p. 159.

As by our cognation to the body of the first Adam we took in death, so by our union with the body of the second Adam we shall have the inheritance of life. Bp. Taylor, Holy Dying, v. § 4.

Truth hath a cognation with the soul.
Cudworth, Serm. p. 81.

Two vices I shall mention, as being of near cognation to ingratitude, pride, and hard-heartedness, or want of compassion. South.

Let the criticks tell me what certain sense they could put upon either of these four words, by their mere cognation with each other.
Watts on the Mind.

2. Relation; participation of the same nature.

For as much as a priest is to have a cognation or conjunction of nature with those for whom he is to offer sacrifices. South, Serm. viii. 275.

He induceth us to ascribe effects unto causes of no cognation. Brown, Vulg. Err.

COGNISE'E. n. s. [In law.] He to whom a fine in lands or tenements is acknowledged. Cowel.

CO'GNISOUR. n. s. [In law.] Is he that passeth or acknowledgeth a fine in lands or tenements to another. Cowel.

COGNI'TION. n. s. [cognitio, Lat.] Knowledge; complete conviction.

I will not be myself nor have cognition
Of what I feel: I am all patience.
Shakspeare, Troil. and Cressida.

God, as he created all things, so is he beyond and in them all, not only in power, as under his subjection, or in his presence, as in his cognition; but in their very essence, as in the soul of their casualties. Brown, Vulg. Err.

CO'GNITIVE. adj. [from cognitus, Latin.] Having the power of knowing.

Unless the understanding employ and exercise its cognitive or apprehensive power about these terms, there can be no actual apprehension of them. South, Serm.

CO'GNIZABLE. adj. [cognoisable, French.]

1. That falls under judicial notice.

2. Liable to be tried, judged, or examined.

Some are merely of ecclesiastical cognizance, others of a mixed nature, such as are cognizable both in the ecclesiastical and secular courts.
Ayliff's Parergon.

CO'GNIZANCE.† n. s. [old Fr. cognizance.]

1. Judicial notice; trial; judicial authority.

It is worth the while, however, to consider how we may discountenance and prevent those evils which the law can take no cognizance of.
L'Estrange.

Happiness or misery, in converse with others, depends upon things which human laws can take no cognizance of. South.

The moral crime is completed, there are only circumstances wanting to work it up for the cognizance of the law. Addison.

2. A badge by which any one is known.

And at the king's going away the earl's servants stood, in a seemly manner, in their livery coats, with cognizances, ranged on both sides, and made the king a bow. Bacon, Hen. VII.

These were the proper cognizances and coat arms of the tribes. Brown, Vulg. Err.

All believing persons, and all churches congregated in the name of Christ, washed in the same laver of regeneration, eating of the same bread, and drinking of the same cup, are united in the same nizance, and so known to be the same church.
Pearson on the Creed, Art. IX.

3. Knowledge by recollection. Not now in use.

Who, soon as on that knight his eye did glance,
Eftsoones of him had perfect cognizance.
Spenser, F. Q. ii. i. 31.

COGNO'MINAL.† adj. [cognomen, Lat.]

1. Having the same name.

Nor do those animals more resemble the creatures on earth, than they on earth the constellations which pass under animal names in heaven; nor the dogfish at sea much more make out the dog of the land, than his cognominal or namesake in the heavens. Brown, Vulg. Err.

2. Belonging to the surname.

The first of these two [names] is Pontius, the name descended to him from the original of his family;—the second, Pilatus, as a cognominal addition distinguishing from the rest descending from the same original.
Pearson on the Creed, Art. IV.

To COGNO'MINATE.* v. a. [Lat. cognomino.] To give a name. Cockeram.

COGNOMINA'TION. n. s. [cognomen, Latin.]

1. A surname; the name of a family.

2. A name added from any accident or quality.

Pompey deserved the name Great: Alexander, of the same cognomination, was generalissimo of Greece. Brown.

COGNO'SCENCE.† n. s. [old Fr. cognoissance, from cognosco, Latin.] Knowledge; the state or act of knowing.
Dict.

And yet of that near object have no cognoscence.
More, Song of the Soul, iii. ii. 51.

*COGNOSCE'NTE. n. s. [pl. cognoscenti, Ital. Of late years used in English.] One well versed in any thing; a connoisseur.

Ask a person of the most refined musical taste, an absolute cognoscente, if you please.
Mason on Church Musick, p. 77.

COGNOSCIBI'LITY.* n. s. [from cognoscible.] The quality of being knowable.

The cognoscibility of God is manifest in and by them. Barrow, Expos. of the Creed.

COGNO'SCIBLE.† adj. [cognosco, Latin.]

1. That may be known; being the object of knowledge.

In matters cognoscible, and framed for our disquisition, our industry must be our oracle.
Sir T. Brown's Miscell. Tracts, p. 179.

God is naturally cognoscible by inartificial means.
Bp. Barlow's Remains, p. 546.

The same that is said for the redundance of matters intelligible and cognoscible in things natural, may be applied to things artificial.
Hale, Origin of Mankind.

2. That falls under judicial notice.

When a witness is called before a judge, to give evidence upon oath concerning a third person, in a matter cognoscible by that jurisdiction, he is bound to swear in truth, in judgement, and in righteousness. Bp. Hall, Cases of Consc. D. ii. C. 5.

Here the mayor and magistrates of Gloucester did that which was no way warrantable by their charter, in which case they may be accountable, all or some: but in the high-commission we medled with no cause not cognoscible there.
Abp. Laud's Diary, &c. i. 333.

COGNO'SCITIVE.* adj. [old Fr. cognoscitive.] Having the power of knowing.

I suppose prescience to be an act of the understanding, (as likewise all science,) which alone is cognoscitive. Bp. Barlow's Remains, p. 573.

To COHA'BIT.† v. n. [cohabito, Latin.]

1. To dwell with another in the same place.

The Philistines were worsted by the captivated ark, which foraged their country more than a conquering army: they were not able to cohabit with that holy thing. South.

2. To live together as husband and wife.

He knew her not to be his own wife, and yet had a design to cohabit with her as such.
Fiddes, Sermons.

COHA'BITANT.† n. s. [from cohabit.] An inhabitant of the same place.

We receive fashions and condicions of our companions; and as diseases passe from one bodie to another by touching, even so doth the mind pour her infection into her neighbour. The drunkard leadeth his guests into drunkenness. Effeminate men and softlings cause the stout man to wax tender. Covetousness transferreth her poison into cohabitants.
Woolton's Christian Manuell. (1576,) L. 6. b.

The oppressed Indians protest against that heaven where the Spaniards are to be their cohabitants. Decay of Piety.

COHABITA'TION.† n. s. [from cohabit.]

1. The act or state of inhabiting the same place with another.

Nestorius graunted two natures in Christ, yet not, as you saie, from his nativitie, nor by adunation, but by cohabitation or inhabitation, so that he made but one Christ.
Abp. Cranmer, to Bp. Gardiner, p. 353.

There shall be a cohabitation of the spirit with flesh, in a mystical or moral sense.
More, Conj. Cabbalist. p. 218.

Those colonies and legions that had so long cohabitation and coalition with them.
Howell, Instruct. for Trav. p. 147.

They agreed together, by pacts and covenants, neither to do nor suffer injury; but to submit to rules of equality, and make laws by compact; in order to their peaceable cohabitation.
Hallywell's Excell. of Moral Virtue, p. 79.

2. The state of living together as married persons.

Which defect, though it could not evacuate a marriage after cohabitation, and actual consummation, yet it was enough to make void a contract.
Bacon, Hen. VII.

But how the peace and perpetual cohabitation of marriage can be kept, how that benevolent and intimate communion of body can be held with one that must be hated with a most operative hatred, must be forsaken, and yet continually dwelt with and accompanied.
Milton, Doctrine and Discipline of Divorce.

Monsieur Brumars, at one hundred and two years, died for love of his wife, who was ninety-two at her death, after seventy years cohabitation. Tatler, No. 56.

COHE'IR. n. s. [cohæres, Lat.] One of several among whom an inheritance is divided.

Married persons, and widows and virgins, are all coheirs in the inheritance of Jesus, if they live within the laws of their estate. Bp. Taylor's Holy Living.

COHE'IRESS.† n. s. [from coheir.] A woman who has an equal share of an inheritance with other women.

Gilbert de Clare, earl of Gloucester, in default of male issue, made his three sisters coheiresses. Ashmole, Berk. ii. 276.

To COHE'RE.† v. n. [old Fr. coherer, Lat. cohæreo.]

1. To stick together; to hold fast one to another, as parts of the same mass.

Two pieces of marble, having their surface exactly plain, polite, and applied to each other in such a manner as to intercept the air, do cohere firmly together as one. Woodward.

We find that the force, whereby bodies cohere, is very much greater when they come to immediate contact, than when they are at ever so small a finite distance. Cheyne, Phil. Prin.

None want a place for all their center found,
Hung to the goddess, and coher'd around;
Not closer, orb in orb conglob'd, are seen
The buzzing bees about their dusky queen.
Pope, Dunciad.

2. To be well connected; to follow regularly in the order of discourse.

They have been inserted, where they best seemed to cohere. Burke, Thoughts on Scarcity, Pref.

3. To suit; to fit; to be fitted to.

Had time coher'd with place, or place with wishing. Shakspeare.

4. To agree.

He [Vortigern] was at length burnt in his tower by fire from Heaven, at the prayer, as some say, of German; but that coheres not; as others, by Ambrosius Aurelian. Milton, Hist. of Eng. B. iii.

COHE'RENCE. } n. s. [cohærentia, Latin.]
COHE'RENCY. }

1. That state of bodies in which their parts are joined together, from what cause soever it proceeds, so that they resist divulsion and separation; nor can be separated by the same force by which they might be simply moved, or being only laid upon one another, might be parted again. Quincy.

The pressure of the air will not explain, nor can be a cause of the coherence of the particles of air themselves. Locke.

Matter is either fluid or solid; words that may comprehend the middle degrees between extreme fixedness and coherency, and the most rapid intestine motion. Bentley.

2. Connection; dependency; the relation of parts or things one to another.

It shall be no trouble to find each controversy's resting place, and the coherence it hath with things, either on which it dependeth, or which depend on it. Hooker, Preface.

Why between sermons and faith should there be ordinarily that coherence, which causes have with their usual effects? Hooker.

3. The texture of a discourse, by which one part follows another regularly and naturally.

4. Consistency in reasoning, or relating, so that one part of the discourse does not destroy or contradict the rest.

Coherence of discourse, and a direct tendency of all the parts of it to the argument in hand, are most eminently to be found in him. Locke, Preface to St. Paul's Epistles.

COHE'RENT. adj. [cohærens, Latin.]

1. Sticking together, so as to resist separation.

By coagulating and diluting, that is, making their parts more or less coherent. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

Where all must full, or not coherent be;
And all that rises, rise in due degree.
Pope, Essay on Man.

2. Connected; united.

The mind proceeds from the knowledge it stands possessed of already, to that which lies next and is coherent to it, and so on to what it aims at. Locke.

3. Suitable to something else; regularly adapted.

Instruct my daughter,
That time and place, with this deceit so lawful,
May prove coherent. Shakspeare, All's well that ends well.

4. Consistent; not contradictory to itself.

A coherent thinker, and a strict reasoner, is not to be made at once by a set of rules. Watts, Logick.

COHE'SION.† n. s. [old Fr. coesion.]

1. The act of sticking together.

Hard particles, heaped together, touch in a few points, and must be separable by less force than breaks a solid particle, whose parts touch in all the space between them, without any pores or interstices to weaken their cohesion. Newton's Opt.

Solids and fluids differ in the degree of cohesion, which, being increased, turns a fluid into a solid. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

2. The state of union or inseparability.

What cause of their cohesion can you find?
What props support, what chains the fabrick bind?
Blackmore.

3. Connection; dependence.

In their tender years, ideas that have no natural cohesion, come to be united in their heads. Locke.

COHE'SIVE. adj. [from cohere.] That has the power of sticking to another, and of resisting separation.

COHE'SIVELY.* adv. [from cohesive.] In a connected or dependent manner.

COHE'SIVENESS. n. s. [from cohesive.] The quality of being cohesive; the quality of resisting separation.

To COHI'BIT. v. a. [cohibeo, Lat.] To restrain; to hinder. Dict.

COHIBI'TION.* n. s. [cohibitio, Lat.] Hinderance; restraint. Formerly in use, but considered in 1655 as a word requiring explanation among other words in Bagwell's astronomy of that date.

To CO'HOBATE.† v. a. To pour the distilled liquour upon the remaining matter, and distil it again.

The juices of an animal body are, as it were, cohobated, being excreted and admitted again into the blood with the fresh aliment. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

Pour upon it [powder of antimony] the rectified oil, which abstract and cohobate seven times, till such time as the powder has imbibed all the oil, and is quite dry. Greenhill, Art of Embalming, (1705,) p. 354.

COHOBA'TION. n. s. [from cohobate.] A returning any distilled liquour again upon what it was drawn from, or upon fresh ingredients of the same kind, to have it more impregnated with their virtues. Quincy.

Cohobation is the pouring the liquor distilled from any thing back upon the remaining matter, and distilling it again. Locke.

This oil, dulcified by cohobation with an aromatized spirit, is of use to restore the digestive faculty. Grew's Museum.

CO'HORT.† n. s. [cohorte, old Fr. cohors, Lat.]

1. A troop of soldiers in the Roman armies, containing about five hundred foot.

The Romans levied as many cohorts, companies, and ensigns from hence as from any of their provinces. Camden.

2. [In poetical language.] A body of warriours.

The arch-angelick Power prepar'd
For swift descent; with him the cohort bright
Of watchful Cherubim. Milton, P. L.

Here Churchill, not so prompt
To vaunt as fight, his hardy cohorts join'd
With Eugene. Philips, Blenheim.

COHORTA'TION.† n. s. [cohortatio, Lat.] Encouragement by words; incitement. Coles.

COIF. n. s. [coeffe, Fr. from cofea, for cucufa, low Lat.] The head-dress; a lady's cap; the serjeant's cap.

The judges of the four circuits in Wales, although they are not of the first magnitude, nor need be of the degree of the coif, yet are they considerable. Bacon, Advice to Villiers.

No less a man than a brother of the coif began his suit, before he had been a twelvemonth at the Temple. Addison, Spectator.

Instead of home-spun coifs were seen,
Good pinners edg'd with colbertine. Swift.

To COIF.* v. a. [Fr. coiffer.] To dress with a coif.

She is clothed like a nun, coifed like a puppy, lame of one arm, crooked of one foot. Wodroephe, Fr. Gr. (1623,) p. 291.

It is from you, eloquent oyster-merchants of Billingsgate (just ready to be called to the bar, and coifed like your sister-serjeants) that we expect the shortening of the time and lessening the expences of law-suits. Arbuthnot and Pope, Martin. Scrib.

Whilst wanton boys of Paphos' court
In myrtles hide my staff for sport,
And coif me, where I'm bald, with flowers.
Cooper.

CO'IFFURE.† n. s. [coeffure, Fr.] Head-dress.

His head was adorned with a royal bonnet, upon which was set a mitre of incomparable beauty, together drawing up the coifure to a highness royal. Donne, Hist. of the Septuagint, (1633) p. 68.

I am pleased with the coiffure now in fashion, and think it shews the good sense of the valuable part of the sex. Addison.

COIGNE.† n. s. [An Irish term, as it seems.] See To COIGNE.

Fitz Thomas of Desmond began that extortion of coigne and livery, and pay; that is, he and his army took horsemeat and man's meat, and money, at pleasure. Davies on Ireland.

I need not feare that any such unlawful exaction as coynie should be required at my hand. Bryskett, Disc. of Civil Life, (1606,) p. 157.

To COIGNE, or COINY.* v. n. [from the noun.] To live by extortion.

Though they came not armed like soldiers to be cessed upon me, yet their purpose was to coynie upon me, and to eat me out of house and home. Bryskett, Disc. of Civil Life, p. 157.

COIGNE.† n. s. [old Fr. cogn; low Lat. cognus; Gr. γωνία, an angle; Irish, cuinne, a corner. Our word is now often written coin.

1. A corner.

No jutting frieze,
Buttrice, nor coigne of vantage, but this bird
Hath made his pendant bed. Shaksp. Macbeth.
See you yond' coigne o'the capitol, yond' corner stone? Shakspeare, Coriol.

2. A wooden wedge used by printers.

To COIL.† v. a. [old Fr. coillir, mod. cueillir; from the Lat. colligere, to gather.] To gather into a narrow compass; as to coil a rope, to wind it in a ring.

Coil'd up in a cable, like salt eels.
Beaum. and Fl. Knight of Malta.
The lurking particles of air so expanded themselves, must necessarily plump out the sides of the bladder, and so keep them turgid, until the pressure of the air, that at first coiled them be readmitted to do the same thing again. Boyle.
Shun Folly's haunts, and vicious company,
Lest from true goodness they thy steps entice,
And Pleasure coil thee in her dangerous snare.
Edwards, Can. of Criticism, Sonn. 34.

COIL.† n. s. [Teut. kollern or kolleren, to scold, from the idea of taking a person by the collar. Skinner. Fr. cueillir, Ital. cogliere, Lye. And hence from the noise made in coiling up any thing. But, as "to keep a coil" means to make a noise, the word has been referred to call, Heb. col, the voice. See Whiter's Etym. Mag.]

1. Tumult; turmoil; bustle; stir; hurry; confusion.

Who was so firm, so constant, that this coil
Would not infect his reason? Shaksp. Tempest.
You, mistress, all this coil is 'long of you.
Shakspeare.
In that sleep of death what dreams may come,
When we have shuffled off this mortal coil,
Must give us pause. Shaksp. Hamlet.
Your son and 't please you, Sir, is new cashiered yonder,
Cast from his mistress' favour; and such a coil there is;
Such fending, and such proving.
Beaum. and Fl. Hum. Lieut.

2. A rope wound into a ring.

COIN. n. s. [coigne, Fr.] A corner; any thing standing out angularly; a square brick cut diagonally; called often quoin or quine.

COIN.† n. s. [by some imagined to come from cuneus, a wedge, because metal is cut in wedges to be coined, Dr. Johnson says. "A cudendo dictum censet Cokus ad Littletonem, sect. 335. Alii à cunei figura, et probabiliùs." Du Cange. Fr. coin, Ital. conio.]

1. Money stamped with a legal impression.

He gave Dametas a good sum of gold in ready coin, which Menalcas had bequeathed. Sidney.
You have made
Your holy hat be stamp'd on the king's coin.
Shakspeare, Hen. VIII.
I cannot tell how the poets will succeed in the explication of coins, to which they are generally very great strangers. Addison.
She now contracts her vast design,
And all her triumphs shrink into a coin. Pope.

2. Payment of any kind.

The loss of present advantage to flesh and blood, is repaid in a nobler coin.
Hammond, Fundamentals.

To COIN. v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To mint or stamp metals for money.

They cannot touch me for coining: I am the king. Shakspeare.
They never put in practice a thing so necessary as coined money is. Peacham of Antiquities.
Tenants cannot coin rent just at quarter-day, but must gather it by degrees. Locke.
Can we be sure that this medal was really coined by an artificer, or is but a product of the soil from whence it was taken? Bentley.

2. To make or invent.

My lungs
Coin words 'till their decay, against those measles,
Which we disdain should tetter us.
Shakspeare, Coriolanus.

3. To make or forge any thing, in an ill sense.

Never coin a formal lye on't,
To make the knight o'ercome the giant.
Hudibras.
Those motives induced Virgil to coin his fable.
Dryden.
Some tale, some new pretence, he daily coin'd,
To sooth his sister, and delude her mind.
Dryden, Virgil.
A term is coined to make the conveyance easy.
Atterbury.

CO'INAGE. n. s. [from coin.]

1. The art or practice of coining money.

The care of the coinage was committed to the inferiour magistrates; and I don't find that they had a publick trial as we solemnly practise in this country. Arbuthnot.

2. Coin; money; stamped and legitimated metal.

This is conceived to be a coinage of some Jews, in derision of Christians, who first began that portrait. Brown.
Moor was forced to leave off coining, by the great crowds of people continually offering to return his coinage upon him. Swift.

3. The charges of coining money.

4. New production; invention.

Unnecessary coinage, as well as unnecessary revival of words, runs into affectation; a fault to be avoided on either hand. Dryden, Juv. Ded.

5. Forgery; invention.

This is the very coinage of your brain;
This bodiless creation ecstasy
Is very cunning in. Shakspeare, Hamlet.

To COINCI'DE. v. n. [coincido, Lat.]

1. To fall upon the same point; to meet in the same point.

If the equator and ecliptick had coincided, it would have rendered the annual revolution of the earth useless. Cheyne.

2. To concur; to be consistent with.

The rules of right judgement, and of good ratiocination, often coincide with each other.
Watts, Logick.

COI'NCIDENCE. n. s. [from coincide.]

1. The state of several bodies, or lines, falling upon the same point.

An universal equilibrium, arising from the coincidence of infinite centers, can never be naturally acquired. Bentley.

2. Concurrence: consistency; tendency of many things to the same end; occurrence of many things at the same time.

The very concurrence and coincidence of so many evidences that contribute to the proof, carries a great weight. Hale.

3. It is followed by with.

The coincidence of the planes of this rotation with one another, and with the plane of the ecliptick, is very near the truth. Cheyne, Phil. Prin.

COI'NCIDENCY.* n. s. [from coincide.] Tendency of several things to the same end.

These be the eight kinds of St. Barnard's unity; wherein I will not censure either any impropriety, or any coincidency; because they may all well pass for several kinds of unity in the popular capacity. Fotherby, Atheom. p. 303.

COI'NCIDENT. adj. [from coincide.]

1. Falling upon the same point.

These circles I viewed through a prism; and as I went from them, they came nearer and nearer together, and at length became coincident.
Newton, Opt.

2. Concurrent; consistent; equivalent: followed by with.

Christianity teaches nothing but what is perfectly suitable to and coincident with the ruling principles of a virtuous and well inclined man.
South.
These words of our apostle are exactly coincident with that controverted passage in his discourse to the Athenians. Bentley.

COINCI'DER.* n. s. [from coincide.] That which coincides with another thing.

From its [the verb's] readiness to coincide with its noun in completing the sentence, they [the Stoicks] called it σύμβαμα, a coincider.
Harris's Hermes, i. § 9.
Something less than a coincider, or less than a predicable. Ibid.

COINDICA'TION. n. s. [from con and indico, Latin.] Many symptoms betokening the same cause.

CO'INER. n. s. [from coin.]

1. A maker of money; a minter; a stamper of coin.

My father was I know not where
When I was stampt: some coiner with his tools
Made me a counterfeit. Shaksp. Cymbeline.
It is easy to find designs that never entered into the thoughts of the sculptor or the coiner.
Addison on Medals.
There are only two patents referred to, both less advantageous to the coiner than this of Wood.
Swift.

Dionysius, a Greek coiner of etymologies, is commended by Athenæus. Camden's Remains.

To COI'NQUINATE.* v. a. [old Fr. coinquiner, Lat. coinquino.] To pollute; to defile; and also, to defame. In Skelton the word is printed by mistake conquinate. Cotgrave.
That would coinquinate,
That would contaminate. Skelton, Poems, p. 199.

COINQUINA'TION.* n. s. [old Fr. coinquination.] Pollution; defilement.
Cotgrave.

To COJO'IN. v. n. [conjungo, Lat.] To join with another in the same office.

Thou may'st cojoin with something, and thou dost,
And that beyond commission.
Shakspeare, Twelfth Night.

CO'ISTRIL. n. s. A coward; a runaway: corrupted from kestrel, a mean or degenerate hawk.

He's a coward and a coistril, that will not drink to my niece. Shakspeare, Twelfth Night.

COIT. n. s. [kote, a die, Dutch.] A thing thrown at a certain mark. See QUOIT.

The time they wear out at coits, kayles, or the like idle exercises. Carew, Surv. of Cornwall.

To COIT.* v. a [from the noun.] To throw any thing, as at the game of coits. Coit it to me, is yet used in the north of England.

COI'TING.* n. s. [from coit.] The act of playing at coits.

Some men would say that in mediocrity, which I have so much praysed in shooting, why should not bowlyng, clashepynnes, and coiting, be as much commended. Sir T. Elyot, Govern. fol. 82. b.

COI'TION. n. s. [coitio, Lat.]

1. Copulation; the act of generation.

I cannot but admire that philosophers should imagine frogs to fall from the clouds, considering how openly they act their coition, produce spawn, tadpoles and frogs. Ray on the Creation.

He is not made productive of his kind, but by coition with a female. Grew's Cosmol.

2. The act by which two bodies come together.

By Gilbertus this motion is termed coition, not made by any faculty attractive of one, but a syndrome and concourse of each. Brown, Vulg. Err.

COJU'ROR.* n. s. [Lat. con and juror.] He who bears his testimony to the credibility of another.

The solemn forms of oaths: of a compurgator, or cojuror, which kind of oath was very much used by the Anglo-Saxons: The form of this oath is this: "I swear by God, that the oath which N. swore was honest and true." Watton's View of Hickes's Thesaur. by Shelton, p. 59.

COKE. n. s. [perhaps from coquo, Skinner.] Fewel made by burning pit-coal under earth, and quenching the cinders; as charcoal is made with wood. It is frequently used in drying malt.

CO'LANDER. n. s. [colo, to strain, Lat.] A sieve either of hair, twigs or metal, through which a mixture to be separated is poured, and which retains the thicker parts; a strainer.

Take a thick woven osier colander,
Through which the pressed wines are strained clear. May.

All the viscera of the body are but as so many colanders to separate several juices from the blood. Ray on the Creation.

The brains from nose and mouth, and either ear,
Came issuing forth, as through a colander
The curdled milk. Dryden.

COLA'TION. n. s. [from colo, Lat.] The art of filtering or straining.

CO'LATURE.† n. s. [old Fr. colature, from colo, Lat.]

1. The act of straining; filtration. Cotgrave.

The virtue thereof may be derived to it through a colature of natural earth. Evelyn.

2. The matter strained. Cotgrave.

CO'LBERTINE.† n. s. A kind of lace worn by women, Dr. Johnson says. It is termed "a lace resembling network, of the fabrick of Mons. Colbert, superintendant of the French King's manufactures," in the Fop's Dictionary of 1690.

Go, hang out an old frisoneer gorget, with a yard of yellow colbertine again. Congreve's Way of the World.

Diff'rence rose between
Mechlin, the queen of lace, and Colbertine. Young.

CO'LCOTHAR. n. s. A term in chymistry.

Colcothar is the dry substance which remains after distillation, but commonly the caput mortuum of vitriol. Quincy.

Colcothar, or vitriol burnt, though unto a redness, containing the fixed salt, will make good ink. Brown.

COLD.† adj. [kalda, Goth. colb, Saxon; kalt, German; [kaald, Dan. See also ACOLD.]

1. Not hot; not warm; gelid; wanting warmth; being without heat.

The aggregated soil
Death, with his mace petrifick, cold, and dry,
As with a trident smote. Milton, P. L.

The diet in the state of manhood ought to be solid; and their chief drink water cold, because in such a state it has its own natural spirit. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

2. Causing sense of cold.

Bids us seek
Some better shroud, some better warmth, to cherish
Our limbs benumm'd, ere this diurnal star
Leave cold the night, how we his gather'd beams
Reflected, may with matter sere foment. Milton, P. L.

3. Chill; shivering; having sense of cold.

O noble English, that could entertain,
With half their force, the full power of France;
And let another half stand laughing by,
All out of work, and cold for action. Shakspeare, Hen. V.

4. Having cold qualities; not volatile; not acrid.

Cold plants have a quicker perception of the heat of the sun than the hot herbs; as a cold hand will sooner find a little warmth than an hot. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

5. Indifferent; frigid; wanting passion; wanting zeal; without concern; unactive; unconcerned; wanting ardour. Hence the compound, and now frequent expression, cold-hearted. See COLD-HEARTED.

There sprung up one kind of men, with whose zeal and forwardness the rest being compared, were thought to be marvellous cold and dull. Hooker, Preface.

Infinite shall be made cold in religion, by your example, that never were hurt by reading books. Ascham.

Temp'rately proceed to what you would
Thus violently redress. —— Sir, these cold ways,
That seem like prudent helps, are very poisonous. Shakspeare.

New dated letters these,
Their cold intent, tenour and substance thus;
Here doth he wish his person, and his power,
The which he could not levy. Shakspeare, Hen. IV.

We should not, when the blood was cold, have threat'ned
Our prisoners with the sword. Shaks. Cymbeline.

To see a world in flames, and an host of angels in the clouds, one must be much of a stoick to be a cold and unconcerned spectator. Burnet, Pref. to the Theory of the Earth.

No drum or trumpet needs
T' inspire the coward, or to warm the cold,
His voice, his sole appearance, makes them bold. Dryden.

O, thou hast touch'd me with thy sacred theme,
And my cold heart is kindled at thy flame. Rowe.

A man must be of a very cold or degenerate temper, whose heart doth not burn within him in the midst of praise and adoration. Addison, Freeholder.

6. Unaffecting; unable to move the passions.

What a deal of cold business doth a man mispend the better part of life in? In scattering compliments, tendering visits, following feasts and plays. B. Jonson.

The rabble are pleased at the first entry of a disguise; but the jest grows cold even with them too, when it comes on in a second scene. Addison on Italy.

7. Reserved; coy; not affectionate; not cordial; not friendly.

Let his knights have colder looks
Among you. Shakspeare, King Lear.

The commissioners grew more reserved and colder towards each other. Clarendon.

8. Chaste; not heated by vitious appetite.

You may
Convey your pleasures in a spacious plenty,
And yet seem cold, the time you may so hoodwink:
We've willing dames enough. Shaksp. Macb.

9. Not welcome; not received with kindness or warmth of affection.

My master's suit will be but cold,
Since she respects my mistress' love. Shakspeare, Two Gent. of Verona.

10. Not hasty; not violent.

11. Not affecting the scent strongly.

She made it good
At the hedge corner, in the coldest fault. Shakspeare.

12. Not having the scent strongly affected.

Smell this business with a sense as cold
As is a dead man's nose. Shaksp. Wint. Tale.

COLD.† n. s. [from the adjective.]

1. The cause of the sensation of cold; the privation of heat; the frigorifick power.

Fair-lined slippers for the cold. Shakspeare.

Heat and cold are nature's two hands, whereby she chiefly worketh: and heat we have in readiness, in respect of the fire; but for cold we must stay 'till it cometh, or seek it in deep caves, or high mountains; and when all is done, we cannot obtain it in any great degree. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

The sun
Had first his precept so to move, so shine,
As might affect the earth with cold and heat
Scarce tolerable, and from the north to call
Decrepit winter, from the south to bring

2. The sensation of cold; coldness; chilness.

When she saw her lord prepar'd to part,
A deadly cold ran shivering to her heart. Dryden, Fab.

3. A disease caused by cold; the obstruction of perspiration. This is an Italian expression. "Pigliare una calda, i. e. pigliare una scarmana." Vocab. Della Crusc. in V. CALDA. The same as our phrase, to catch cold.

What disease hast thou? ——
A whoreson cold, sir; a cough. Shakspeare, Hen. IV.

Let no ungentle cold destroy
All taste we have of heavenly joy. Roscommon.

Those rains, so covering the earth, might providentially contribute to the disruption of it, by stopping all the pores, and all evaporation, which would make the vapours within struggle violently, as we get a fever by a cold. Burnet.

COLD-BLOODED.* adj. [from cold and blood.] Without feeling or concern.

Thou cold-blooded slave,
Hast thou not spoke like thunder on my side?
And dost thou now fall over to my foes? Shakspeare, King John.

COLD-HEARTED.* adj. [from cold and heart.] Indifferent; wanting passion; unconcerned.

Cleop. Not know me yet?
Ant. Cold-hearted toward me?
Cleop. Ah, dear, if I be so,
From my cold heart let heaven engender hail,
And poison it in the source. Shakspeare, Ant. and Cleop.

Oh, ye cold-hearted, frozen formalists!
On such a theme, 'tis impious to be calm. Young, Night Th. 4.

CO'LDLY. adv. [from cold.]

1. Without heat.

2. Without concern; indifferently; negligently; without warmth of temper or expression.

What England says, say briefly, gentle lord;
We coldly pause for thee. Shaksp. K. John.
Swift seem'd to wonder what he meant,
Nor would believe my lord had sent;
So never offer'd once to stir,
But coldly said, your servant, sir. Swift.

Co'LDNESS. n. s. [from cold.]

1. Want of heat; power of causing the sensation of cold.

He relates the excessive coldness of the water they met with in summer in that icy region, where they were forced to winter. Boyle, Experiments.

Such was the discord, which did first disperse
Form, order, beauty through the universe;
While dryness moisture, coldness heat resists,
All that we have, and that we are subsists.
Denham.

2. Unconcern; frigidity of temper; want of zeal; negligence; disregard.

Divisions of religion are not only the farthest spread, because in religion all men presume themselves interested; but they are also, for the most part, hotlier prosecuted: for as much as coldness, which, in other contentions, may be thought to proceed from moderation, is not in these so favourably construed. Hooker, Dedicat.

If upon reading admired passages in authors, he finds a coldness and indifference in his thoughts, he ought to conclude that he himself wants the faculty of discovering them. Addison.

It betrayed itself in a sort of indifference and carelessness in all her actions, and coldness to her best friends. Arbuthnot.

3. Coyness; want of kindness; want of passion.

Unhappy youth! how will thy coldness raise
Tempests and storms in his afflicted bosom.
Addison, Cato.

Let ev'ry tongue its various censures chuse,
Absolve with coldness, or with spite accuse.
Prior.

4. Chastity; exemption from vehement desire.

The silver stream her virgin coldness keeps,
For ever murmurs, and for ever weeps.
Pope, Windsor Forest.

COLE.† n. s. [Celt. caal; Welsh, cawl; Sax. capl; old Fr. caul and caulet; Ital. and Span. caulo; Lat. caulis.] A general name for all sorts of cabbage.

Co'LESEED. n. s. [from cole and seed.] Cabbage seed.

Where land is rank, it is not good to sow wheat after a fallow; but coleseed or barley, and then wheat. Mortimer.

Co'LEWORT. n. s. [caplpyꝛc, Sax.] A species of cabbage.

The decoction of coleworts is also commended to bathe them. Wiseman of an Erysipelas.

She took the coleworts, which her husband got
From his own ground (a small well-water'd spot);
She stript the stalks of all their leaves; the best
She cull'd, and then with handy care she dress'd.
Dryden.

How turnips hide their swelling heads below,
And how the closing coleworts upwards grow.
Gay.

Co'LICK.† n. s. [colique, n. s. old Fr. colicus, Lat.]

It strictly is a disorder of the colon; but loosely, any disorder of the stomach or bowels that is attended with pain. There are four sorts: 1. A bilious colick, which proceeds from an abundance of acrimony or choler irritating the bowels, so as to occasion continual gripes, and generally with a looseness; and this is the best managed with lenitives and emollients. 2. A flatulent colick, which is pain in the bowels from flatuses and wind, which distend them into unequal and unnatural capacities; and this is managed with carminatives and moderate openers. 3. An hysterical colick, which arises from disorders of the womb, and is communicated by consent of parts to the bowels; and is to be treated with the ordinary hystericks. 4. A nervous colick, which is from convulsive spasms and contortions of the guts themselves, from some disorders of the spirits or nervous fluid, in their component fibres; whereby their capacities are in many places streightened, and sometimes so as to occasion obstinate obstructions: this is best remedied by brisk cathartick, joined with opiates and emollient diluters. There is also a species of this distemper which is commonly called the stone colick, by consent of parts, from the irritation of the stone or gravel in the bladder or kidneys; and this is most commonly to be treated by nephriticks and oily diureticks, and is greatly assisted with the carminative turpentine clysters. Quincy.

Colicks of infants proceed from acidity and the air in the aliment expanding itself, while the aliment ferments. Arbuthnot.

Co'LICK. adj. Affecting the bowels.

Intestine stone, and ulcer, colick pangs.
Milton, P. L.

To COLL.* v. a. [old Fr. coller, and accoller; "dare brachia cervici," says Barret, in translating this word, i. e. to embrace round the neck, collum; and thus the word is equal to our old expression, "fell on the neck and kissed him." See St. Luke, xv. 20.] To embrace. See COLLING.

Such maner of colling bringeth him in choler, in thinking that others as well as hee hath imbraced her.
Transl. of Boccaces's Questions, &c. 1587. Quest. 5.

So having said, her twixt her armës twaine
She streightly strain'd, and colled tenderly.
Spenser, F. Q. iii. ii. 34.

To COLLA'PSE. v. n. [collabor, collapsus, Lat.] To fall together; to close so as that one side touches the other.

In consumptions and atrophy the liquids are exhausted, and the sides of the canals collapse; therefore the attrition is increased, and consequently the heat. Arbuthnot on Diet.

COLLA'PSED.* part. adj. [Lat. collapsus.] Withered; ruined; fallen down.

What else do our papists, but by keeping the people in ignorance, vent and broach all their new ceremonies and traditions, when they conceal the Scripture, read it in Latine, and to some few alone, feeding the slavish people in the mean time with tales out of legends, and such like fabulous narrations? Whom do they begin with but collapsed ladies, some few tradesmen, superstitious old folks, illiterate persons, weak women, &c.
Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 655.

Let the boiling pleasures of the rebellious flesh evaporate a little, and let me drain my boggy soul from those corrupted inbred humours of collapsed nature.
Quarles, Judg. and Mercy, The Procrastinator.

COLLA'PSION.† n. s. [from collapse.]

1. The act of closing or collapsing.

The mark remains in some degree visible in the collapsion of the skin after death.
Russell on Indian Serpents, p. 7.

2. The state of vessels closed.

COLLAR.† n. s. [Span. collar; old Fr. coeler; Lat. collare.]

1. A ring of metal put round the neck.

That's nothing, says the dog, but the fretting of my collar: nay, says the wolf, if there be a collar in the case, I know better things than to sell my liberty. L'Estrange.

Ten brace and more of greyhounds,
With golden muzzles all their mouths were bound,
And collars of the same their necks surround.
Dryden, Fab.

2. The part of the harness that is fastened about the horse's neck.

Her waggon-spokes made of long spinners legs,
The traces of the smallest spider's web,
The collars of the moonshine's watry beams.
Shakspeare.

3. The part of the dress that surrounds the neck.

It bindeth me about as the collar of my coat.
Job, xxx. 18.

4. To slip the COLLAR. To get free; to escape; to disentangle himself from any engagement or difficulty.

When as the ape him heard so much to talk
Of labour, that did from his liking baulk,
He would have slipt the collar handsomely.
Spenser, Hubb. Tale.

5. A COLLAR of Brawn, is the quantity bound up in one parcel.

There is history in words as well as etymology. Thus brawn, being made of the collar or breast part of the boar, is termed a collar of brawn. The brawn or boar begets collar; which being rolled up, conveys the idea to any thing else; and eel, so dressed, takes the name of collared eel; as does also collared beef, &c. So that every thing rolled bears the name and arms of collar.
Pegge, Anec. of the Eng. Language.

Co'LLAR-BONE. n. s. [from collar and bone.] The clavicle; the bones on each side of the neck.

A page riding behind the coach, fell down, bruised his face, and broke his right collarbone.
Wiseman's Surg.

To Co'LLAR.† v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To seize by the collar; to take by the throat.

2. To COLLAR Beef, or other meat; to roll it up, and bind it hard and close with a string or collar, Dr. Johnson says. But see the fifth sense of collar, where the example better explains this use of the word, and presents also collared.

Co'LLARED.* part. adj. [from collar.] In heraldry, still used for any animal having a collar about its neck. Such are Chaucer's dogs.

Collered with gold, and torettes filed round.
Chaucer, Knight's Tale.

To COLLA'TE.† v. a. [confero, collatum, Latin.]

1. To compare one thing of the same kind with another.

Knowledge will be ever a wandering and indigested thing, if it be but a commixture of a few notions that are at hand and occur, and not excited from a sufficient number of instances, and those well collated. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

They could not relinquish their Judaism, and embrace Christianity, without considering, weighing, and collating both religions. South.

2. To collate books; to examine if nothing bewanting.

Having some years before collated several Greek copies of the New Testament.
Fell's Life of Hammond, § 1.

3. To bestow; to confer.
The significance of the sacrament disposes the spirit of the receiver to admit the grace of the spirit of God, there consigned, exhibited, and collated. Bp. Taylor, Communicant.

4. With to. To place in an ecclesiastical benefice. See COLLATION.
If a patron shall neglect to present unto a benefice, void above six months, the bishop may collate thereunto. Ayliffe.
He thrust out the invader, and collated Amsdorf to the benefice: Luther performed the consecration. Atterbury.

COLLA'TERAL.† adj. [old Fr. collateral, from con and latus, Lat.]

1. Side to side.
In his bright radiance and collateral light
Must I be comforted, not in his sphere.
Shakspeare.
Thus saying, from his radiant seat he rose,
Of high collateral glory. Milton, P. L.

2. Running parallel.

3. Diffused on either side.
But man by number is to manifest
His single imperfection; and beget
Like of his like, his image multiplied;
In unity defective, which requires
Collateral love, and dearest amity. Milton, P. L.

4. In genealogy, those that stand in equal relation to some common ancestor.
The estate and inheritance of a person dying intestate, is by right of devolution, according to the civil law, given to such as are allied to him ex latere, commonly stiled collaterals, if there be no ascendants or descendants surviving at the time of his death. Ayliffe, Parergon.

5. Not direct; not immediate.
They shall hear and judge 'twixt you and me,
If by direct or by collateral hand
They find us touch'd, we will our kingdom give
To you in satisfaction. Shakspeare.

6. Concurrent.
A collateral bond, is a bond with sufficient sureties. Huloet.
All the force of the motive lies within itself: it receives no collateral strength from external considerations. Atterbury.

COLLA'TERALLY. adv. [from collateral.]

1. Side by side.
These pullies may be multiplied according to sundry different situations, not only when they are subordinate, but also when they are placed collaterally. Wilkins.

2. Indirectly.
By asserting the scripture to be the canon of our faith, I have created two enemies; the papists more directly, because they have kept the scripture from us; and the fanaticks more collaterally, because they have assumed what amounts to an infallibility in the private spirit. Dryden.

3. In collateral relation.

COLLA'TERALNESS.* n. s. [from collateral.] A state of collateral relation or connexion. Cotgrave.

COLLA'TION.† n. s. [collation, old Fr. collatio, Lat.]

1. The act of conferring or bestowing; gift.
Neither are we to give thanks alone for the first collation of these benefits, but also for their preservation. Ray on the Creation.

2. Comparison of one copy, or one thing of the same kind, with another.
Let us now see how God revenged himself up on sinners, and by way of collation apply it to our selves. Spelman, Hist. of Sacrilege, i. § 1.
In the disquisition of truth, a ready fancy is of great use; provided that collation doth its office. Grew, Cosm.
I return you your Milton, which, upon collation, I find to be revised and augmented in several places. Pope.

3. In law.
Collation is the bestowing of a benefice, by the bishop that hath it in his own gift or patronage; and differs from institution in this, that institution into a benefice is performed by the bishop at the presentation of another who is patron, or hath the patron's right for the time. Cowel.
Bishops should be placed by collation of the king under his letters patent, without any precedent election or confirmation ensuing. Hayward.

4. A repast; a treat less than a feast; formerly, "a drinking between dinner and supper." Huloet.
When I came, I found such a collation of wine and sweet-meats prepared, as little corresponded to the terms of the invitation.
Whiston's Memoirs, p. 272.

5. Discourse. [old Fr. colacion, harangue, discours.]
No parson, vicar, curate, or lecturer, shall preach any sermon or collation hereafter, but upon some part of the catechism, &c.
Abp. Canterbury's Direct. conc. Preachers, 1622.
Sermons, and other collations, and lectures.
Const. and Can. Eccl. i.
No book was more read in the following ages than Cassian's Collations.
Burnet on the Articles, Art. 17.

6. Collection; shot or dividend contributed.
It [the Apostle's creed] is called symbolum from συμβαλλεσθαι, that signifies to put together, and to cast in money to make up a sum or reckoning. Hence the word symbolum signifies a shot, a badge, a collation, or the word given to the soldiers in war. 1. A shot or collation, because every particular apostle did cast in and collate his article, to make up this sum; at least the whole doth arise out of their common writings.
Bp. Nicholson, Expos. of the Catechism, (1662,) p. 25.

COLLATI'TIOUS. adj. [collatitius, Lat.] Done by the contribution of many. Dict.

COLLA'TIVE.* adj. [from collate.]

Hayward.
As when of old some orator renown'd
In Athens or free Rome, where eloquence
Flourish'd, since mute, to some great cause address'd,
Stood in himself collected, while each part,
Motion, each act won audience, ere the tongue
Sometimes in highth began, as no delay
Of preface brooking through his zeal of right.
Milton, P. L.

CO'LLECT.† n. s. [collecta, Low Lat. "Some ritualists think, because the word collect is sometimes used both in the vulgar Latin Bible, and by the ancient fathers, to denote the gathering together of the people into religious assemblies; that therefore the prayers are called collects, as being repeated when the people are collected together. Others think they are so named, upon account of their comprehensive brevity; the minister collecting into short forms the petitions of the people, which had before been divided betwèen him and them by versicles and responses; and for this reason God is desired in some of them to hear the prayers and supplications of the people. Though I think it is very probable, that the collects for the Sundays and Holydays bear that name, upon account that a great many of them are evidently collected out of the epistles and gospels." Wheatly on the Comm. Prayer, ch. 3. § 19.] A short comprehensive prayer, used at the sacrament; any short prayer.

Then let your devotion be humbly to say over proper collects. Bp. Taylor, Guide to Devotion.

Burton, on Melancholy.

To CO'LLY.† v. a. To grime with coal; to smut with coal.

Brief as the lightning in the collied night,
That, in a speen, unfolds both heav'n and earth;
And, ere a man hath pow'r to say behold,
The jaws of darkness do devour it up. Shaks.

Thou hast not collied thy face enough.
B. Jonson, Poetaster.

COLLY'RIUM.† n. s. [Latin, Dr. Johnson says; but no further. It is, in fact, the Gr. κολλύριον, from κολλύρα, which, according to Scaliger, signifies bread sopped, first used as a medicine for the eyes: afterwards all medicines for the eyes, whether ointments or washes, received this name. Our old lexicography has collyrie for this word.] An ointment for the eyes.

CO'LMAR. n. s. [Fr.] A sort of pear.

CO'LOCYNTH.* n. s. [old Fr. colocinthe, Lat. colocynthis.] Coloquintida; bitter apple. See COLOQUINTIDA.

If they were masters of our affairs, they would suffer nothing to grow but their own colocynths and gourds.
Bp. Taylor, Diss. from Popery, Introd.

CO'LOGN Earth. n. s. Is a deep brown, very light bastard ochre, which is no pure native fossil; but contains more vegetable than mineral matter, and owes its origin to the remains of wood long buried in the earth.
Hill on Fossils.

CO'LON. n. s. [κῶλον, a member.]

1. A point [:] used to mark a pause greater than that of a comma, and less than that of a period. Its use is not very exactly fixed, nor is it very necessary, being confounded by most with the semicolon. It was used before punctuation was refined, to mark almost any sense less than a period. To apply it properly, we should place it, perhaps, only where the sense is continued without dependence of grammar or construction; as, I love him, I despise him: I have long ceased to trust, but shall never forbear to succour him.

2. The greatest and widest of all the intestines, about eight or nine hands breadth long. It begins where the ilium ends, in the cavity of the os ilium on the right side; from thence ascending by the kidney, on the same side, it passes under the concave side of the liver, to which it is sometimes tied, as likewise to the gall-bladder, which tinges it yellow in that place: then it runs under the bottom of the stomach to the spleen in the left side, to which it is also knit: from thence it turns down to the left kidney; and thence passing, in form of an S, it terminates at the upper part of the os sacrum, in the rectum. Quincy.

Now, by your cruelty hard bound,
I strain my guts, my colon wound. Swift.

The contents of the colon are of a sour, fetid, acid smell in rabbits. Floyer on the Humours.

CO'LONEL.† n. s. [Skinner imagines it originally colonialis, the leader of a colony. Minsheu deduces it from colonna, a pillar; as, patriæ columen; exercitus columen. Each is plausible, Dr. Johnson says. But he has omitted to notice, that this word is by our old and good authors written also coronel; as by B. Jonson, "He might have been serjeant-major, if not lieutenant-coronel to the regiment." Every Man out of his Humour. And by Beaumont and Fletcher, "There is no end of wealth, coronel." Cotgrave also writes it coronel. It is therefore probable, that our word is from the Spanish coronel, who is the commander of a regiment; and his company is the coronela; low Lat. coronellus, chiliarchus, tribunus: Du Cange. Probably from the Lat. corona, a ring or company of men. Milton sounds colonel with three distinct syllaplanted from Asia. — It is brought into Europe in circular pieces, about three inches thick, covered with a wrinkled bark of a dark brown hue, and internally it is of a light yellow. It has an aromatick smell, and is bitter, and slightly pungent to the taste. It is reckoned almost a specifick in the cholera morbus, nausea, indigestion, bilious fever, diarrhæa, dysentery, and most disorders of the stomach and bowels. — A tincture is made of it by infusing an ounce in a pint of brandy. — An extract is likewise prepared. Chambers.

CO'LUMN.† n. s. [columna, Latin.]

1. A round pillar. The word appears to have been not familiar, till late in the reign of Elizabeth; for Sir H. Wotton, in his Elements of Architecture, thus remarks: "Pillars, which we may likewise call columnes; for the word among artificers is almost naturalized." Rem. p. 21.

Some of the old Greek columns and altars were brought from the ruins of Apollo's temple at Delos. Peacham.

Round broken columns clasping ivy twin'd. Pope.

2. Any body of certain dimensions pressing vertically upon its base.

The whole weight of any column of the atmosphere, and likewise the specifick gravity of its bases, are certainly known by many experiments. Bentley.

3. [In the military art.] The long file or row of troops, or of baggage, of an army in its march. An army marches in one, two, three, or more columns, according as the ground will allow.

4. [With printers.] A column is half a page, when divided into two equal parts by a line passing through the middle, from the top to the bottom, and, by several parallel lines, pages are often divided into three or more columns, as in this book.

COLU'MNAR. } adj. [from column.]
COLUMNA'RIAN. } Formed in columns.

White columnar spar, out of a stone-pit. Woodward on Fossils.

COLU'RES. n. s. [coluri, Latin; κολουροι.]

Two great circles supposed to pass through the poles of the world: one through the equinoctial points Aries and Lybra; the other through the solstitial points, Cancer and Capricorn. They are called the equinoctial and solstitial colures, and divide the ecliptick into four equal parts. The points where they intersect the ecliptick are called the cardinal points. Harris.

Thrice the equinoctial line
He circled; four times cross'd the car of night
From pole to pole, traversing each colure.
Milton, P. L.

CO'MA. n. s. [κῶμα.] A morbid disposition to sleep; a lethargy.

CO'MART. n. s. This word, which I have only met with in one place, seems to signify, treaty; article; from con and mart, or market.

By the same comart,
And carriage of the articles design'd,
His fell to Hamlet. Shakspeare, Hamlet.

COMA'TE. n. s. [con and mate.] Companion.

My comates and brothers in exile.
Shakspeare, As you like it.

CO'MATE.* adj. [Lat. comatus.] Hairy in appearance; having a bush of hair, as a comet seems to have.

How comate, crinite, caudate stars are fram'd. Fairfax, Tasso, xiv. 44.

COMATO'SE. adj. [from coma.] Lethargick; sleepy to a disease.

Our best castor is from Russia; the great and principal use whereof, is in hysterical and comatose cases. Grew.

COMB in the end, and COMP in the beginning of names, seem to be derived from the British cwm, which signifies a low situation. Gibson's Camden.

COMB, in Cornish, signifies a valley, and had the same meaning anciently in the French tongue.

COMB.* n. s. [Sax. comb; and Welsh and old French, as Gibson and Johnson have observed, may be cited. They owe their origin perhaps to the Gr. κύμβος, a hollow.] Properly, a valley surrounded with hills.

'Till round the world, in sounding combe and plain,
The last of them tell it the first again.
Browne, Brit. Pastorals.

COMB.† n. s. [camb, Saxon; kam. Dutch.]

1. An instrument to separate and adjust the hair.

By fair Ligea's golden comb,
Wherewith she sits on diamond rocks,
Sleeking her soft alluring locks. Milton, Comus.

I made an instrument in fashion of a comb, whose teeth, being in number sixteen, were about an inch and a half broad, and the intervals of the teeth about two inchess wide. Newton.

2. The top or crest of a cock, so called from its pectinated indentures.

Cocks have great combs and spurs, hens little or none. Bacon.

High was his comb, and coral-red withal,
With dents embattl'd, like a castle-wall. Dryden.

3. The cavities in which the bees lodge their honey. Perhaps from the same word which makes the termination of towns, and signifies hollow or deep. [Gr. κύμβος.]

This in affairs of state,
Employ'd at home, abides within the gate,
To fortify the combs, to build the wall,
To prop the ruins, lest the fabrick fall.
Dryden, Virg.

4. A dry measure. A comb of corn is half a quarter, or four bushels. See COOMB.

To COMB. v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To divide, and clean, and adjust the hair with a comb.

Her care shall be
To comb your noddle with a three-legg'd stool.
Shakspeare.

Divers with us, that are grown grey, and yet would appear young, find means to make their hair black, by combing it, as they say, with a leaden comb, or the like. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

She with ribbons tied
His tender neck, and comb'd his silken hide.
Dryden, Æn.

There was a sort of engine, from which were extended twenty long poles, wherewith the man-mountain combs his head. Swift.

2. To lay any thing consisting of filaments smooth, by drawing through narrow interstices; as, to comb wool.

COMB-BRUSH. n. s. [comb and brush.] A brush to clean combs.

COMB-MAKER. n. s. [comb and maker.] One whose trade is to make combs.

1. To fight; generally in a duel, or hand to hand.

Pardon me, I will not combat in my shirt. Shakspeare.

2. To act in opposition, as the acid and alkali combat.

Two planets rushing from aspect malign
Of fiercest opposition in mid sky,
Should combat, and their jarring spheres confound.
Milton, P. L.

To COMBAT. v. a. To oppose; to fight.

Their oppressors have changed the scene, and combated the opinions in their true shape. Decay of Piety.

Love yields at last, thus combated by pride,
And she submits to be the Roman's bride. Glanville.

CO'MBAT.† n. s. [old Fr. combat.] Contest; battle; duel; strife; opposition generally between two; but sometimes it is used for battle.

Those regions were full both of cruel monsters and monstrous men; all which, by private combats, they delivered the countries of. Sidney.

The noble combat that, 'twixt joy and sorrow, was fought in Paulina! She had one eye declined for the loss of her husband, another elevated that the oracle was fulfilled. Shakspeare.

The combat now by courage must be try'd. Dryden.

CO'MBATABLE.* adj. [from combat.] That may be disputed or opposed. Modern.

CO'MBATANT. n. s. [combattant, French.]

1. He that fights with another; duellist; antagonist in arms.

So frown'd the mighty combatants, that hell
Grew darker at their frown. Milton, P. L.

Who, single combatant,
Duel'd their armies rank'd in proud array,
Himself an army. Milton, S. A.

He with his sword unsheath'd, on pain of life,
Commands both combatants to cease their strife. Dryden.

Like despairing combatants they strive against you, as if they had beheld unveiled the magical shield of Ariosto, which dazzled the beholders with too much brightness. Dryden.

2. A champion.

When any of those combatants strips his terms of ambiguity, I shall think him a champion for knowledge. Locke.

3. With for before the thing defended.

Men become combatants for those opinions. Locke.

CO'MBATANT.* adj. Disposed to quarrel.

Their valours are not yet so combatant,
Or truly antagonistick, as to fight,
But may admit to hear of some divisions
Of fortitude, may put 'em off their quarrel.
B. Jonson, Magn. Lady.

CO'MBATER.* n. s. [from combat.] One who fights. Sherwood.

CO'MBER. n. s. [from comb.] He whose trade it is to disentangle wool, and lay it smooth for the spinner.

CO'MBER.* n. s. A species of fish in Cornwall, of a slender form, with red backfins and tail, yellow belly, a smooth even stripe from gills to tail, of a silvery colour, and a round tail. Ray.

CO'MBER.* n. s. [Dutch, komber. See

CUMBER.] Burdensomeness; trouble; vexation.

That I may provide you some fit lodgings at a good distance from Whitehall, for the preservation of blessed liberty, and avoidance of the comber of kindness. Sir H. Wotton to Sir Edm. Bacon.

COMBI'NABLE.* adj. [from To combine.] Capable of being united with; consistent with.

Pleasures are very combinable both with business and study. Ld. Chesterfield.

CO'MBINATE. adj. [from combine.] Betrothed; promised; settled by compact. A word of Shakspeare.

She lost a noble brother; with him the sinew of her fortune, her marriage dowry; with both, her combinate husband, this well seeming Angelo.
Shakspeare, Meas. for Meas.

COMBINA'TION. n. s. [from combine.]

1. Union for some certain purpose; association; league. A combination is of private persons, a confederacy of states or sovereigns.

This cunning cardinal
The articles o'the combination drew,
As himself pleas'd. Shakspeare, Hen. VIII.

2. It is now generally used in an ill sense; but was formerly indifferent.

They aim to subdue all to their own will and power, under the disguises of holy combinations.
K. Charles.

3. Union of bodies, or qualities; commixture; conjunction.

These natures, from the moment of their first combination, have been and are for ever inseparable. Hooker.

Resolution of compound bodies by fire, does not so much enrich mankind as it divides the bodies; as upon the score of its making new compounds by new combinations. Boyle.

Ingratitude is always in combination with pride and hard-heartedness. South.

4. Copulation of ideas in the mind.

They never suffer any ideas to be joined in their understandings, in any other or stronger combination than what their own nature and correspondence give them. Locke.

5. COMBINATION is used in mathematicks, to denote the variation or alteration of any number of quantities, letters, sounds, or the like, in all the different manners possible. Thus the number of possible changes or combinations of the twenty-four letters of the alphabet, taken first two by two, then three by three, &c. amount to 1,391,724,288,887,252,999, 425,128,493,402,200. Chambers.

To COMBI'NE. v. a. [combiner, Fr. binos jungere.]

God, the best maker of all marriages,
Combine your hearts in one, your realms in one.
Shakspeare.

Friendship is the cement which really combines mankind. Government of the Tongue.

3. To agree; to accord; to settle by compact.

My heart's dear love is set on his fair daughter
As mine on her's, so her's is set on mine,
And all combin'd, save what thou must combine
By holy marriage. Shakspeare, Rom. and Jul.

4. To join words or ideas together: opposed to analyse.

To COMBI'NE. v. n.

1. To coalesce; to unite each with other. Used both of things and persons.

Honour and policy, like unsever'd friends
I'th' war, do grow together: grant that, and tell me
In peace what each of them by th' other loses,
That they combine not there? Shaksp. Coriol.

2. To unite in friendship or design.

Combine together 'gainst the enemy;
For these domestick and particular broils
Are not the question here. Shakspeare, K. Lear.

You with your foes combine,
And seem your own destruction to design.
Dryden, Aurengz.

COMBI'NER.* n. s. [from combine.] The person or thing which combines.

Of dire combustion, and confus'd events,
New hatch'd to th' woeful time.
Shakspeare, Macbeth.

Those cruel wars between the houses of York and Lancaster, brought all England into an horrible combustion. Ralegh.

How much more of power,
Army against army, numberless to raise
Dreadful combustion warring, and disturb,
Though not destroy, their happy native seat!
Milton.

But say, from whence this new combustion springs? Dryden.

The comet moves in an inconceivable fury and combustion, and at the same time with an exact regularity. Addison, Guard.

COMBU'STIVE.* adj. [combustus, Lat.] Disposed to take fire.

Their beams and influences begin to grow malign, fiery, and combustive.
Bp. Ganden's Hieraspistes, 1653, p. 20.

To COME.† v. n. pret. came, particip. come. [coman, Saxon; komen, Dut. kommen, German; all from the Goth. cwimen; and Serenius adds the Tartar. comen, to come.]

1. To remove from a distant to a nearer place; to arrive: opposed to go.

And troubled blood through his pale face was seen
To come and go, with tidings from the heart.
Spenser, F. Q.

Cæsar will come forth to-day.
Shakspeare, Jul. Cæs.

Coming to look on you, thinking you dead,
I spake unto the crown as having sense.
Shakspeare, Henry IV.

The colour of the king doth come and go,
Between his purpose and his conscience.
Shakspeare, K. John.

The Christians having stood almost all the day in order of battle, in the sight of the enemy, vainly expecting when he should come forth to give them battle, returned at night unto their camp.
Knolles, Hist. of the Turks.

They grow more bold. Dryden, Tyr. Love.

This Christian woman!
Ah! there the mischief comes.
Rowe, Royal Convert.

2. To draw near; to advance towards.

By the pricking of my thumbs,
Something wicked this way comes.
Shakspeare, Macbeth.

3. To move in any manner towards another; implying the idea of being received by another, or of tending towards another. The word always respects the place to which the motion tends, not that place which it leaves; yet this meaning is sometimes almost evanescent and imperceptible.

I did hear
The galloping of horse: who was't came by?
Shakspeare, Macbeth.

Bid them cover the table, serve in the meat, and we will come in to dinner.
Shakspeare, Merch. of Venice.

As soon as the commandment came abroad, the children of Israel brought in abundance the first fruits. 2 Chron. xxxi. 5.

What he had done, and meant to do. Hudibras.

The testimony of conscience, thus informed, comes to be so authentick, and so much to be relied upon. South.

8. To become.

So came I a widow;
And never shall have length of life enough
To rain upon remembrance with mine eyes. Shakspeare, Henry IV.

When he returns from hunting,
I will not speak with him; say I am sick.
If you come slack of former services,
You shall do well. Shakspeare, K. Lear.

How came the publican justified, but by a short and humble prayer? Duppa's Rules for Devotion.

9. To arrive at some act or habit, or disposition.

They would quickly come to have a natural abhorrence for that which they found made them slighted. Locke.

10. To change from one state into another desired; as the butter comes when the parts begin to separate in the churn.

It is reported, that if you lay good store of kernels of grapes about the root of a vine, it will make the vine come earlier and prosper better. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

Then butter does refuse to come,
And love proves cross and humoursome. Hudibras.

In the coming or sprouting of malt, as it must not come too little, so it must not come too much. Mortimer.

11. To become present, and no longer future.

A time will come, when my maturer muse,
In Cæsar's wars, a nobler theme shall chuse. Dryden, Virg.

12. To become present; no longer absent.

That's my joy
Not to have seen before; for nature now
Comes all at once, confounding my delight. Dryden, K. Arth.

Mean while the gods the dome of Vulcan throng,
Apollo comes, and Neptune came along. Pope, Odyss.

Come then, my friend, my genius come along,
Thou master of the poet and the song. Pope, Ess.

13. To happen; to fall out.

The Duke of Cornwal, and Regan, his duchess, will be here with him this night.—
— How comes that? Shakspeare, K. Lear.

14. To befal as an event.

Let me alone that I may speak, and let come on me what will. Job, xiii. 13.

15. To follow as a consequence.

Those that are kin to the king, never prick their finger, but they say, there is some of the king's blood spilt. How comes that? says he, that takes upon him not to conceive: the answer is, I am the king's poor cousin, sir. Shakspeare, Henry IV.

16. To cease very lately from some act or state; to have just done or suffered any thing.

David said unto Uriah, camest thou not from thy journey? 2 Sam. xi. 10.

17. To Come about. To come to pass; to fall out; to come into being. Probably From the French venir à bout.

And let me speak to th' yet unknowing world,
How these things came about. Shakspeare.

That cherubim, which now appears as a god to a human soul, knows very well that the period will come about in eternity, when the human soul shall be as perfect as he himself now is. Addison, Spectator.

I conclude, however it comes about, that things are not as they should be. Swift.

How comes it about, that, for above sixty years, affairs have been placed in the hands of new men. Swift.

18. To Come about. To change; to come round.

37. To COME off. To escape; to get free.

I knew the foul enchanter, though disguis'd,
Enter'd the very lime-twigs of his spells,
And yet came off. Milton, Comus.

How thou wilt here come off, surmounts my reach. Milton, S. A. v. 1380.

If, upon such a fair and full trial, he can come off, he is then clear and innocent. South.

Those that are in any signal danger implore his aid; and, if they come off safe, call their deliverance a miracle. Addison on Italy.

38. To COME off. To end an affair; to take good or bad fortune.

Oh, bravely came we off,
When with a volley of our needless shot,
After such bloody toil, we bid good-night. Shakspeare, K. John.

Ever since Spain and England have had any thing to debate one with the other, the English, upon all encounters, have come off with honour and the better. Bacon, War with Spain.

59. To COME up with. To overtake.

60. To COME upon. To invade; to attack.

Three hundred horse, and three thousand foot English, commanded by Sir John Norris, were charged by Parma, coming upon them with seven thousand horse. Bacon.

When old age comes upon him, it comes alone, bringing no other evil with it but itself. South.

61. To COME. In futurity; not present; to happen hereafter.

It serveth to discover that which is hid, as well as to foretel that which is to come. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

In times to come,
My waves shall wash the walls of mighty Rome. Dryden.

Taking a lease of land for years to come, at the rent of one hundred pounds. Locke.

62. COME is a word of which the use is various and extensive, but the radical signification of tendency hitherward is uniformly preserved. When we say he came from a place, the idea is that of returning, or arriving, or becoming nearer; when we say he went from a place, we conceive simply departure; or removal to a greater distance. The butter comes. It is passing from its former state to that which is desired, it is advancing towards us.

COME. [participle of the verb.]

Thy words were heard, and I am come for thy words. Dan. x. 12.

COME. A particle of exhortation; be quick; make no delay.

Come, let us make our father drink wine. Genesis, xix. 32.

COME your ways.* A vulgarism still in use, especially in the north of England; come along or come hither.

Look to't, I charge you; come your ways. Shakspeare, Hamlet, i. 3.

COME. A particle of reconciliation, or incitement to it.

Come, come, at all I laugh, he laughs no doubt; The only difference is, I dare laugh out. Pope.

COME. A kind of adverbial word for when it shall come; as, come Wednesday, when Wednesday shall come.

Come Candlemas, nine years ago she dy'd. Gay.

COME. n. s. [from the verb.] A sprout: a cant term.

That the malt is sufficiently well dried, you may know both by the taste, and also by the falling off of the come or sprout. Mortimer, Husbandry.

COME'DIAN.† n. s. [Fr. comedien, Cotgrave. In Huloet's old dictionary, the word is comedy-player; comedian not being then adopted.]

1. A player or actor of comick parts.
2. A player in general; a stage-player; an actress or actor.

Melissarion, pretty honey-bee, when of a comedian she became a wealthy man's wife, would be saluted madam Pithias, or Prudence. Camden's Remains.

3. A writer of comedies.

Scaliger willeth us to admire Plautus as a comedian, but Terence as a pure and elegant speaker. Peacham of Poetry.

CO'MEDY.† n. s. [Lat. comœdia, Gr. κωμωδία, from κώμη a village, and ἄδω to sing, as some maintain, because the early attempts at this kind of entertainment were recited or sung from village to village; or, as others conceive, from κωμάδειν, to sing things worthy of Comus, the patron of revelry, the first farces having been exhibited at feasts.] A dramatick representation of the lighter faults of mankind, with an intention to make vice and folly ridiculous: opposed to tragedy.

Your honour's players
Are come to play a pleasant comedy.
Shakspeare, Taming of the Shrew.

A long, exact, and serious comedy,
In every scene some moral let it teach,
And, if it can, at once both please and preach.
Pope.

COMELILY.* adv. [from comely.] In a graceful or decent manner. [honestement.] Sherwood.

CO'MELINESS. n. s. [from comely.] Grace; beauty; dignity. It signifies something less forcible than beauty, less elegant than grace, and less light than prettiness.

A careless comeliness with comely care. Sidney.

The service of God hath not such perfection of grace and comeliness as when the dignity of the place doth concur. Hooker.

They skilled not of the goodly ornaments of poetry, yet were sprinkled with some pretty flowers, which gave good grace and comeliness. Spenser on Ireland.

Hardly shall you meet with man or woman so aged or ill-favoured, but, if you will commend them for comeliness, nay and for youth too, shall take it well. South.

There is a great pulchritude and comeliness of proportion in the leaves, flowers, and fruits of plants. Ray on the Creation.

A horseman's coat shall hide
Thy taper shape, and comeliness of side. Prior.

CO'MELY. adj. [from become; or from cpeman, Sax. to please.]

1. Graceful; decent; having dignity or grandeur of mien or look. Comeliness seems to be that species of beauty which excites respect rather than pleasure.

If the principal part of beauty is in decent motion, no marvel though persons in years seem many times more amiable; for no youth can be comely but by pardon, and considering the youth as to make up the comeliness. Bacon, Ess. 44.

He that is comely when old and decrepit, surely was very beautiful when he was young. South.

Thou art a comely, young, and valiant knight. Dryden.

2. Used of things: decent; according to propriety.

Oh! what a world is this, when what is comely Envenoms him that bears it. Shakspeare, As you like it.

This is a happier and more comely time,
Than when these fellows ran about the streets,
Crying confusion. Shakspeare, Coriol.

CO'MELY.† adv. [from the adjective. It should be comelily, which is indeed in our old lexicograpy, though Dr. Johnson has not noticed it. See COMELILY.]

1. Handsomely: gracefully.

To ride comely, to play at all weapons, to dance comely, be very necessary for a courtly gentleman. Ascham's Schoolmaster.

2. Decently; with propriety.

Those things that either God was honoured with, or his people edified, are decently retained, and in our churches comely practised. Homily, of the Time and Place of Prayer, P. ii.

CO'MER. n. s. [from come.] One that comes.

Time is like a fashionable host,
That slightly shakes his parting guest by th' hand;
But with his arms outstretch'd, as he would fly,
Grasps in the comer: welcome ever smiles,
And farewel goes out sighing.
Shakspeare, Tr. and Cress.

Yourself, renowned prince, then stood as fair
As any comer I have look'd on yet,
For my affection. Shaksp. Merch. of Venice.

Plants move upwards; but if the sap puts up too fast, it maketh a slender stalk, which will not support the weight, and therefore these are all swift and hasty comers. Bacon.

It is natural to be kind to the last comer. L'Estrange.

Now leave those joys unsuiting to thy age,
To a fresh comer, and resign the stage. Dryden.

The renowned champion of our lady of Loretto, and the miraculous translation of her chapel, about which he hath published a defiance to the world, and offers to prove it against all comers. Stilling fleet.

There it is not strange that the mind should give itself up to the common opinion, or render itself to the first comer. Locke.

House and heart are open for a friend; the passage is easy, and not only admits but even invites the comer. South.

COMESSA'TION.* n. s. [Lat. comessatio, from the Gr. κωμάζω, which is from Κῶμος, the heathen deity of revelry. The word seems to have been used by Hales, as a derivative of the Lat. comedo, to eat, and thus to signify a surfeiting; but it is finely employed, in a passage of uncommon eloquence and just indignation at the times, by Bishop Hall, while confined in the Tower, in its original meaning.] Revelling.

For me, I do not envy, but wonder at the licentious freedom, which these men think themselves happy to enjoy; and hold it a weakness in those minds, which cannot find more advantage in confinement and retiredness. Is it a small benefit that I am placed there, where no oaths, no blasphemies beat my ears? where my eyes are in no peril of wounding objects? where I hear no invectives, no false doctrines, no sermocinations of ironmongers, feltmakers, coblers, broom-men, grooms, or any other of those inspired ignorants? no curses, no ribaldries? where I see no drunken comessations, no rebellious routs, no violent oppressions, no obscene rejoicings, nor aught else that may either vex or affright my soul? This, this is my liberty, who whiles I sit here quietly locked up by my keeper, can pity the turmoils and distempers abroad, and bless my own immunity from those too common evils.

Bp. Hall, Free Prisoner, Works, iii. 489.

The world is apt upon all occasions to fall upon unnecessary comessation and compotations. Hales, Serm. at the close of his Rem. p. 30.

COME'STIBLE.* adj. [Fr. comestible, Lat. comedo, from the Gr. σὺν with, and ἔδω to eat.] Eatable.

His markets [were] the best ordered for prices of comestible ware; where, in all his towns, a man might have sent out a child for any flesh or fish, at a rated price every morning, Wotton, Rem. p. 246.

CO'MET.† n. s. [Fr. comète, Sax. cometa, Lat. cometa, Gr. κομήτης, from κόμη, a bush of hair.]

A heavenly body in the planetary region appearing suddenly, and again disappearing; and, during the time of its appearance, moving through its proper orbit like a planet. The orbits of comets are elipses, having one of their foci in the centre of the sun; and being very long and eccentrick, they become invisible when in that part most remote from the sun. Comets, popularly called blazing stars, are distinguished from other stars by a long train or tail of light, always opposite to the sun: hence arises a popular division of comets into three kinds, bearded, tailed, and haired comets; though the division rather relates to the different circumstances of the same comet, than to the phænomena of the several. Thus when the comet is eastward of the sun, and moves from it, the comet is said to be bearded, barbatus, because the light marches before it. When the light is westward of the sun, the comet is said to be tailed, because the train follows it. When the comet and the sun are diametrically opposite, the earth being between them, the train is hid behind the body of the comet, excepting a little that appears around it in form of a border of hair, hence called crinitus.

According to Sir Isaac Newton, the tail of a comet is a very thin vapour, emitted by the head or nucleus of the comet, ignited by the neighbourhood of the sun, and this vapour is furnished by the atmosphere of the comet. The vapours of comets being thus dilated, rarefied, and diffused, may probably, by means of their own gravity, be attracted down to the planets, and become intermingled with their atmospheres. For the conservation of the water and moisture of the planets, comets seem absolutely requisite; from whose condensed vapours and exhalations, all that moisture which is spent in vegetations and putrefactions, and turned into dry earth, may be resupplied and recruited; for all vegetables increase wholly from fluids; and turn by putrefaction into earth. Hence the quantity of dry earth must continually increase, and the moisture of the globe decrease, and at last be quite evaporated, if it have not a continual supply. And I suspect, adds Sir Isaac, that the spirit which makes the finest, subtilest, and best part of our air, and which is absolutely requisite for the life and being of all things, comes principally from the comets.

The same great author has computed that the sun's heat, in the comet of 1680, was, to his heat with us at Midsummer, as twenty-eight thousand to one; and that the heat of the body of the comet, was near two thousand times as great as that of red-hot iron. He also calculates, that a globe of red-hot iron, of the dimensions of our earth, would scarce be cool in fifty thousand years. If then the comet be supposed to cool a hundred times as fast as red-hot iron, yet, since its heat was two thousand times greater, supposing it of the bigness of the earth, it would not be cool in a million of years. Trevoux, and Chambers.

And wherefore gaze this goodly company,
As if they saw some wond'rous monument,
Some comet or an unusual prodigy.
Shakspeare, Tam. of the Shrew.

Such his fell glances, as the fatal light
Of staring comets. Crashaw.

I considered a comet, or, in the language of the vulgar, a blazing star, as a sky-rocket discharged by an hand that is almighty.
Addison, Guardian, No. 103.

Fierce meteors shoot their arbitrary light,
And comets march with lawless horrours bright.
Prior.

COMET-LIKE.* adj. Resembling a comet; exciting wonder and amazement.

I am a maid,
My lord, that ne'er before invited eyes,
But have been gaz'd on, comet-like.
Shakspeare, Pericles.

Cheyne, Phil. Prin.

COMETO'GRAPHY.* n. s. [Fr. cometographie, from κομήτης, and γράφω to describe.] A description or treatise of comets.

CO'MFIT. n. s. [bellaria arida, Lat. konfit, Dutch. It should seem that both are formed by hasty pronunciation from confect.] A dry sweetmeat; any kind of fruit or root, preserved with sugar, and dried.

By feeding me on beans and pease,
He crams in nasty crevices,
And turns to comfits by his arts,
To make me relish for desserts. Hudibras, iii. i.

To CO'MFIT. v. a. [from the noun.] To preserve dry with sugar.

The fruit that does so quickly waste,
Men scarce can see it, much less taste,
Thou comfitest in streets to make it last.
Cowley.

CO'MFITURE. n. s. [from comfit, or confecture.] Sweetmeat.

From country grass to comfitures of court,
Or city's quelque-choses, let not report
My mind transport.
Donne, Poems, p. 8.

To CO'MFORT.† v. a. [comforto, low Lat. "Salvia comfortat nervos," Schol. Sal. Old Fr. conforter. "Comforter une playe, to corroborate a wound by fomentations, &c." Cotgrave.]

1. To strengthen; to enliven; to invigorate.

The evidence of God's own testimony, added unto the natural assent of reason, concerning the certainty of them, doth not a little comfort and confirm the same. Hooker, b. i.

Light excelleth in comforting the spirits of men: light varied doth the same effect, with more novelty. This is the cause why precious stones comfort. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

Some of the abbots had been guilty of comforting and assisting the rebels. Ayliffe, Parergon.

2. To console; to strengthen the mind under the pressure of calamity.

They bemoaned him, and comforted him over all the evil that the Lord had brought upon him.
Job, xlii. 11.

CO'MFORT. n. s. [from the verb.]

1. Support; assistance; countenance.

Poynings made a wild chace upon the wild Irish; where, in respect of the mountains and fastnesses, he did little good, which he would needs impute unto the comfort that the rebels should receive underhand from the earl of Kildare.
Bacon.

The king did also appoint commissioners for the fining of all such as were of any value, and had any hand or partaking in the aid or comfort of Perkins, or the Cornishmen. Bacon.

2. Consolation; support under calamity or danger.

Her soul heaven's queen, whose name she bears,
In comfort of her mother's fears,
Hath plac'd among her virgin train. B. Jonson.

As they have no apprehension of those things, so they need no comfort against them. Tillotson.

3. That which gives consolation or support in calamity.

I will keep her ignorant of her good,
To make her heavenly comforts of despair,
When it is least expected.
Shakspeare, Measure for Measure.

Your children were vexation to your youth,
But mine shall be a comfort to your age.
Shakspeare, Rich. III.

We need not fear
To pass commodiously this life, sustained
By him with many comforts, till we end,
In dust, our final rest and native home.
Milton, P. L.

CO'MFORTABLE. adj. [from comfort.]

1. Receiving comfort; susceptible of comfort; chearful: of persons. Not in use.

For my sake be comfortable; hold death
A while at the arm's end. Shaksp. As you like it.

My lord leans wond'rously to discontent;
His comfortable temper has forsook him:
He is much out of health.
Shakspeare, Tim. of Athens.

2. Admitting comfort; of condition.

What can promise him a comfortable appearance before his dreadful judge? South.

3. Dispensing comfort; having the power of giving comfort.

He had no brother, which, though it be comfortable for kings to have, yet draweth the subjects eyes aside. Bacon, Hen. VII.

The lives of many miserable men were saved, and a comfortable provision made for their subsistence. Dryden, Fab. Dedic.

CO'MFORTABLENESS.* n. s. [from comfortable.] A state of comfort; a dispensation of comfort.

CO'MFORTABLY.† adv. [from comfortable.] In a comfortable manner; with cheerfulness; without despair.

Comfort ye, comfort ye my people, saith the Lord. Speak ye comfortably to Jerusalem, and cry unto her, that her warfare is accomplished, that her iniquity is pardoned. Isaiah, xl. 2.

Upon view of the sincerity of that performance, hope comfortably and cheerfully for God's performance. Hammond.

CO'MFORTER.† n. s. [from comfort.]

1. One that administers consolation in misfortunes; one that strengthens and supports the mind in misery or danger.

This very prayer of Christ obtained angels to be sent him, as comforters in his agony.
Hooker, v. § 48.

The heav'ns have blest you with a goodly son,
To be a comforter when he is gone.
Shakspeare, Rich. III.

Nineveh is laid waste, who will bemoan her? whence shall I seek comforters for thee?
Neh. iii. 7.

2. The title of the Third Person of the Holy Trinity.

But the Comforter, which is the Holy Ghost, whom the Father will send in my name, he shall teach you all things. St. John, xiv. 26.

From heaven
He to his own a Comforter will send,
The promise of the Father, who shall dwell
His spirit within them. Milton, P. L. xii. 468.

CO'MFORTFUL.* adj. Full of comfort. Obsolete. Huloet.

CO'MFORTLESS. adj. [from comfort.] Wanting comfort; being without any thing to allay misfortune: used of persons as well as things.

The rare temper and proportion, which the church of England useth in commensurating the forms of absolution to the degrees of preparation and necessity, is to be observed.

Puller, Moderat. of the Church of Eng. p. 319.

COMME'NSURATE.† adj. [from the verb. Heylin reckons this adjective, among uncouth and unusual words, in 1656. Nor are any of the examples, given by Dr. Johnson, from works so far back as that date. That from Smith, which I add, is somewhat nearer to the time.]

1. Reducible to some common measure.

They permitted no intelligence between them, other than by the mediation of some organ equally commensurate to soul and body. Government of the Tongue.

2. Equal; proportionable to each other.

The second signification of the word is ævum, seculum, an age, a certain long space of time, that is commensurate with the duration of the thing that is spoken of. Smith's Portraiture of Old Age, p. 191.

Is our knowledge adequately commensurate with the nature of things? Glanville's Scepsis.

Those who are persuaded that they shall continue for ever, cannot chuse but aspire after a happiness commensurate to their duration. Tillotson.

Nothing commensurate to the desires of human nature, on which it could fix as its ultimate end, without being carried on with any further desire. Rogers, Sermons.

Matter and gravity are always commensurate. Bentley.

COMME'NSURATELY. adv. [from commensurate.] With the capacity of measuring, or being measured by some other thing.

We are constrained to make the day serve to measure the year as well as we can, though not commensurately to each year; but by collecting the fraction of days in several years, till they amount to an even day. Holder on Time.

COMMENSURA'TION. n. s. [from commensurate.] Proportion; reduction of some things to some common measure.

A body over great, or over small, will not be thrown so far as a body of a middle size; so that, it seemeth, there must be a commensuration or proportion between the body moved and the force, to make it move well. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

All fitness lies in a particular commensuration, or proportion of one thing to another. South.

To COMMENT. v. n. [commentor, Lat.]

1. To annotate; to write notes upon an author; to expound; to explain: with upon before the thing explained,

Such are thy secrets, which my life makes good,
And comments on thee; for in ev'ry thing
Thy words do find me out, and parallels bring,
And in another make me understand. Herbert.

Criticks having first taken a liking to one of these poets, proceed to comment on him, and illustrate him. Dryden, Juv. Ded.

They have contented themselves only to comment upon those texts, and make the best copies they could after those originals. Temple.

Indeed I hate that any man should be idle, while I must translate and comment. Pope.

2. To make remarks; to make observations.

Enter his chamber, view his lifeless corps,
And comment then upon his sudden death.
Shakspeare, Hen. VI.

To CO'MMENT.* v. a.

1. To explain.

In speaking, she studiously avoids all suspicious expressions, which wanton apprehensions may colourably comment into obscenity. Fuller's Holy State, p. 33.

This was the text commented by Chrysostom and Theodoret. Reeves, Collat. of the Psalms, p. 18.

2. To devise; to feign.

Where were ye born? Some say in Crete by name,
Others in Thebes, and others otherwhere;
But, wheresoever they comment the same,
They all consent that ye begotten were
And born here in this world. Spenser, F. Q. vi. vii. 53.

CO'MMENT.† n. s. [from the verb.]

1. Annotations on an author; notes; explanation; exposition; remarks.

I have laboured to bring in all the most obscure passages of Scripture in their proper places, that so the due citation and alleging of them might be as a comment and clear apprehension of their meaning. Hartlib, Tr. of Comenius's Ref. of Schools, (1642,) p. 50.

Adam came into the world a philosopher, which appeared by his writing the nature of things upon their names: he could view essences in themselves, and read forms without the comment of their respective properties. South, Sermons.

All the volumes of philosophy,
With all their comments never could invent
So politick an instrument. Prior.

Proper gestures, and vehement exertions of the voice, are a kind of comment to what he utters. Addison, Spectator.

Still with itself compar'd, his text peruse;
And let your comment be the Mantuan muse. Pope.

2. Remarks; observation.

In such a time as this, it is not meet,
That every nice offence should bear its comment. Shakspeare.

Forgive the comment that my passion made
Upon thy feature; for my rage was blind. Shakspeare, K. John.

All that is behind will be by way of comment on that part of the church of England's charity. Hammond's Fundamentals.

CO'MMENTARY.† n. s. [commentarius, Latin.]

1. An exposition; book of annotations or remarks.

The same things also were reported in the writings and commentaries of Neemias. 2 Macc. ii. 13.

In religion, scripture is the best rule; and the church's universal practice, the best commentary. King Charles.

2. Memoir; narrative in familiar manner.

The emperour spake seldom openly, but out of a commentary, that is to say, that he had before provided and written, to the intent that he would speake no more ne less than he had provided. Sir T. Elyot, Gov. fol. 90. b.

Vere, in a private commentary which he wrote of that service, testified that eight hundred were slain. Bacon.

They shew still the ruins of Cæsar's wall, that reached eighteen miles in length, as he has declared it in the first book of his Commentaries. Addison on Italy.

To CO'MMENTATE.* v. n. [from comment.] To annotate; to write notes upon.

Must I for Shakspeare no compassion feel,
Almost eat up by commentating zeal?
Pursuits of Literature.

CO'MMENTATOR.† n. s. [old Fr. commentateur, "a commentator." Cotgrave. It was therefore in use long before Dryden wrote, from whom Dr. Johnson's earliest example is taken. Featley also in 1645 thus plays upon the word, in reference to the Lat. commentum, a falsehood as well as an exposition. "They shall give us leave to esteem them no prophets, but enthusiasts: no inspired men, but distracted; no seers, but dreamers; no expositors, but impostors; no commentators, but commenters, nay rather commentiters!" Dippers Dipt, p. 227.] Expositor; annotator.

I have made such expositions of my authors, as no commentator will forgive me. Dryden.

Some of the commentators tell us, that Marsya was a lawyer who had lost his cause. Addison on Italy.

Galen's commentator tells us, that bitter substances engender choler, and burn the blood. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

No commentator can more slily pass
O'er a learn'd unintelligible place. Pope.

CO'MMENTER.† n. s. [from comment.] One that writes comments; an explainer; an annotator.

With reverence to great Cæsar, worthy Romans,
Observe but this ridiculous commenter. B. Jonson, Poetaster.

As slily as any commenter goes by
Hard words or sense. Donne, Poems, p. 124.

The fourth means are commenters and fathers, who have handled the places controverted, which the parson by no means refuseth. Herbert's Country Parson, ch. 4.

COMMENTI'TIOUS.† adj. [commentitius, Lat.] Invented; fictitious; imaginary.

But to mark how corruption and apostasy crept in by degrees, and to gather up wherever we find the remaining sparks of original truth, wherewith to stop the mouths of our adversaries, and to bridle them with their own curb, who willingly pass by that which is orthodoxal in them, and studiously cull out that which is commentitious, and best for their turns; not weighing the Fathers in the balance of Scripture, but Scripture in the balance of the Fathers. Milton, of Prelatical Episcopacy.

It is easy to draw a parallelism between that ancient and this modern nothing, and make good its resemblance to that commentitious inanity. Glanville, Scepsis.

COMMERCE.† n. s. [commercium, Latin. It was anciently accented on the last syllable. See also To COMMERCE.]

1. Intercourse; exchange of one thing for another; interchange of any thing; trade; traffick.

Places of publick resort being thus provided, our repair thither is especially for mutual conference, and, as it were, commerce to be had between God and us, Hooker, v. § 17.

How could communities,
Degrees in schools, and brotherhoods in cities,
Peaceful commerce from dividable shores,
But by degrees stand in authentick place?
Shakspeare, Troil. and Cress.

Instructed ships shall sail to quick commerce,
By which remotest regions are ally'd:
Which makes one city of the universe,
Where some may gain, and all may be supply'd.
Dryden.

These people had not any commerce with the other known parts of the world. Tillotson.

In any country, that hath commerce with the rest of the world, it is almost impossible now to be without the use of silver coin. Locke.

2. Common or familiar intercourse.

Good nature which consists in overlooking of faults is to be exercised only in doing ourselves justice in the ordinary commerce and occurrences of life. Addison.

3. A game at cards.

To CO'MMERCE.† v. n. [from the noun.]

1. To traffick.

Ezekiel in the description of Tyre and of the exceeding trade that it had with the East, as the only mart town, reciteth both the people with whom they commerce, and also what commodities every country yielded. Ralegh.

When they might not converse or commerce with any civil men; whither should they fly but into the woods, and mountains, and there live in a wild manner. Sir J. Davies.

Beware you commerce not with bankrupts.
B. Jonson, Every Man out of his Humour.

2. To hold intercourse with.

Since great Talbot's gone
Down to thy silence, I commerce with none.
Habington's Cas ara, p. 154.

Come, but keep thy wonted state,
With even step and musing gait,
And looks commercing with the skies,
Thy rapt' soul sitting in thine eyes. Milton, Il Pens.

COMME'RCER.* n. s. [from commerce.] One who trafficks or holds intercourse with another. A word not in use.

There are many before whom the tempter dares not appear: — he would rather fright than fancy such commercers; — and with many harmless souls he hath no greater commerce than these petty seducements, &c.
W. Montagu, Dev. Ess. P. II. 1654, p. 105.

COMME'RCIAL.† adj. [from commerce.] Relating to commerce or traffick. This word is of modern introduction into our language; at least is not perhaps of a century's age.

One circumstance prevented commercial intercourse with nations from ceasing altogether.
Robertson.

We are now members for a rich commercial city; this city, however, is but a part of a rich commercial nation, the interests of which are various, multiform, and intricate.
Burke, Speech at Bristol, 1774.

COMME'RCIALLY.* adv. [from commercial.] In a commercial view.

I consider the stopping of the distillery, economically, financially, commercially, medicinally, and in some degree morally too, as a measure rather well meant than well considered.
Burke, Thoughts on Scarcity.

To CO'MMIGRATE. v. n. [con and migro, Latin.] To remove in a body, or by consent, from one country to another.

COMMIGRA'TION. n. s. [from commigrate.] A removal of a large body of people from one country to another.

Both the inhabitants of that and of our world lost all memory of their commigration hence.
Woodward, Nat. Hist.

To CO'MMINATE.* v. a. [Lat. comminor.] To threaten.

I cannot agree to this anathema, though comminated by such a favourite lord Peter of mine as Edmond. Hardinge's Second Essence of Malone, 1801, p. 55.

COMMINA'TION.† n. s. [comminatio, Lat. commination, old Fr.]

1. A threat; a denunciation of punishment, or of vengeance.

Is it likely that when Christ not only commanded Peter to put up his sword, drawn with greater zeal in passion than judgement upon deliberation, but added also to that charge a commination in generality, that whosoever drew the sword, should perish by the sword, his purpose was to bind the hands of his apostles, but yet to leave the passions of those that should succeed them at full liberty? Ld. Northampton, Proceed. against Garnet, I i. 3.

Speaks the rude carter to the wagon slow
With threatening words, or to the beasts that draw?
Surely unto the beasts that eas'ly go:
For there's the principle of motion ——
Which, though it mov'd by commination,
So stifly strives, yet from itself it strives,
Bears itself forth with stout contention;
And ever and anon the whip revives
That inward life, so bravely on the rustick drives.
More, Song of the Soul, i. ii. 39.

Some parts of knowledge God has thought fit to seclude from us, to fence them not only by precept and commination, but with difficulty and impossibilities. Decay of Piety.

2. The recital of God's threatenings on stated days.

In the last review of our Liturgy, a clause was added for the sake of explaining the word commination; and the appointing of the times, on which it should be used, left to the discretion of the bishop or ordinary. So that the whole title, as it stands now, runs thus: "A commination, or denouncing of God's anger and judgements against sinners, with certain prayers to be used on the first day of Lent, and at other times, as the ordinary shall appoint." The ordinaries indeed seldom or never make use of the power here given them, except that sometimes they appoint part of the office, viz. from the 51st Psalm to the end, to be used upon solemn days of fasting and humiliation. But as to the whole office, it is never used entirely, but upon the day mentioned in the title of it, viz. the first day of Lent.
Wheatley on the Com. Pr. ch. 14. Introd.

COMMI'NATORY.† adj. [old Fr. comminatoire.] Denunciatory; threatening.

Half-hearted creatures, as these are, —
On two or three comminatory terms,
Would run their fears to any hole of shelter.
B. Jonson, Magn. Lady.

To COMMI'NGLE. v. a. [commisceo, Latin.] To mix into one mass; to unite intimately; to mix; to blend.

Blest are those,
Whose blood and judgement are so well commingled,
That they are not a pipe for fortune's finger,
To sound what stop she please. Shaksp. Hamlet.

To COMMI'NGLE. v. n. To unite one with another.

Dissolutions of gum tragacanth and oil of sweet almonds do not commingle, the oil remaining on the top 'till they be stirred. Bacon, Physical Rem.

To COMMI'NUATE.* v. a. [Lat. comminuo, old Fr. comminuer. See To COMMINUTE.] To grind.

The more solid food which needs greater manducation, cannot be sufficiently comminuated for chyle, or ground low enough for the stomach, until these teeth have done this work upon it.
Smith's Portraiture of Old Age, p. 82.

It will comminuate things of so hard a substance that no mill can break.
Smith's Portraiture of Old Age, p. 104.

COMMINU'IBLE. adj. [from comminute.] Frangible; reducible to powder; susceptible of pulverisation.

The best diamonds are comminuible, and are so far from breaking hammers, that they submit unto pestilation, and resist not any ordinary pestle.
Brown, Vulg. Err.

To CO'MMINUTE. v. a. [comminuo, Latin.] To grind; to pulverise; to break into small parts.

Parchment, skins, and cloth drink in liquors, though themselves be intire bodies, and not comminuted, as sand and ashes. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

COMMINU'TION. n. s. [from comminute.]

1. The act of grinding into small parts; pulverisation.

The jaw in men and animals furnished with grinders, hath an oblique or transverse motion, necessary for comminution of the meat.
Ray on the Creation.

This smiting of the steel with the flint doth only make a comminution, and a very rapid whirling and melting of some particles; but that idea of flame is wholly in us. Bentley.

2. Attenuation.

Causes of fixation are the even spreading of the spirits and tangible parts, the closeness of the tangible parts, and the jejuneness or extreme comminution of spirits; of which the two first may be joined with a nature liquefiable. Bacon.

COMMI'SERABLE. adj. [from commiserate.] Worthy of compassion; pitiable; such as must excite sympathy or sorrow.

It is the sinfullest thing in the world to destitute a plantation once in forwardness: for, besides the dishonour, it is the guiltiness of blood of many commiserable persons. Bacon, Ess.

This was the end of this noble and commiserable person, Edward eldest son to the duke of Clarence. Bacon, Hen. VII.

To COMMI'SERATE. v. a. [con and misereor, Lat.] To pity; to look on with compassion; to compassionate.

Then we must those, who groan beneath the weight
Of age, disease, or want, commiserate.
Denham.

We should commiserate our mutual ignorance, and endeavour to remove it. Locke.

COMMISERA'TION. n. s. [from commiserate.] Pity; compassion; tenderness, or concern for another's pains.

These poor seduced creatures, whom I can neither speak nor think of but with much commiseration and pity. Hooker.

Live, and hereafter say
A mad man's mercy bade thee run away.
—— I do defy thy commiseration,
And apprehend thee for a felon here.
Shakspeare, Rom. and Juliet.

God knows with how much commiseration, and solicitous caution, I carried on that business, that I might neither encourage the rebels, nor discourage the Protestants. K. Charles.

She ended weeping; and her lovely plight
Immoveable, 'till peace obtain'd from fault
Acknowledg'd and deplor'd, in Adam wrought
Commiseration. Milton, P. L.

From you their estate may expect effectual comfort, there are none from whom it may not deserve commiseration. Sprat.

No where fewer beggars appear to charm up commiseration, yet no where is there greater charity.
Graunt's Bills of Mortality.

I prevailed with myself to go and see him, partly out of commiseration, and partly out of curiosity. Swift.

COMMI'SERATIVE.* adj. [from commise-

rate.] Having pity or concern for another's sufferings.

COMMI'SERATIVELY.* adv. [from commiserative.] Out of compassion.

He hath divided his soul from the case of his soul, whose weakness he assists no otherwise than commiseratively, not that it is his, but that it is. Overbury's Characters.

COMMI'SERATOR.* n. s. [from commiserate.] One who has mercy or compassion.

Deaf unto the thunder of the laws, and rocks unto the cries of charitable commiserators. Brown, Christ. Mor. ii. 6.

*COMMISSA'RIAT. n. s. [Fr.] A body of persons, attending an army, who are commissioned to regulate the procuration and conveyance of ammunition or provision. See COMMISSARY. The word is derived from modern warfare.

CO'MMISSARISHIP. n. s. [from commissary.] The office of a commissary.

A commissariship is not grantable for life, so as to bind the succeeding bishop, though it should be confirmed by the dean and chapter. Ayliffe's Parergon.

CO'MMISSARY.† n. s. [commissarius, low Latin; commissaire, old Fr.]

1. An officer made occasionally for a certain purpose; a delegate; a deputy.

Great Destiny the Commissary of God,
That hast mark'd out a path and period
For every thing, who, where we off-spring tooke,
Our ways and ends, seest at one instant.
Donne, Poems, p. 294.

2. It is a title of ecclesiastical jurisdiction, appertaining to such as exercises spiritual jurisdiction (at least so far as his commission permits) in places of the diocese so far distant from the chief city, as the chancellor cannot call the subjects. Cowel.

The commissaries of bishops have authority only in some certain place of the diocese, and in some certain causes of the jurisdiction limited to them by the bishop's commission. Ayliffe.

3. An officer who draws up lists of the numbers of an army, and regulates the procuration and conveyance of provision or ammunition.

But is it thus you English bards compose?
With Runick lays thus tag insipid prose?
And when you should your heroes deeds rehearse,
Give us a commissary's list in verse? Prior.

COMMI'SSION.† n. s. [commissio, low Lat. old Fr. commission.]

1. The act of entrusting any thing.

2. A trust; a warrant by which any trust is held, or authority exercised.

Commission is the warrant, or letters patent, that all men exercising jurisdiction, either ordinary or extraordinary, have for their power. Cowel.

Omission to do what is necessary,
Seals a commission to a blank of danger.
Shakspeare, Troil. and Cress.

The subjects grief
Comes through commissions, which compel from each
The sixth part of his substance, to be levied
Without delay. Shakspeare, Hen. VIII.

He led our powers;
Bore the commission of my place and person;
The which immediacy may well stand up,
And call itself your brother.
Shakspeare, King Lear.

He would have them fully acquainted with the nature and extent of their office, and so he joins commission with instruction: by one he conveys power, by the other knowledge. South.

3. A warrant by which a military officer is constituted.

Solyman, filled with the vain hope of the conquest of Persia, gave out his commissions into all parts of his empire, for the raising of a mighty army. Knolles, Hist. of the Turks.

I was made a colonel; though I gained my commission by the horse's virtues, having leapt over a six-bar gate. Addison, Freeholder.

He for his son a gay commission buys,
Who drinks, whores, fights, and in a duel dies.
Pope.

4. Charge; mandate; office; employment.

It was both a strange commission, and a strange obedience to a commission, for men, in the midst of their own blood, and being so furiously assailed, to hold their hands contrary to the laws of nature and necessity. Bacon, War with Spain.

Such commission from above
I have receiv'd, to answer thy desire
Of knowledge within bounds. Milton, P. L.

At his command the storms invade;
The winds by his commission blow;
'Till with a nod he bids them cease. Dryden.

He bore his great commission in his look;
But sweetly temper'd awe, and soften'd all he spoke. Dryden.

5. Act of committing a crime; perpetration. Sins of commission are distinguished in theology from sins of omission.

Every commission of sin introduces into the soul a certain degree of hardness. South, Serm.

He indulges himself in the habit of known sin, whether commission of something which God hath forbidden, or the omission of something commanded. Rogers, Serm.

6. A number of people joined in a trust or office.

7. The state of that which is intrusted to a number of joint officers; as, the great seal was put into commission.

8. [In commerce.] The order by which a factor trades for another person.

To COMMI'SSION. v. a. [from commission.]

1. To empower; to appoint.

2. To send with mandate or authority.

The peace polluted thus, a chosen band
He first commissions to the Latian land,
In threat'ning embassy. Dryden, Æn.

COMMI'SSIONAL.* adj. [from commission.] Appointing by a warrant of authority.

By virtue of the king's letters commissional. Le Neve, Lives of Abps. i. 201.

COMMI'SSIONARY.* adj. [from commission.] Appointed by a warrant of authority.

By virtue of that delegate or commissionary authority, which is by Christ intrusted with them. Bp. Hall, Cases of Conscience.

To COMMI'SSIONATE.† v. a. [from commission.] To commission; to empower.

As he was thus sent by his father, so also were the apostles solemnly commissionated by him to preach to the Gentile world, who, with indefatigable industry and resolute sufferings, pursued the charge; and sure this is competent evidence, that the design was of the most weighty importance. Decay of Piety.

Our Lord commissionated his disciples to heal the sick. Whitby on St. James, v. 14.

COMMI'SSIONER. n. s. [from commission] One included in a warrant of authority.

A commissioner is one who hath commission, as letters patents, or other lawful warrant, to execute any publick office. Cowel.

One article they stood upon, which I with your commissioners have agreed upon. Sidney.

Suppose itinerary commissioners to inspect, throughout the kingdom, into the conduct of men in office, with respect to morals and religion as well as abilities. Swift.

Like are their merits, like rewards they share,
That shines a consul, this commissioner.
Pope, Dunciad.

COMMI'SSURE.† n. s. [old Fr. commissure, from commissura, Lat.] Joint; a place where one part is joined to another.

All these inducements cannot countervail the sole inconvenience of shaking and disjointing the commissures with so many strokes of the chizel. Wotton, Architecture.

This animal is covered with a strong shell, jointed like armour by four transverse commissures in the middle of the body, connected by tough membranes. Ray on the Creation.

To COMMI'T. v. a. [committo, Lat.]

1. To intrust; to give in trust; to put into the hands of another.

It is not for your health thus to commit
Your weak condition to the raw, cold morning.
Shakspeare.

2. To put in any place to be kept safe.

They who are desirous to commit to memory, might have ease. 2 Mac. ii. 25.

Is my muse controul'd
By servile awe? Born free, and not be bold!
At least I'll dig a hole within the ground,
And to the trusty earth commit the sound.
Dryden, Pers.

3. To send to prison; to imprison.

Here comes the nobleman that committed the prince, for striking him about Bardolph. Shakspeare, Hen. IV.

They two were committed, at least restrained of their liberty. Clarendon.

So though my ankle she has quitted,
My heart continues still committed;
And, like a bail'd and main-priz'd lover,
Although at large, I am bound over. Hudibras.

4. To perpetrate; to do a fault; to be guilty of a crime.

Letters out of Ulster gave him notice of the inhumane murders committed there upon a multitude of the Protestants. Clarendon.

A creeping young fellow committed matrimony with a brisk gamesome lass. L'Estrange.

'Tis policy
For son and father to take different sides;
Then lands and tenements commit no treason.
Dryden.

5. To put together for a contest: a latinism.

How becomingly does Philopolis exercise his office, and seasonably commit the opponent with the respondent, like a long practised moderator. More's Divine Dial.

6. To place in a state of hostility or incongruity: a latinism.

Harry whose tuneful and well measured song,
First taught our English musick how to span
Words with just note and accent, not to scan
With Midas' ears, committing short and long.
Milton.

To COMMI'T.* v. n. To be guilty of incontinency.

Swear not; commit not with man's just spouse.
Shakspeare, King Lear.

His weight is deadly who commits with strumpets. Middleton, Women, beware Women.

COMMI'TMENT.† n. s. [from commit.]

1. An act of sending to prison; imprisonment.

It did not appear by any new examinations or commitments, that any other person was discovered or appeached. Bacon, Henry VII.

They were glad to compound for his bare commitment to the Tower, whence he was within few days enlarged. Clarendon.

I have been considering, ever since my commitment, what it might be proper to deliver upon this occasion. Swift.

2. An order for sending to prison.

3. A parliamentary expression, when a bill is referred to a committee.

The parliament — which thought this petition worthy, not only of receiving, but of voting to a commitment, after it had been advocated, and moved for, by some honourable and learned gentlemen of the house. Milton, Animadv. Rem. Def.

COMMI'TTEE.† n. s. [from commit.]

1. Those to whom the consideration or ordering of any matter is referred, either by some court to whom it belongs, or by consent of parties. As in parliament, after a bill is read, it is either agreed to and passed, or not agreed to; or neither of these, but referred to the consideration of some appointed by the house, to examine it farther, who thereupon are called a committee. Cowel.

Manchester had orders to march thither, having a committee of the parliament with him, as there was another committee of the Scottish parliament always in that army; there being also now a committee of both kingdoms residing at London, for the carrying on the war. Clarendon.

All corners were filled with covenanters, confusion, committee men, and soldiers, serving each other to their ends of revenge, or power, or profit; and these committee men and soldiers were possest with this covenant. Walton.

2. The person to whom the care of an idiot or lunatick, or of an idiot's or lunatick's estate, is committed. Pronounced with the accent on the last syllable.

The lord chancellor usually commits the care of his person to some friend, who is then called his committee. — The heir is generally made the manager or committee of the estate. Blackstone.

COMMI'TTEESHIP.* n. s. [from committee.] The office and profit of committees.

Trusted with committeeships and other gainful offices. Milton, Hist. of Eng. B. i.

COMMI'TTER.† n. s. [from commit.] Perpetrator; one that commits.

Such as defile or pollute them, be committers of sacrilege.

Martin on the Marriage of Priests, (1554), P. 1.

To prove, that the committer of such wickednesses commeth of the will of those men that charge him [the devil] withal.

Crowley's Apolog. of Eng. Writers, (1566,) p. 54. b.

Such an one makes a man not only a partaker of other men's sins, but also a deriver of the whole intire guilt of them to himself; and yet so as to leave the committer of them as full of guilt as he was before. South, Serm. ii. 198.

COMMI'TTIBLE.† adj. [from commit.] Liable to be committed.

Besides the mistakes committible in the solary compute, the difference of chronology disturbs his computes. Brown, Vulg. Err.

There is no sin committable by man, as to the kind of it, but by circumstances is capable of being made a sin of presumption. South, Serm. vii. 215.

To COMMI'X. v. a. [commisceo, Lat.] To mingle; to blend; to mix; to unite with things in one mass.

A dram of gold, dissolved in aqua regia, with a dram of copper in aqua fortis commixed, gave a great colour. Bacon.

I have written against the spontaneous generation of frogs in the clouds; or, on the earth out of dust and rain water commixed.

Ray on the Creation.

It is manifest by this experiment, that the commixed impressions of all the colours do stir up and beget a sensation of white; that is, that whiteness is compounded of all the colours. Newton, Opt.

To COMMI'X.* v. n. To unite.

Or, selfe-conceited, play the humorous Platonist,
Which boldly dares affirme, that spirits themselves supply
With bodies, to commix with frail mortalitie.
Drayton, Polyolb, S. 5.

The smile mocking the sigh, that it would fly
From so divine a temple, to commix
With winds that sailors rail at. Shaksp. Cymbeline.

COMMI'XION.† n. s. [from commix.] Mixture; incorporation of different ingredients.

Were thy commixion Greek and Trojan, so
That thou could'st say, this hand is Grecian all
And this is Trojan. Shaksp. Troilus and Cressida.

We seldom see different dispositions entirely loving; for hence grows the height of friendship, when two similary souls do blend in their commixions. Junius, Sin Stigmatiz'd, (1639,) p. 834.

COMMI'XTION.† n. s. [from commix.] Mixture; incorporation; union of various substances in one mass.

Some species there be of middle and participating natures, that is, of birds and beasts, as batts, and some few others, so confirmed and set together, that we cannot define the beginning or end of either; their being a commixtion of both in the whole, rather than adaptation or cement of the one unto the other. Brown, Vulg Err.

By the which word, adultery, although it be properly understood of the unlawful commixtion or joining together of a married man with any woman beside his wife, &c. Homilies, i. 78.

This commixtion of things, so contrary, doth not tend to the defacing, but adorning, of the world; as concords and discords do, unto the better tempering of the harmony in singing.

Fotherby's Atheom. p. 334.

If both natures were not preserved complete and distinct in Christ, it must either be by the conversion and transubstantiation of one into the other, or by commixtion and confusion of both into one. Pearson on the Creed, Art. iii.

COMMI'XTURE. n. s. [from commix.]

1. The act of mingling; the state of being mingled; incorporation; union in one mass.

In the commixture of any thing that is more oily or sweet, such bodies are least apt to putrefy, the air working little upon them.

Bacon, Nat. Hist.

2. The mass formed by mingling different things; composition; compound.

Fair ladies, mask'd, are roses in the bud;
Or angels veil'd in clouds: are roses blown,
Dismask'd, their damask sweet commixture shewn.
Shakspeare.

There is scarcely any rising but by a commixture of good and evil arts. Bacon, Ess. 15.

All the circumstances and respect of religion and state intermixed together in that commixture, will better become a royal history, or a councilltable, than a single life.

Wotton, Life, &c. of D. of Buckingham.

COMMO'DE.† n. s. [French. The word appears to have been adopted from the block, on which the dress was shaped. For, in the Fop's Dictionary, or Terms of the Art Cosmetick, printed in 1690, the commode is this: "A frame of wire, covered with silk, on which the whole head-attire is adjusted at once upon a bust, or property of wood, carved to the breasts, like that which perukemakers set upon their stalls."] The head-dress of women.

Let them reflect how they would be affected, should they meet with a man on horseback, in his breeches and jack-boots, dressed up in a commode and a nightrail. Spectator, No. 435.

She has contrived to shew her principles by the setting of her commode; so that it will be impossible for any woman that is disaffected to be in the fashion. Addison, Freeholder.

She, like some pensive statesman, walks demure,
And smiles, and hugs, to make destruction sure;
Or under high commodes, with looks erect,
Barefac'd devours, in gaudy colours deck'd
Granville.

COMMO'DIOUS. adj. [commodus, Lat.]

1. Convenient; suitable; accommodate to any purpose; fit; proper; free from hinderance or uneasiness.

Such a place cannot be commodious to live in; for being so near the moon, it had been too near the sun. Ralegh's Hist.

To that recess, commodious for surprize,
When purple light shall next suffuse the skies,
With me repair. Pope, Odyss. iv. 550.

2. Useful; suited to wants or necessities.

If they think we ought to prove the ceremonies commodious, they do greatly deceive themselves. Hooker, iv. 4.

Bacchus had found out the making of wine, and many things else commodious for mankind.

Ralegh, Hist. of the World, i. vi. 5.

The gods have done their part,
By sending this commodious plague.
Dryden and Lee, Œdipus.

Maro's muse,
Thrice sacred muse, commodious precepts gives,
Instructive to the swains. Philips.

COMMO'DIOUSLY. adv. [from commodious.]

1. Conveniently.

At the large foot of an old hollow tree,
In a deep cave seated commodiously,
His ancient and hereditary house,
There dwelt a good substantial country mouse.
Cowley.

2. Without distress.

We need not fear
To pass commodiously this life, sustain'd
By him with many comforts, 'till we end
In dust; our final rest, and native home.
Milton, P. L.

3. Suitably to a certain purpose.

Wisdom may have framed one and the same thing to serve commodiously for divers ends.

Hooker, v. § 42.

Galen, upon the consideration of the body, challenges any one to find how the least fibre might be more commodiously placed for use or comeliness.

South, Serm.

COMMO'DIOUSNESS. n. s. [from commodious.] Convenience; advantage.

The place requireth many circumstances; as the situation near the sea, for the commodiousness of an intercourse with England. Bacon.

Of cities, the greatness and riches increase according to the commodiousness of their situation in fertile countries, or upon rivers and havens.

Temple.

COMMO'DITY.† n. s. [old Fr. commodité, from commoditas, Lat.]

1. Interest; advantage; profit.

They knew, that howsoever men may seek their own commodity, yet if this were done with injury unto others, it was not to be suffered. Hooker, v. § 10.

Commodity, the biass of the world,
The world, which of itself is poised well,

'Till this advantage, this vile drawing biass,
This sway of motion, this commodity,
Makes it take head from all indifferency,
From all direction, purpose, course, intent.
Shakspeare, K. John.

After much debatement of the commodities or discommodities like to ensue, they concluded.
Hayward.

2. Convenience, particular advantage.

There came into her head certain verses, which, if she had had present commodity, she would have adjoined as a retraction to the other. Sidney, b. ii.

She demanded leave, not to lose this long sought-for commodity of time, to ease her heart. Sidney.

Travellers turn out of the highway, drawn either by the commodity of a foot-path, or the delicacy or the freshness of the fields. B. Jonson, Discov.

It had been difficult to make such a mole where they had not so natural a commodity as the earth of Puzzuola, which immediately hardens in the water. Addison on Italy.

3. Wares; merchandise; goods for traffick.

All my fortunes are at sea;
Nor have I money, nor commodity
To raise a present sum. Shaks. Merch. of Venice.

Commodities are moveables, valuable by money, the common measure. Locke.

Of money in the commerce and traffick of mankind, the principal use is that of saving the commutation of more bulky commodities.
Arbuthnot on Coins.

Co'mmodore.† n. s. [probably corrupted from the Spanish comendador. Now pronounced, I think, with the accent on the first syllable.]

1. The captain who commands a squadron of ships; a temporary admiral.

2. A select ship in a fleet of merchantmen, which leads the van in the time of war. Both usages of the word seem to have been adopted in imitation of admiral, which bears two senses; but in both, the employment of commodore is of no great date in our language. It is unnoticed in our dictionaries at the beginning of the last century.

Commodula'tion.* n. s. [Lat. con and modulatio.] Measure; agreement.

If they hold that symmetry, and commodulation, as Vitruvius calls it, which they ought, from the proportion of the head, the hand, &c. may the dimensions of the whole body be infallibly collected.
Hakewill on Providence, p. 190.

*Co'mmoigne. n. s. [Fr.] A monk of the same order or convent.

Ioffred Abbot of Crowland, with one Gilbert his commoigne, and III other monks came to his mannor of Cotenham.
Selden on Drayton's Polyolb. S. 11.

Co'mmon. adj. [communis, Latin.]

1. Belonging equally to more than one.

Though life and sense be common to man and brutes, and their operations in many things alike; yet by this form he lives the life of a man, and not of a brute, and hath the sense of a man, and not of a brute. Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

He who hath received damage, has, besides the right of punishment common to him with other men, a particular right to seek reparation. Locke.

2. Having no possessor or owner.

Where no kindred are to be found, we see the possessions of a private man revert to the community, and so become again perfectly common, nor can any one have a property in them, otherwise than in other things common by nature. Locke.

3. Vulgar; mean; not distinguished by any excellence; often seen; easy to be had; of little value; not rare; not scarce.

Or as the man whom princes do advance,
Upon their gracious mercy-seat to sit,
Doth common things, of course and circumstance,
To the reports of common men commit. Davies.

4. Publick; general; serving the use of all.

He was advised by a parliament-man not to be strict in reading all the common prayer, but make some variation. Walt.

I need not mention the old common shore of Rome, which ran from all parts of the town, with the current and violence of an ordinary river.
Addison on Italy.

5. Of no rank; mean; without birth or descent.

Look, as I blow this feather from my face,
And as the air blows it to me again,
Such is the lightness of you common men.
Shakspeare, Hen. VI.

Flying bullets now,
To execute his rage, appear too slow;
They miss, or sweep but common souls away,
For such a loss Opdam his life must pay. Waller.

6. Frequent; usual; ordinary.

There is an evil which I have seen common among men. Eccles. vi. 1.

The Papists were the most common place, and the butt against whom all the arrows were directed.
Clarendon.

Neither is it strange that there should be mysteries in divinity, as well as in the commonest operations in nature. Swift.

7. Prostitute.

'Tis a strange thing, the impudence of some women! was the word of a dame, who herself was common. L'Estrange.

Hipparchus was going to marry a common woman, but consulted Philander upon the occasion.
Spectator, No. 475.

8. [In grammar.] Such verbs as signify both action and passion are called common; as aspernor, I despise, or am despised; and also such nouns as are both masculine and femine, as parens.

Co'mmon. n. s. [from the adjective.] An open ground equally used by many persons.

Then take we down his load, and turn him off,
Like to the empty ass, to shake his ears,
And graze in commons. Shaks. Julius Cæsar.

Is not the separate property of a thing the great cause of its endearment? Does any one respect a common as much as he does his garden? South.

Co'mmon. adv. [from the adjective.] Commonly; ordinarily.

I am more than common tall.
Shakspeare, As you like it.

In Co'mmon.†

1. Equally to be participated by a certain number.

By making an explicite consent of every commoner necessary to any one's appropriating to himself any part of what is given in common, children or servants could not cut the meat which their father or master had provided for them in common, without assigning to every one his peculiar part.
Locke.

2. Equally with another; indiscriminately.

In a work of this nature it is impossible to avoid puerilities, it having that in common with dictionaries, and books of antiquities. Arbuthnot on Coins.

3. In law, a distinction of tenancy.

Estates may be held in four different ways; in severalty, in joint tenancy, in coparcenary, and in common. Blackstone.

Tenants in common are such as hold by several and distinct titles, but by unity of possession. Ibid.

To Co'mmon.† v. n. [from the noun.] To have a joint right with others in some common ground.

2. To share together.

In those places it is probable they not only lived, but also commoned together upon such provisions as were provided for them at the direction of their president. Wheatly's Schools of the Prophets, Serm. Oxf. 1721. p. 13.

Common-council-man.* n. s. One who communicates in council with others; a name yet retained among a part of the citizens of London.

I, who am no common-council-man,
Knew injuries of that dark nature done.
B. Jonson, Mortimer's Fall.

Common-cryer.* n. s. The officer by whom notice is given of things lost. See Cryer.

I will have her cry'd
By the common-cryer, through all the ward,
But I will find her. B. Jonson, Magn. Lady.

Common-hall.* n. s. The place in which the inhabitants of a city or town assemble.

All the citizens, who were met together in the common-hall, or place of publick assemblies.
Bp. Patrick on Genesis, xxxiv. 24.

Common-law contains those customs and usages which have, by long prescription, obtained in this nation the force of laws. It is distinguished from the statute law, which owes its authority to acts of parliament.

Common-lawyer.* n. s. He who is versed in the Common Law.

Canonists, civilians, and common-lawyers do all admit this distinction. Spelman.

Common Pleas. The king's court now held in Westminster-hall; but anciently moveable. Gwin observes, that 'till Henry III. granted the magna charta, there were but two courts, the exchequer, and the king's bench, so called because it followed the king; but upon the grant of that charter, the court of common pleas was erected, and settled at Westminster. All civil causes, both real and personal, are, or were formerly, tried in this court, according to the strict laws of the realm; and Fortescue represents it as the only court for real causes. The chief judge is called the lord chief justice of the common pleas, and he is assisted by three or four associates, created by letters patent from the king. Cowel.

Co'mmonable.† adj. [from common.]

1. What is held in common.

Much good land might be gained from forests and chases, and from other commonable places, so as there be care taken that the poor commoners have no injury. Bacon to Villiers.

2. Allowable to be turned on the common.

Commonable beasts are beasts of the plough, or such as manure the ground. Blackstone.

Common appurtenant is where the owner of land has a right to put in other beasts, besides such as are generally commonable, as hogs, goats, and the like. Ibid.

Co'mmonage.† n. s. [old Fr. communage.] The right of feeding on a common; the joint right of using any thing in common with others.

They have wronged poor people of their commonage, which of right belonged to them.
Fuller's Holy State, p. 286.

CO'MMONALTY.† n. s. [communauté, Fr. South writes it commonality.]

1. The common people; the people of the lower rank.

Bid him strive
To gain the love o'the commonalty; the duke
Shall govern England. Shakspeare.

There is in every state, as we know, two portions of subjects; the nobles and the commonalty. Bacon, Ess. 16.

The emmet joined in her popular tribes
Of commonalty. Milton, P. L. vii. 489.

All gentlemen are almost obliged to it; and I know no reason we should give that advantage to the commonalty of England, to be foremost in brave actions. Dryden, Pref. to Ann. Mirab.

The whole nobility, gentry, and all the sober commonality of the nation. South, Serm. v. 47.

2. The bulk of mankind.

I myself too will use the secret acknowledgement of the commonalty bearing record of the God of gods. Hooker, b. iii.

COMMONA'LITY.* See COMMONALTY.

CO'MMONER.† n. s. [from common.]

1. One of the common people; a man of low rank; of mean condition.

Doubt not
The commoners, for whom we stand, but they,
Upon their ancient malice, will forget.
Shakspeare, Coriolanus.

His great men durst not pay their court to him, till he had satiated his thirst of blood by the death of some of his loyal commoners. Addison, Freeholder.

2. A man not noble.

Here comes the king's constable,
And with him a right worshipful commoner,
My good friend, master Gilthead.
B. Jonson, the Dev. is an Ass.

This commoner has worth and parts,
Is prais'd for arms, or lov'd for arts:
His head achs for a coronet;
And who is bless'd, that is not great? Prior.

3. A member of the house of commons.

There is hardly a greater difference between two things than there is between a representing commoner in his publick calling, and the same person in common life. Swift.

4. One who has a joint right in common ground.

Much land might be gained from commonable places, so as there be care taken that the poor commoners have no injury. Bacon, Advice to Villiers.

5. A student of the second rank at the university of Oxford; one that eats at the common table.

About forty years since, forty pounds per annum for a commoner, (or pensioner, as the term is at Cambridge,) and eighty pounds per annum for a fellow-commoner, was looked on as a sufficient maintenance. Life of Dr. Prideaux, Lett. to Ld. Townsend in 1715.

6. A prostitute.

Behold this ring,
Whose high respect, and rich validity,
Did lack a parallel: yet, for all that,
He gave it to a commoner o'the camp. Shaksp.

7. A partaker; a sharer in common.

Lewis would not leave them, that they might not leave him; but resolved to be a commoner with them in weal or woe; disdaining to be such a niggard of his life, as not to spend it in a good cause in so good company. Fuller's Holy War, p. 196.

COMMONI'TION. n. s. [commonitio, Latin.] Advice; warning; instruction.

COMMO'NITIVE.* adj. [from commonition.] Advising; warning.

Whose cross was only commemorative, and commonitive, never pretended to be any way efficacious. Bp. Hall's Rem. p. 14.

CO'MMONLY.† adv. [from common.]

1. Frequently; usually; ordinarily; for the most part.

This hand of your's requires
Much castigation, exercise devout;
For here's a strong and sweating devil here,
That commonly rebels. Shaks. Othello.

A great disease may change the frame of a body, though, if it lives to recover strength, it commonly returns to its natural constitution. Temple.

2. Jointly; in a sociable manner. [Lat. communiter.]

The blessed angels to and fro descend
From highest heaven in gladsome companee,
And with great joy into that city wend,
As commonly as frend does with his frend.
Spenser, F. Q. i. x. 56.

CO'MMONNESS. n. s. [from common.]

1. Equal participation among many.

Nor can the commonness of the guilt obviate the censure, there being nothing more frequent than for men to accuse their own faults in other persons. Government of the Tongue.

2. Frequent occurrence; frequency.

Blot out that maxim, res nolunt diu male administrari: the commonness makes me not know who is the author; but sure he must be some modern. Swift.

CO'MMONPLACE.* n. s. A memorandum; an ordinary or common topick. See also COMMONPLACE-BOOK. Johnson uses this substantive in his unfair criticism on Gray, though in his dictionary he has not noticed it.

This being read both in his [Peter Martyr's] commonplaces, and on the first to the Corinthians. Milton, Tetrachordon.

In both of them I have made use of the commonplaces of Satire. Dryden, Pref. to Hind and Panther.

This is my book of drama common-places, the mother of many other plays. Duke of Buckingham's Rehearsal.

The subject of many of the letters is commonplace. Bentley, Diss. on Phalaris.

Criticism disdains to chase a school-boy to his commonplaces. Johnson, Life of Gray.

CO'MMONPLACE-BOOK.† n. s. A book in which things to be remembered are ranged under general heads.

I know some have a common-place against common-place-books, and yet perchance will privately make use of what publickly they declaim against. A common-place-book contains many notions in garrison, whence the owner may draw out an army into the field on competent warning. Fuller's Holy State, p. 164.

I turned to my commonplace-book, and found his case under the word coquette. Tatler, No. 107.

To CO'MMONPLACE. v. a. To reduce to general heads.

I do not apprehend any difficulty in collecting and commonplacing an universal history from the historians. Felton.

CO'MMONS.† n. s.

1. The vulgar; the lower people; those who inherit no honours. [Fr. commune.] And so Chaucer employs the word, agreeably to its French acceptation.

Yeomen on foot, and communes many one
With shorte staves. Chaucer, Knight's Tale.

Little office
The hateful commons will perform for us;
Except, like curs, to tear us all in pieces.
Shakspeare, Richard II.

Hath he not pass'd the nobles and the commons?
Shakspeare.

These three to kings and chiefs their scenes display,
The rest before the ignoble commons play.
Dryden, Fables.

The gods of greater nations dwell around,
And, on the right and left, the palace bound;
The commons where they can: the nobler sort,
With winding doors wide open, front the court.
Dryden.

2. The lower house of parliament, by which the people are represented, and of which the members are chosen by the people.

My good lord,
How now for mitigation of this bill
Urg'd by the commons? Doth his majesty
Incline to it or no? Shakspeare, Hen. VI.

In the house of commons many gentlemen, unsatisfied of his guilt, durst not condemn him. King Charles.

3. Food; fare; diet: so called from colleges, where it is eaten in common.

He painted himself a dove-colour, and took his common with the pigeons. L'Estrange.

Mean while she quench'd her fury at the flood,
And with a lenten sallad cool'd her blood:
Their commons, though but coarse, were nothing scant;
Nor did their minds an equal banquet want.
Dryden.

The doctor now obeys the summons,
Likes both his company and commons. Swift.

To COMMO'NSTRATE.* v. a. [Lat. commonstro.] To teach; to shew what is not known. Cockeram.

CO'MMONWEAL. } n. s. [from common
CO'MMONWEALTH. } and weal, or wealth.]

1. A polity; an established form of civil life.

Two foundations bear up publick societies; the one inclination, whereby all men desire sociable life; the other an order agreed upon, touching the manner of their union in living together: the latter is that which we call the law of a commonweal. Hooker.

It was impossible to make a commonweal in Ireland, without settling of all the estates and possessions throughout the kingdom. Davies on Ireland.

A continual parliament would but keep the commonweal in tune, by preserving laws in their vigour. King Charles.

There is no body in the commonwealth of learning who does not profess himself a lover of truth. Locke.

2. The publick; the general body of the people.

Such a prince,
So kind a father of the commonweal.
Shakspeare, Hen. IV.

Their sons are well tutored by you: you are a good member of the commonwealth. Shakspeare, Love's Labour's Lost.

3. A government in which the supreme power is lodged in the people; a republick.

Did he, or do yet any of them, imagine
The gods would sleep to such a Stygian practice,
Against that commonwealth which they have founded. B. Jonson.

Commonwealths were nothing more, in their original, but free cities; though sometimes, by force of orders and discipline, they have extended themselves into mighty dominions. Temple.

COMMONWEA'LTHSMAN.* n. s. [from commonwealth.] One who sides with a republican form of government.

Thomas Parnell was the son of a commonwealthsman of the same name, who at the restoration, left Congleton in Cheshire, where the family had been established for several centuries.

Johnson, Life of Parnel'.

CO'MMORANCE.† } n. s. [from commorant.]
CO'MMORANCY. } Dwelling; habitation; abode; residence; stay.

Is in his brain; he bites his lips, and starts.
Shakspeare, Hen. VIII.

He could not debate any thing without some commotion, when the argument was not of moment. Clarendon.

3. Disturbance; restlessness.

Sacrifices were offered when an earthquake happened, that he would allay the commotions of the water, and put an end to the earthquake.
Woodward, Nat. Hist.

COMMO'TIONER.† n. s. [from commotion.] One that causes commotions; a disturber of the peace.

A dangerous commotioner, that in so great and populous a city as London is, could draw but those same two fellows!
Bacon, Observ. on a Libel in 1592.

The people more regarding commotioners than commissioners, flocked together, as clouds cluster against a storm. Hayward.

To COMMO'VE. v. a. [commoveo, Lat.] To disturb; to agitate; to put into a violent motion; to unsettle. Not used.

Strait the sands,
Commov'd around, in gathering eddies play.
Thomson, Summer.

To CO'MMUNE.† v. n. [communico, Lat. Our word was formerly written commoun, and common; even so late as in Shakspeare's time; probably from the old Fr. comoner, to advise, or comminer, to converse with.] To converse; to talk together; to impart sentiments mutually.

So long as Guyon with her communed,
Unto the ground she cast her modest eye;
And ever and anon with rosy red,
The bashful blood her snowy cheeks did dye.
Spenser, F. Q.

I will commune with you of such things,
That want no ears but your's.
Shakspeare, Measure for Measure.

They would forbear open hostility, and resort unto him peaceably, that they might commune together as friends. Hayward.

Then commune how that day they best may ply
Their growing work. Milton, P. L.

Ideas, as ranked under names, are those that, for the most part, men reason of within themselves, and always those which they commune about with others. Locke.

COMMUNICABI'LITY.† n. s. [from communicable.] The quality of being communicable; capability to be imparted.

We must not look upon the divine nature as sterile, but rather acknowledge the fecundity and communicability of itself, upon which the creation of the world dependeth.
Pearson on the Creed, Art. ii.

COMMU'NICABLE.† adj. [old Fr. communicable.]

1. That may become the common possession of more than one: with to.

Sith eternal life is communicable unto all, it behoveth that the word of God be so likewise.
Hooker, v. § 20.

2. That may be recounted; that of which another may share the knowledge: with to.

Nor let thine own inventions hope
Things not reveal'd, which th' invisible king,
Only omniscient, hath suppress'd in night,
To none communicable in earth or heav'n.
Milton, P. L.

3. That may be imparted.

The happy place
Rather inflames thy torment, representing
Lost bliss, to thee no more communicable.
Milton, P. R.

4. Communicative; not selfish.

Bp. Morton, Episcopacy Asserted, p. 63.

COMMU'NICANT. n. s. [from communicate.] One who is present, as a worshipper, at the celebration of the Lord's Supper; one who participates of the blessed sacrament.

Communicants have ever used it; and we, by the form of the very utterance, do shew we use it as communicants. Hooker.

A constant frequenter of worship, and a never-failing monthly communicant. Atterbury, Serm.

To COMMU'NICATE.† v. a. [communico, Lat.]

1. To impart to others what is in our own power; to give to others as partakers; to confer a joint possession; to bestow.

Common benefits are to be communicated with all, but peculiar benefits with choice.
Bacon, Ess. 13.

Where God is worshipped, there he communicates his blessings and holy influences.
Bp. Taylor, Worthy Communicant.

Which of the Grecian chiefs consorts with thee?
But Diomede desires my company,
And still communicates his praise with me.
Dryden, Fables.

2. To reveal; to impart knowledge.

I learned diligently, and do communicate wisdom liberally: I do not hide her riches.
Wisd. vii. 13.

3. It had anciently the preposition with before the person, to whom communication either of benefit or knowledge was made.

Charles the hardy would communicate his secrets with none; and least of all, those secrets which troubled him most. Bacon.

He communicated those thoughts only with the lord Digby, the lord Colepeper, and the chancellor.
Clarendon, b. viii.

A journey of much adventure, which, to shew the strength of his privacy, had been before not communicated with any other. Wotton.

4. Now it has only to: Clarendon uses both with and to.

Let him, that is taught in the word, communicate unto him that teacheth. Gal. vi. 6.

His majesty frankly promised, that he could not, in any degree, communicate to any person the matter, before he had taken and communicated to them his own resolutions. Clarendon.

Those who speak in publick, are better heard when they discourse by a lively genius and ready memory, than when they read all they would communicate to their hearers. Watts.

5. To share with another; to participate.

To thousands that communicate our loss.
B. Jonson, Sejanus.

To COMMU'NICATE. v. n.

1. To partake of the blessed sacrament.

The primitive Christians communicated every day. Bp. Taylor.

2. To have something in common with another; as, the houses communicate, there is a passage between them common to both, by which either may be entered from the other.

The whole body is nothing but a system of such canals, which all communicate with one another, mediately or immediately. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

COMMUNICA'TION.† n. s. [old Fr. communication.]

1. The act of imparting benefits or knowledge.

Both together serve completely for the reception and communication of learned knowledge.
Holder, Elem. of Speech.

2. Common boundary or inlet; passage or means, by which from one place there is a way without interruption to another.

Addison on Italy.

The Euxine sea is conveniently situated for trade, by the communication it has both with Asia and Europe. Arbuthnot.

3. Interchange of knowledge; good intelligence between several persons.

Secrets may be carried so far, as to stop the communication necessary among all who have the management of affairs. Swift.

4. Conference; conversation.

Abner had communication with the elders of Israel, saying, ye sought for David in times past to be king over you: now then do it. 2 Sam. iii. 17.

The chief end of language, in communication, being to be understood, words serve not for that end, when any word does not excite in the hearers the same idea which it stands for in the mind of the speaker. Locke.

5. Participation of the blessed sacrament.

All by communicating of one, become, as to that communication, one.

Pearson on the Creed, Art. ix.

COMMU'NICATIVE.† adj. [old Fr. communicatif.] Inclined to make advantages common; liberal of benefits or knowledge; not close; not selfish.

We conceive them more than some envious and mercenary gardeners will thank us for; but they deserve not the name of that communicative and noble profession. Evelyn's Kalendar.

We have paid for our want of prudence, and determine for the future to be less communicative. Swift and Pope.

COMMU'NICATIVENESS.† n. s. [from communicative.] The quality of being communicative, of bestowing or imparting benefits or knowledge.

That which I am to blame in you, is, that your publick common meetings, which should be, as at the table of the Lord, to eat a church-meal, a common Christian feast, are indeed much otherwise, none of that communicativeness and charity among you, as is required in such.

Hammond on Acts, xi. 20.

He is not only the most communicative of all beings, but he will also communicate himself in such measures as entirely to satisfy; otherwise some degrees of communicativeness would be wanting. Norris.

COMMU'NICATORY.* adj. [from communicate.] Imparting knowledge.

Siricius, who is our companion, and fellow-labourer, with whom the whole world by mutual commerce of canonical and communicatory letters, agrees together with us in one common society.

Barrow, Discourse on the Unity of the Church.

COMMU'NION. n. s. [communio, Lat.]

1. Intercourse; fellowship; common possession; participation of something in common; interchange of transactions.

Consider, finally, the angels, as having with us that communion which the apostle to the Hebrews noteth: and in regard whereof angels have not disdained to profess themselves our fellow servants. Hooker, i. § 4.

We are not, by ourselves, sufficient to furnish ourselves with competent stores for such a life as our nature doth desire; therefore we are naturally induced to seek communion and fellowship with others. Hooker, i. § 10.

The Israelites had never any communion or affairs with the Ethiopians.

Ralegh, Hist. of the World.

Thou, so pleas'd,
Can'st raise thy creature to what height thou wilt
Of union, or communion, deify'd. Milton, P. L.

We maintain communion with God himself, and are made in the same degree partakers of the Divine natrue, Fiddes.

2. The common or publick celebration of the Lord's Supper; the participation of the blessed sacrament.

They resolved, that the standing of the communion table in all churches should be altered.

Clarendon.

Tertullian reporteth, that the picture of Christ was engraven upon the communion cup.

Peacham on Drawing.

3. A common or publick act.

Men began publickly to call on the name of the Lord; that is, they served and praised God by communion, and in publick manner.

Ralegh, Hist. of the World.

4. Union in the common worship of any church.

Bare communion with a good church, can never alone make a good man; if it could, we should have no bad ones. South.

Ingenuous men have lived and died in the communion of that church. Stillingfleet.

COMMU'NIONIST.* n. s. [from communion.] One who is of the same communion with others.

Most of the scrupulosities of the non-communionists may be resolved thereby.

Dury's Epist. Discourse, 1644, p. 41.

COMMU'NITY.† n. s. [old Fr. communité, from communitas, Lat.]

1. The commonwealth; the body politick.

How could communities,
Degrees in schools, and brotherhoods in cities,
But by degree, stand in authentick place?

Shakspeare, Troil. and Cressid.

Not in a single person only, but in a community or multitude of men. Hammond, Fundamentals.

This parable may be aptly enough expounded of the laws that secure a civil community.

L'Estrange.

It is not designed for her own use, but for the whole community. Addison, Guardian.

The love of our country is impressed on our mind, for the preservation of the community.

Addison, Freeholder.

He lives not for himself alone, but hath a regard in all his actions to the great community.

Atterbury.

2. Common possession; the state contrary to property or appropriation.

Sit up and revel,
Call all the great, the fair and spirited dames
Of Rome about thee, and begin a fashion
Of freedom and community. B. Jonson.

The undistinction of many in the community of name, or misapplication of the act of one unto the other, hath made some doubt thereof.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

This text is far from proving Adam sole proprietor, it is a confirmation of the original community of all things. Locke.

3. Frequency; commonness. Not in use.

He was but, as the cuckow is in June,
Heard, not regarded; seen, but with such eyes,
As, sick and blunted with community,
Afford no extraordinary gaze. Shakspeare.

COMMUTABI'LITY. n. s. [from commutable.] The quality of being capable of exchange.

COMMU'TABLE. adj. [from commute.] That may be exchanged for something else; that may be bought off, or ransomed.

COMMUTA'TION. n. s. [from commute.]

1. Change; alteration.

An innocent nature could hate nothing that was innocent: in a word, so great is the commutation, that the soul then hated only that which now only it loves, i. e. sin. South, Sermons.

2. Exchange; the act of giving one thing for another.

The whole universe is supported by giving and returning, by commerce and commutation.

South, Serm.

According to the present temper of mankind, it is absolutely necessary that there be some method and means of commutation, as that of money.

Ray on the Creation.

The use of money in the commerce and traffick of mankind, is that of saying the commutation of more bulky commodities. Arbuthnot on Coins.

3. Ransom: the act of exchanging a corporal for a pecuniary punishment.

The law of God had allowed an evasion, that is, by way of commutation or redemption.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

COMMU'TATIVE.† adj. [old Fr. commutatif.] Relative to exchange; as commutatif justice, that honesty which is exercised in traffick, and which is contrary to fraud in bargains.

Justice, although it be but one entire virtue, yet is described in two kinds — one, named justice distributive, which is in distribution of honour, money, benefice, or other thing semblable: the is other called commutative, or by exchaunge.

Sir T. Elyot, Gov. fol. 142.

Commutative justice requires that every man should have his own.

Bp. Hall, Cases of Conscience, i. 7.

The Essenes, like the Pythagoreans, did not buy or sell among themselves, but each supplied the other's wants by a commutative bartering.

Godwin's Moses and Aaron, i. 12.

COMMU'TATIVELY.* adv. [from commutative.] In the way of exchange.

Be not stoically mistaken in the quality of sins, nor commutatively iniquous in the valuation of transgressions. Brown, Christ. Mor. ii. 12.

To COMMU'TE.† v. a. [commuto, Lat.]

1. To exchange; to put one thing in the place of another; to give or receive one thing for another.

This smart was commuted for shame.

This will commute our tasks, exchange these pleasant and gainful ones, which God assigns, for those uneasy and fruitless ones we impose on ourselves. Decay of Piety.

2. To buy off, or ransom one obligation by another.

Some commute swearing for whoring; as if forbearance of the one were a dispensation for the other. L'Estrange.

To COMMU'TE. v. n. To atone; to bargain for exemption.

Those institutions which God designed for means to further men in holiness, they look upon as a privilege to serve instead of it, and to commute for it. South. Serm.

COMMU'TUAL. adj. [con. and mutual.] Mutual; reciprocal: used only in poetry.

Love our hearts, and Hymen did our hands,
Unite commutual in most sacred bands.

Shakspeare, Hamlet.

There, with commutual zeal, we both had strove
In acts of dear benevolence and love;
Brothers in peace, not rivals in command.

Pope, Odyssey.

CO'MPACT.† n. s. [pactum, Lat.]

1. A contract; an accord; an agreement; a mutual and settled appointment between two or more, to do or to forbear something. It had anciently the accent on the last syllable.

I hope the king made peace with all of us;
And the compact is firm and true in me.

Shakspeare, Rich. III.

In the beginnings of speech there was an implicit compact, founded upon common consent, that such words, voices, or gestures should be signs whereby they would express their thoughts. South.

2. Structure; compacture. Not in use.

He was of a mean or low compact, but without disproportion and unevenness either in lineaments or parts. Sir G. Buck, Hist. of K. Rich. III. p. 148.

To COMPA'CT. v. a. [compingo compactum, Lat.]

1. To join together with firmness; to unite closely; to consolidate.

Inform her full of my particular fears;
And thereto add such reasons of your own,
As may compact it more. Shakspeare, K. Lear.

Nor are the nerves of his compacted strength
Stretch'd and dissolv'd into unsinew'd length.
Denham.

By what degrees this earth's compacted sphere
Was harden'd, woods, and rocks, and towns to bear. Roscommon.

This disease is more dangerous as the solids are more strict and compacted, and consequently more so as people are advanced in age.
Arbuthnot on Diet.

Now the bright sun compacts the precious stone,
Imparting radiant lustre, like his own.
Blackmore's Creation.

2. To make out of something.

If he, compact of jars, grow musical,
We shall have shortly discord in the spheres.
Shakspeare.

3. To league with.

Thou pernicious woman,
Compact with her that's gone, think'st thou thy oaths,
Though they would swear down each particular fact,
Were testimonies. Shakspeare, Meas. for Meas.

4. To join together; to bring into a system.

We see the world so compacted, that each thing preserveth other things, and also itself.
Hooker, i. § 9.

COMPA'CT. adj. [compactus, Latin.]

1. Firm; solid; close; dense; of firm texture.

Is not the density greater in free and open spaces, void of air and other grosser bodies, than within the pores of water, glass, chrystal, gems, and other compact bodies. Newton, Opt.

Without attraction the dissevered particles of the chaos could never convene into such great compact masses as the planets. Bentley.

2. Composed; consisting.

The lunatick, the lover, and the poet,
Are of imagination all compact. Shakspeare.

A wandering fire,
Compact of unctuous vapour, which the night
Condenses, and the cold environs round,
Kindled through agitation to a flame.
Milton, P. L.

3. Joined; held together.

In one hand Pan has a pipe of seven reeds, compact with wax together. Peacham.

4. Brief, and well connected; as, a compact discourse.

Where a foreign tongue is elegant, expressive, close, and compact, we must study the utmost force of our language. Felton.

COMPA'CTEDLY.* adv. [from compacted.] Closely.

'Tis an abstract of all volumes,
A pillaster of all columnes
Fancy e're rear'd to Wit, to be
The smallest god's epitome,
And so compactedly express
All lovers pleasing wretchedness.
Lovelace, Luc. p. 80.

COMPA'CTEDNESS. n. s. [from compacted.] Firmness; density.

Sticking or compactedness, being natural to density, requires some excess of gravity in proportion to the density, or some other outward violence, to break it. Digby on Bodies.

Those atoms are supposed infrangible, extremely compacted and hard; which compactedness and hardness is a demonstration, that nothing could be produced by them. Cheyne.

COMPA'CTIBLE.* adj. [from compact.] That may be joined. Cockeram.

COMPA'CTLY. adv. [from compact.]

1. Closely; densely.

2. With neat joining; with good compacture.

COMPA'CTNESS. n. s. [from compact.] Firmness; closeness; density.

Irradiancy or sparkling found in many gems, is not discoverable in this, for it cometh short of their compactness and durity. Brown.

The best lime mortar will not have attained its utmost compactness, till four score years after it has been employed in building. This is one reason why in demolishing ancient fabrics, it is easier to break the stone than the mortar. Boyle.

The rest, by reason of the compactness of terrestrial matter, cannot make its way to wells.
Woodward.

COMPA'CTURE.† n. s. [old Fr. compacture.] Structure; manner in which any thing is joined together; compagination. A good word, but not in use.

And over it a fair portcullis hong,
Which to the gate directly did incline,
With comely compass and compacture strong,
Neither unseemly short, nor yet exceeding long.
Spenser, F. Q.

The first whereof, of nature's substance wrought,
Is trained moveable by art divine,
Stirring the whole compacture of the rest.
Brewer's Lingua, iii. 6.

COMPA'GES.† n. s. [Latin. Dr. Johnson has omitted to notice that this word has, in our language, the singular compage.] A system of many parts united.

The compage of all physical truth is not so closely jointed, but opposition may find intrusion.
Brown, Christ. Mor. ii. 3.

[In] the old Hebrew language, wherein the Scripture speaks, there is no one word to express the compages of the superiour and inferiour bodies, which we call mundus, but these two words, heaven and earth, joined to and put together.
Mede, Paraphr. and Expos. of St. Peter, (1642,) p. 11.

The organs in animal bodies are only a regular compages of pipes and vessels, for the fluids to pass through. Ray.

To COMPA'GINATE.* v. a. [Lat. compago, compaginis. Dr. Johnson gives compagination, but had not met with its parent verb.] To set together that which is broken. Cockeram.

The intire or broken compagination of the magnetical fabrick under it. Brown, Vulg. Err.

CO'MPANABLE. adj.* [old Fr. compagnable. This is our old adjective, and is found, so written, in our lexicography; but is unnoticed by Dr. Johnson, who, however, gives its derivative companableness.] Companionable.

A wife he had of excellent beautee,
And compaignable and revelous was she.
Chaucer, Shipm. Tale.

CO'MPANABLENESS. n. s. [from company.] The quality of being a good companion; sociableness. A word not now in use.

His eyes full of merry simplicity, his words of hearty companableness. Sidney, b. ii.

CO'MPANIABLE. adj. [from company.] Social; having the qualities of a companion; sociable, maintaining friendly intercourse.

Towards his queen he was nothing uxurious, but companiable and respective. Bacon, Hen. VII.

COMPA'NIABLENESS.* n. s. [from companiable.] Sociableness.

His retiredness was for prayer, his companiableness was for preaching. Bp. Hall, Contempl. B. 4.

COMPA'NION. n. s. [compagnon, French.]

1. One with whom a man frequently converses, or with whom he shares his hours of relaxation. It differs from friend, as acquaintance from confidence.

How now, my lord, why do you keep alone?
Of sorriest fancies your companions make?
Shakspeare, Macbeth.

Some friend is a companion at the table, and will not continue in the day of thy affliction.
Ecclus. vi. 10.

With anxious doubts, with raging passions torn,
No sweet companion near, with whom to mourn.
Prior.

2. A partner; an associate.

Epaphroditas, my brother and companion in labour, and fellow soldier. Phil. ii. 25.

Bereav'd of happiness thou may'st partake
His punishment, eternal misery;
Which would be all his solace and revenge,
Thee once to gain companion of his woe.
Milton, P.L.

3. A familiar term of contempt; a fellow.

I scorn you, scurvy companion! What? you poor, base, rascally, cheating, lack-linen mate: away you mouldy rogue, away. Shaks. Henry IV.

It gives boldness to every petty companion to spread rumours to my defamation, where I cannot be present. Ralegh, Essays.

COMPA'NIONABLE.† adj. [from companion.] Fit for good fellowship; social; agreeable.

His very words and looks — did so work upon the affections of his hearers, as melted and moulded them into a companionable sadness.
Walton, Life of Donne.

He had a more companionable wit, and swayed more among the good fellows. Clarendon, b. viii.

COMPA'NIONABLY.† adv. [from companionable.] In a companionable manner.

1. Company; train.

Alcibiades, and some twenty horse,
All of companionship. Shakspeare, Timon.

2. Fellowship; association.

If it be honour in your wars, to seem
The same you are not, which, for your best ends,
You call your policy; how is't less, or worse,
That it shall hold companionship in peace
With honour as in war. Shakspeare, Coriolanus.

CO'MPANY.† n. s. [compagnie, French; either from con and pagus, one of the same town; or con and panis, one that eats of the same mess. Dr. Johnson says. I prefer the derivation from the Latin, compago, abl. case compagine, a junction.]

1. Persons assembled together; a body of men.

Go, carry sir John Falstaff to the Fleet;
Take all his company along with him.
Shakspeare, Henry IV.

Honest company, I thank you all,
That have beheld me give away myself
To this most patient, sweet, and virtuous wife.
Shakspeare.

2. Persons assembled for the entertainment of each other; an assembly of pleasure.

A crowd is not company, and faces are but a gallery of pictures, where there is no love.
Bacon, Essay 28.

3. Persons considered as assembled for conversation; or as capable of conversation and mutual entertainment.

Monsieur Zulichem came to me among the rest of the good company of the town. Temple.

Knowledge of men and manners, the freedom of habitudes, and conversation with the best company of both sexes, is necessary. Dryden.

4. The state of a companion; the act of accompanying; conversation; fellowship.

It is more pleasant to enjoy the company of him that can speak such words, than by such words to be persuaded to follow solitariness. Sidney.

Nor will I wretched thee
In death forsake, but keep thee company.
Dryden, Fables.

Abdallah grew by degrees so enamoured of her conversation, that he did not think he lived when he was not in company with his beloved Balsora. Guardian, No. 167.

4. Qualified; fit; a competent judge is one who has a right of jurisdiction in the case.

Let us first consider how competent we are for the office. Government of the Tongue.

5. Consistent with; incident to.

That is the privilege of the Infinite Author of things, who never slumbers nor sleeps, but is not competent to any finite being. Locke.

CO'MPETENTLY. adv. [from competent.]

1. Adequately; properly.

I think it hath been competently proved. Bentley.

2. Reasonably; moderately; without superfluity or want.

Some places require men competently endowed; but none think the appointment to be a duty of justice bound to respect desert. Wotton.

COMPE'TIBLE.† adj. [from competo, Lat. For this word a corrupt orthography has introduced compatible, Dr. Johnson says. But see COMPATIBLE.] Suitable to; consistent with.

It is a great point of wisdom indeed, and mainly necessary, to know the true laws and bounds of human happiness, that the heat of melancholy drive not men up beyond what is competible to human nature, and the reach of all the faculties thereof. More, Conject. Cabb. (1653,) p. 171.

It is not competible with the grace of God so much as to incline any man to do evil. Hammond on Fundamentals.

Those are properties not at all competible to body or matter, though of never so pure a mixture. Glanville.

The duration of eternity a parte ante is such as is only competible to the eternal God, and not communicable to any created being. Sir M. Hale.

COMPE'TIBLENESS. n. s. [from competible.] Suitableness; fitness.

COMPETI'TION. n. s. [from con and petitio, Lat.]

1. The act of endeavouring to gain what another endeavours to gain at the same time; rivalry; contest.

The ancient flames of discord and intestine wars, upon the competition of both houses, would again return. Bacon, Henry VII.

A portrait, with which one of Titian's could not come in competition. Dryden, Dufresnoy.

Though what produces any degree of pleasure, be in itself good, and what is apt to produce any degree of pain be evil, yet often we do not call it so, when it comes in competition: the degrees also of pleasure and pain have a preference. Locke.

We should be ashamed to rival inferiours, and dishonour our nature by so degrading a competition. Rogers.

2. Double claim; claim of more than one to one thing: anciently with to.

Competition to the crown there is none, nor can be. Bacon.

3. Now with for.

The prize of beauty was disputed 'till you were seen; but now all pretenders have withdrawn their claims: there is no competition but for the second place. Dryden.

COMPE'TITOR.† n. s. [old Fr. competiteur, from con and petitor, Lat.]

1. One that has a claim opposite to another's; a rival; with for before the thing claimed.

How furious and impatient they be,
And cannot brook competitors in love.
Shakspeare. Tit. Andron.

Some undertake suits with purpose to let them fall, to gratify the competitor. Bacon, Ess. 50.

Cicereius and Scipio were competitors for the office of prætor. Tatler, No. 86.

He who trusts in God has the advantage in present felicity; and, when we take futurity into the account, stands alone, and is acknowledged to to have no competitor. Rogers, Serm. 19.

2. It had formerly of before the thing claimed.

Selymes, king of Algiers, was in arms against his brother Mechemetes, competitor of the kingdom. Knolles, Hist. of the Turks.

3. In Shakspeare it seems to signify only an opponent, Dr. Johnson says. The fact is, it means just the reverse in the passage cited by Dr. Johnson, and in several others occurring in Shakspeare; it is an associate.

The Guilfords are in arms,
And every hour more competitors
Flock to the rebels. Shaksp. Rich. III.

COMPE'TITORY.* adj. [from competitor.] In competition.

This work was written as a competitory treatise. Faber's Difficulties of Infidelity, Pref.

COMPE'TITRESS.* n. s. [from competitor.] She who is a rival.

The two famous flourishing Universities, Oxford and Cambridge; with whom the Grecian Athens itself was no fit competitress. Hieragonisticon, or Corah's Doom, (1672,) p. 136.

COMPE'TITRIX.* n. s. [Lat.] The same as competitress.

Queen Anne, being now without competitrix for her title, thought herself secure. Ld. Herbert, Hist. of Hen. VIII.

COMPILA'TION.† n. s. [old Fr. compilation, from compilo, Lat.]

1. A collection from various authors.

Among the ancient story-books of this character, a Latin compilation, entitled Gesta Romanorum, seems to have been the favourite. Warton, Hist of Eng. Poet. iii. Diss.

I was encouraged to essay how I could build a man; for there is a moral as well as a natural or artificial compilement, and of better materials. Wotton on Education.

COMPI'LER. n. s. [from compile.] A collector; one who frames a composition from various authors.

Some draw experiments into titles and tables; those we call compilers. Bacon, New Atalantis.

Some painful compiler, who will study old language, may inform the world that Robert earl of Oxford was high treasurer. Swift.

COMPLA'CENCE.† } n. s. [complacentia, low
COMPLA'CENCY. } Lat. Complacency, it may be added, was ranked by Heylin, in 1656, among unusual and uncouth words. Of this word in the plural number Dr. Johnson's examples afford no specimen. Bishop Pearson gives it.]

1. Pleasure; satisfaction; gratification.

I by conversing cannot these erect
From prone, nor in their ways complacence find. Milton, P. L.

Except we looked for an account hereafter, it were unreasonable to expect that any man should forsake his delights, renounce his complacencies, and by a severe repentance create a bitterness to his own soul. Pearson on the Creed, Art. 7.

When the supreme faculties move regularly, the inferiour affections following, there arises a serenity and complacency upon the whole soul. South.

Diseases extremely lessen the complacence we have in all the good things of this life. Atterbury, Sermons.

Others proclaim the infirmities of a great man with satisfaction and complacency, if they discover none of the like in themselves. Addison, Spect.

2. The cause of pleasure; joy.

O thou, in heav'n and earth the only peace
Found out for mankind under wrath! O thou,
My sole complacence! Milton, P. L.

3. Civility; complaisance; softness of manners.

They were not satisfied with their governour, and apprehensive of his rudeness and want of complacency. Clarendon.

Against my child. Shaksp. Mids. Night's Dream.

In evil strait this day I stand
Before my judge, either to undergo
Myself the total crime, or to accuse
My other self, the partner of my life;
Whose failing, while her faith to me remains,
I should conceal, and not expose to blame
By my complaint; but strict necessity
Subdues me, and calamitous constraint.
Milton, P. L.

Against the goddess these complaints he made.
Dryden, Æn.

COMPLA'INTFUL.* adj. Full of complaint. Not now in use. Huloet.

COMPLI'ER. n. s. [from comply.] One of an easy temper; one of ready compliance.

Suppose a hundred new employments were erected on purpose to gratify compliers, an insupportable difficulty would remain. Swift.

CO'MPLIMENT.† n. s. [compliment, Fr.] An act, or expression of civility, usually understood to include some hypocrisy, and to mean less than it declares: this is properly complement, something superfluous, or more than enough, Dr. Johnson says; and the word indeed is complement in old authors, and even in Milton, from whom he has cited examples, but writes it compliment in conformity to modern usage. The same may be said of complimental. See COMPLEMENTAL.]

He observed few compliments in matter of arms, but such as proud anger did indite to him. Sidney, b. ii.

My servant, sir? 'Twas never merry world
Since lowly feigning was called compliment:
Y' are servant to the duke Orsino, youth. Shaks.

One whom the musick of his own vain tongue
Doth ravish, like inchanting harmony:
A man of compliments, whom right and wrong
Have chose as umpire of their meeting. Shaks.

What honour that,
But tedious waste of time, to sit and hear
So many hollow compliments and lies,
Outlandish flatteries? Milton, P. R.

Virtue, religion, heaven, and eternal happiness, are not trifles to be given up in a compliment, or sacrificed to a jest. Rogers.

To CO'MPLIMENT. v. a. [from the noun.] To sooth with acts or expressions of respect; to flatter; to praise.

It was not to compliment a society, so much above flattery and the regardless air of common applauses. Glanville.

Monarchs should their inward soul disguise,
Dissemble and command, be false and wise;
By ignominious arts, for servile ends,
Should compliment their foes, and shun their friends. Prior.

The watchman gave so very great a thump at my door, that I awaked, and heard myself complimented with the usual salutation. Tatler, No. 111.

To CO'MPLIMENT,† v. n. To use ceremonious or adulatory language.

Sometimes five imprimaturs are seen together dialogue-wise in the piatza of one titlepage, complimenting and ducking each to other with their shaven reverences. Milton, Areopagitica.

Seems fair awhile, cherish'd with foster earth;
But when the alien compost is exhaust,
Its native poverty again prevails. Philips.
2. Any mixture or composition.
Finding the most pleasurable sin such a sad γλυκύπικρον, a compost of more bitter than sweet at the very instant, we should never be such blind obedient votaries of Satan.
Hammond, Works, iv. 534.

To COMPO'ST.† v. a. [from the noun.] To manure; to enrich with soil.
By removing into worse earth, or forbearing to compost the earth, water-mint turneth into field-mint and the colewort into rape.
Bacon, Nat. Hist.
As for earth, it composteth itself; for I knew a garden that had a field poured upon it, and it did bear fruit excellently. Bacon, Nat. Hist.
How many fields have been drenched with blood, and composted with carcases!
Bp. Hall, Serm. 1641.

COMPO'STURE.† n. s. [old Fr. composture.] Soil; manure. Not used.
The earth's a thief,
That feeds and breeds by a composture stolen
From general excrement. Shakspeare, Timon.

COMPO'SURE.† n. s. [from compose.]
1. The act of composing or inditing.
Their own forms are not like to be so sound, or comprehensive of the nature of the duty, as of forms of public composure. King Charles.
2. Arrangement; combination; mixture; order.
Hence languages arise, when, by institution and agreement, such a composure of letters, such a word, is intended to signify such a certain thing.
Holder, El. of Speech.
From the various composures and combinations of these corpuscles together, happen all the varieties of the bodies formed out of them.
Woodward, Nat. Hist.
3. The form arising from the disposition of the various parts.
In composure of his face,
Liv'd a fair, but manly grace. Crashaw.
4. Frame; make; temperament.
To reel the streets at noon, and stand the buffet
With slaves that smell of sweat; say this becomes him:
As his composure must be rare indeed,
Whom these things cannot blemish.
Shakspeare, Ant. and Cleop.
The Duke of Buckingham sprung, without any help, by a kind of congenial composure, to the likeness of our late sovereign and master. Wotton.

3. Adjustment.

God will rather look to the inward raptures of the mind than to the outward form and composure of the body. Duppa.

6. Composition; framed discourse. See COMPOSITION. This is of older usage, by at least the difference of a century, than Atterbury's; the first of Dr. Johnson's examples.

The labour'd and understanding workes of Maister Johnson; the no lesse worthy composures of the both worthily excellent Maister Beaumont and Maister Fletcher.

Webster, Pref. to the Wh. Devil, 1612.

As I then sate on this very grass, I turned my present thoughts into verse: 'tis a wish which I will repeat to you:

I in these flowery meads, &c.

When I had ended this composure, I left this place. Walton's Angler.

Discourses on such occasions are seldom the productions of leisure, and should be read with those favourable allowances that are made to hasty composures. Atterbury.

In the composures of men, remember you are a man as well as they; and it is not their reason, but your own, that is given to guide you.

Watts on the Mind.

7. Sedateness; calmness; tranquillity.

To whom the virgin majesty of Eve,
As one who loves and some unkindness meets,
With sweet austere composure thus reply'd.

Milton, P.L.

The calmest and serenest hours of life, when the passions of nature are all silent, and the mind enjoys its most perfect composure. Watts, Logick.

8. Agreement; composition; settlement of differences.

The treaty at Uxbridge gave the fairest hopes of an happy composure. King Charles.

Vanguard! to right and left the front unfold,
That all may see, who hate us, how we seek Peace and composure. Milton, P. L.

Things were not brought to an extremity: there seems yet to be room left for a composure; hereafter there may be only for pity. Dryden.

COMPOTA'TION. n.s. [compotatio, Lat.] The act of drinking or tippling together.

By desiring a secrecy to words spoke under the rose, we only mean in society compotation, from the ancient custom of symposiack meetings to wear chaplets of roses about their heads.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

If thou wilt prolong
Dire compotation, forthwith reason quits
Her empire to confusion and misrule,
And vain debates; then twenty tongues at once
Conspire in senseless jargon; nought is heard
But din and various clamour, and mad rant.

Philips.

CO'MPOTATOR.* n.s. [from the Lat. compoto.] One who drinks together with another.

I shall yet think it a diminution to my happiness, to miss of half our companions and compotators of syllabub, &c. Pope, Lett. to Mr. Knight.

To COMPO'UND.† v.a. [compono, Lat.]

1. To mingle many ingredients together in one mass.

Only compound me with forgotten dust.

Shakspeare, K. Hen. IV. P. II.

2. To form by uniting various parts.

Whosoever compoundeth any like it, shall be cut off. Exodus, xxx.

It will be difficult to evince, that nature does not make decompounded bodies; I mean, mingle together such bodies as are already compounded of elementary, or rather of simple ones.

Boyle, Sceptical Chymist.

The ideas, being each but one single perception, are easier got than the more complex ones; and therefore are not liable to the uncertainty which attends those compounded ones. Locke.

3. To mingle in different positions; to combine:

We cannot have a single image that did not enter through the sight; but we have the power of altering and compounding those images into all the varieties of picture. Addison, Spect.

4. [In grammar.] To form one word from two or more words.

Where it and Tigris embrace each other under the city of Apamia, there do they agree of a joint and compounded name, and are called Piso-Tigris. Ralegh, Hist. of the World.

5. To compose by being united.

Who'd be so mock'd with glory, as to live
But in a dream of friendship?
To have his pomp, and all what state compounds,
But only painted, like his varnish'd friends.

Shakpeare, Timon.

6. To adjust a difference by some recession from the rigour of claims.

I would to God all strifes were well compounded. Shakspeare.

If there be any discord or suits between any of the family, they are compounded and appeased. Bacon, New Atlantis.

7. To discharge a debt by paying only part.

Shall I, ye gods, he cries, my debts compound? Gay.

To COMPO'UND. v.n.

1. To come to terms of agreement by abating something of the first demand. It has for before the thing accepted or remitted.

They were, at last, glad to compound for his bare commitment to the Tower. Clarendon.

Pray but for half the virtues of his wife;
Compound for all the rest with longer life. Dryd.

2. To bargain in the lump.

Here's a fellow will help you to-morrow: compound with him by the year.

Shaks. Meas. for Meas.

3. To come to terms by granting something on each side.

Cornwal compounded to furnish ten oxen after Michaelmas for thirty pounds.

Carew, Surv. of Cornwall.

Once more I come to know of thee, king Harry,
If for thy ransom thou wilt now compound,
Before thy most assured overthrow?

Shakspeare, Hen. V.

Made all the royal stars recant,
Compound and take the covenant. Hudibras.

But useless all, when he, despairing, found
Catullus then did with the winds compound.

Dryden, Juv.

Paracelsus and his admirers have compounded with the Galenists, and brought a mixed use of chemical medicines into the present practice. Temple.

4. To determine. This is not in use.

We here deliver,
Subscribed by the consuls and patricians,
Together with the seal o'the senate, what
We have compounded on. Shakspeare, Coriol.

CO'MPOUND. adj. [from the verb.]

1. Formed out of many ingredients; not simple.

The ancient electrum had in it a fifth of silver to the gold, and made a compound metal, as fit for most uses as gold. Bacon.

Compound substances are made up of two or more simple substances. Watts, Logick.

2. [In grammar.] Composed of two or more words; not simple.

Those who are his greatest admirers, seem pleased with them as beauties; I speak of his compound epithets. Pope.

3. COMPOUND or aggregated Flower, in botany, is such as consists of many little flowers concurring together to make up one whole one; each of which has its style and stamina, and adhering seed, and are all contained within one and the same calyx; such are the sunflower and dandelion. Harris.

CO'MPOUND. n.s. [from the verb.] The mass formed by the union of many ingredients.

For present use or profit, this is the rule: consider the price of the two simple bodies: consider again the dignity of the one above the other in use; then see if you can make a compound, that will save more in price than it will lose in dignity of the use. Bacon, Physical Rem.

As man is a compound and mixture of flesh, as well as spirit. South, Serm.

Love, why do we one passion call?
When 'tis a compound of them all;
Where hot and cold, where sharp and sweet,
In all their equipages meet. Swift.

COMPO'UNDABLE.† adj. [from compound.] Capable of being compounded.

Sherwood.

COMPO'UNDER.† n.s. [from To compound.]

1. One who endeavours to bring parties to terms of agreement.

They held it to be the best course to let him alone, yea, and be compounders of peace and amity between Sancho and the barber.

Shelton, D. Quix. iv. 19.

Those softeners, sweeteners, compounders, and expedient-mongers, who shake their heads so strongly. Swift.

2. A mingler; one who mixes bodies.

3. An academical term for one who, having any estate or income for life of a certain value, pays extraordinary fees for the degree which he takes; and, according to the value, is either a grand or a petty compounder.

COMPRECA'TION.* n.s. [Lat. comprecatio.] Supplication; public prayer.

A comprecation both the Grecians and we do allow; an ultimate invocation both the Grecians and we detest.

Bp. Bramhall, Schism Guarded, &c. 1658, p. 463.

Next to deprecation against evil may succeed comprecation for that which is good.

Bp. Wilkins, Discourse on Prayer, ch. 17.

To COMPREHE'ND.† v.a. [comprehendo, Lat.]

1. To comprise; to include; to contain; to imply.

If there be any other commandment, it is briefly comprehended in this saying, namely, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. Rom. xiii. 9.

It would be ridiculous to grow old in the study of every necessary thing, in an art which comprehends so many several parts. Dryden, Dufresnoy.

2. To contain in the mind; to understand; to conceive.

The light shineth in darkness; and the darkness comprehendeth it not. St. John, i. 5.

Rome was not better by her Horace taught,
Than we are here to comprehend his thought.

Walker.

'Tis unjust, that they who have not the least notion of heroick writing, should therefore condemn the pleasure which others receive from it, because they cannot comprehend it. Dryden.

COMPREHE'NSIBLE. adj. [comprehensible, Fr. comprehensibilis, Latin.]

1. Intelligible; attainable by the mind; conceivable by the understanding.

The horizon sets the bounds between the enlightened and dark parts of things, between what is and what is not comprehensible by us. Locke.

2. Possible to be comprised.

Lest this part of knowledge should seem to any not comprehensible by axiom, we will set down some heads of it. Bacon.

COMPREHE'NSIBLENESS.* n. s. [from comprehensible.] Capability of being understood.

Which facility and comprehensibleness must needs improve the usefulness of these expositions very considerably.

More, Expos. of the Seven Churches, Pref.

COMPREHE'NSIBLY.† adv. [from comprehensible.] With great power of signification or understanding; significantly; with great extent of sense. Tillotson seems to have used comprehensibly for comprehensively.

The words wisdom and righteousness are commonly used very comprehensibly, so as to signify all religion and virtue. Tillotson.

COMPREHE'NSION. n. s. [comprehensio, Latin.]

1. The act or quality of comprising or containing; inclusion.

In the Old Testament there is a close comprehension of the New, in the New an open discovery of the Old. Hooker.

The comprehension of an idea regards all essential modes and properties of it; so body, in its comprehension, takes in solidity, figure, quantity, mobility. Watts, Logick.

2. Summary; epitome; compendium; abstract; abridgement in which much is comprised.

If we would draw a short abstract of human happiness, bring together all the various ingredients of it, and digest them into one prescription, we must at last fix on this wise and religious aphorism in my text, as the sum and comprehension of all. Rogers.

3. Knowledge; capacity; power of the mind to admit and contain many ideas at once.

You give no proof of decay of your judgment, and comprehension of all things, within the compass of an human understanding. Dryden.

4. [In rhetorick.] A trope or figure, by which the name of a whole is put for a part, or that of a part for the whole, or a definite number for an indefinite. Harris.

COMPREHE'NSIVE. adj. [from comprehend.]

1. Having the power to comprehend or understand many things at once.

He must have been a man of a most wonderful comprehensive nature, because he has taken into the compass of his Canterbury tales the various manners and humours of the whole English nation in his age; not a single character has escaped him. Dryden, Fab. Pref.

His hand unstain'd, his uncorrupted heart,
His comprehensive head; all int'rests weigh'd,
All Europe sav'd, yet Britain not betray'd.
Pope, Epist.

2. Having the quality of comprising much; compendious; extensive.

So diffusive, so comprehensive, so catholick a grace is charity, that whatever time is the opportunity of any other virtue, that time is the opportunity of charity. Sprat's Serm.

COMPREHE'NSIVELY. adv. [from comprehensive.] In a comprehensive manner.

COMPREHE'NSIVENESS.† n. s. [from comprehensive.]

COMPRESSIBI'LITY. n. s. [from compressible.] The quality of being compressible; the quality of admitting to be brought by force into a narrower compass; as air may be compressed, but water can by no violence be reduced to less space than it naturally occupies.

COMPRESSI'BLE. adj. [from compress.] Capable of being forced into a narrower compass; yielding to pressure, so as that one part is brought nearer to another.

There being spiral particles, accounts for the elasticity of air: there being spherical particles, which gives free passage to any heterogeneous matter, accounts for air's being compressible. Cheyne, Phil. Prin.

COMPRESSI'BLENESS. n. s. [from compressible.] Capability of being pressed close. Dict.

COMPRE'SSION. n. s. [compressio, Lat.] The act of bringing the parts of any body more near to each other by violence; the quality of admitting such an effort of force as may compel the body compressed into a narrower space.

Whensoever a solid body is pressed, there is an inward tumult in the parts, seeking to deliver themselves from the compression; and this is the cause of all violent motion. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

The powder in shot, being dilated into such a flame as endureth not compression, moveth in round, the flame being in the nature of a liquid body, sometimes recoiling. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

Tears are the effects of the compression of the moisture of the brain, upon dilatation of the spirits. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

Merry Michael the Cornish poet piped this upon his oaten pipe for merry England, but with a mocking compression for Normandy. Camden's Remains.

He that shall find out an hypothesis, by which water may be so rare, and yet not be capable of compression by force, may doubtless, by the same hypothesis, make gold and water, and all other bodies, as much rarer as he pleases; so that light may find a ready passage through transparent substances. Newton.

COMPRE'SSIVE.* adj. [from compress.] Having the power to compress.

This pitcher also hath its ear, which is usually called, Auricula Cordis; which (notwithstanding its name, as if it most properly appertained to the heart,) yet we must know doth rather belong to the vein, and is indeed a part thereof, and not only a part, but the principal and primary part thereof, from whence all other parts and branches do arise, as from their original; and whereunto all the blood of the body by the compressive motion of the veins, doth naturally tend, as to its ultimate hold. Smith's Portraiture of Old Age, p. 236.

COMPRE'SSURE. n. s. [from compress.] The act or force of one body pressing against another.

We tried whether heat would, notwithstanding so forcible a compressure, dilate it. Boyle, Spring of the Air.

CO'MPRIEST.* n. s. [from con and priest.] A fellow-priest.

What will he then praise them for? not for any thing doing, but for deferring to do, for deferring to chastise his lewd and insolent compriests. Milton, Apol. for Smectymnuus.

To COMPRI'NT. v. n. [comprimere, Lat.] To print together; it is commonly taken, in law, for the deceitful printing of another's copy or book, to the prejudice of the rightful proprietor. Philips's World of Words.

COMPRI'SAL.* n. s. [from comprise.] The inclusion, the comprehending of things.

Slandering is a complication, a comprisal and sum of all wickedness. Barrow, Serm. i. 254.

To COMPRI'SE. v. a. [comprendre, compris, Fr.] To contain; to comprehend; to include.

Necessity of shortness causeth men to cut off impertinent discourses, and to comprise much matter in few words. Hooker, v. § 32.

Do they not, under doctrine, comprehend the same that we intend by matters of faith? Do not they, under discipline, comprise the regimen of the church. Hooker, iii. § 3.

'Tis the polluted love that multiplies;
But friendship does two souls in one comprise.
Roscommon.

To CO'MPROBATE.* v. n. [Lat. comprobo.] To agree with; to concur in testimony.

For as well that sentence, as all other before rehearsed, do comprobate with Holye Scripture, that God is the fountaine of sapience. Sir T. Elyot Gov. fol. 199.

Sir G. Buck, Hist. of King Rich. III. p. 59.

COMPROMISE.† n. s. [old Fr. compromis; Lat. compromissum.]

1. Compromise is a mutual promise of two or more parties at difference, to refer the ending of their controversies to the arbitrement or equity of one or more arbitrators. Cowel.

Either the parties are persuaded by friends, or by their lawyers, to put the matter in comprymise.
Knight's Tryall of Truth, (1580,) fol. 30.

2. A compact or bargain, in which some concessions are made on each side.

Wars have not wasted it; for warr'd he hath not;
But basely yielded, upon compromise,
That which his ancestors atchiev'd with blows.
Shakspeare, Rich. II.

To Co'MPROMISE.† v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To compound; to adjust a compact by mutual concessions: as, they compromised the affair at a middle rate.

Perhaps it may be no great difficulty to compromise the dispute. Shenstone.

2. In Shakspeare it means, unusually, to accord; to agree.

Laban and himself were compromis'd,
That all the yearlings, which were streak'd and pied,
Should fall as Jacob's hire.
Shakspeare, Merch. of Venice.

To Co'MPROMISE.* v. n. To agree; to accord.

Any one may be convinced, that no formed church in the Christian world is more truly protestant than is the church of England; nor any which (all things compared) less compromiseth with Rome.
Puller, Moderat. of the Ch. of Eng. p. 458.

Co'MPROMISER.* n. s. [from compromise.] One who makes concession.

COMPROMISSO'RIAL.† adj. [old Fr. compromissaire.] Relating to a compromise.

He was privileged from his childhood from suspicion of incontinency, and needed no compurgation.

Hackett's Life of Abp. Williams, P. II. p. 35.

COMPURGA'TOR.† n. s. [Latin.] One who bears his testimony to the credibility of another.

If the lady Paula's memory wanted a compurgator, I would be one myself; it being improbable that those her eyes would burn with lust, which were constantly drowned with tears.

Fuller's Holy State, p. 26.

Lord Russel defended himself by many compurgators, who spoke very fully of his great worth.

Burnet, Hist. of his Own Time, 1683.

To make his innocence and his virtue his compurgators, and not to fight, but live down, the calumniator. South, Sermons, vi. 97.

The next quarry, or chalk-pit, will give abundant attestation; these are so obvious, that I need not be far to seek for a compurgator.

Woodward, Nat. Hist.

COMPU'TABLE. adj. [from compute.] Capable of being numbered or computed.

If, instead of twenty-four letters, there were twenty-four millions, as those twenty-four millions are a finite number; so would all combinations thereof be finite, though not easily computable by arithmetick. Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

To CO'MPUTATE.* v. a. [Lat. computo. This should seem to be the regular verb, from which computation is formed.] To account; to reckon.

Cockeram.

COMPUTA'TION. n. s. [from compute.]

1. The act of reckoning; calculation.

My princely father
Then, by just computation of the time,
Found that the issue was not his. Shaks. Rich. III.

2. The sum collected or settled by calculation.

We pass for women of fifty: many additional years are thrown into female computations of this nature. Addison, Guardian.

To COMPU'TE. v. a. [computo, Latin.] To reckon; to calculate; to number; to count.

Compute how much water would be requisite to lay the earth under water.

Burnet, Theory of the Earth.

Where they did compute by weeks, yet still the year was measured by months. Holder on Time.

Alas! not dazzled with their noon-tide ray,
Compute the morn and ev'ning to the day;
The whole amount of that enormous fame,
A tale that blends their glory with their shame.

Pope.

COMPU'TE. n. s. [computus, Lat.] Computation; calculation.

Though there were a fatality in this year, yet divers were out in their account, aberring several ways from the true and just compute; and calling that one year which perhaps might be another.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

COMPU'TER. n. s. [from compute.] Reckoner; accountant; calculator.

The kalendars of these computers, and the accounts of these days, are different.

Brown, Vulg. Err.

I have known some such ill computers, as to imagine the many millions in stocks so much real wealth. Swift.

CO'MPUTIST. n. s. [computiste, Fr.] Calculator; one skilled in the art of numbers or computation.

The treasurer was a wise man, and a strict computist. Wotton.

We conceive we have a year in three hundred and sixty-five days exact: computists tell us, that we escape six hours. Brown.

CO'MRADE.† n. s. [camerade, Fr. camerata, Ital. from camera, a chamber, one that lodges in the same chamber, qui contubernio fruitur. Formerly written by us camerade; as in Sir T. Herbert's Travels, p. 149. The accent on this word was formerly on either syllable. In the examples, that from Shakspeare presents it on the first; that from Milton on the last.]

1. One who dwells in the same house or chamber.

Rather I abjure all roofs, and chuse
To be a comrade with the wolf and owl.

Shakspeare, K. Lear.

2. A companion; a partner in any labour or danger.

He permitted them
To put out both thine eyes, and fetter'd send thee
Into the common prison, there to grind
Among the slaves and asses, thy comrades,
As good for nothing else. Milton, S. A.

A footman, being newly married, desired his comrade to tell him freely what the town said of it. Swift.

CO'MROGUE.* n. s. [from con and rogue.] A fellow-rogue; an associate in villainy.

Here will be a masque, and shall be a masque, when you and the rest of your comrogues shall sit disguis'd in the stocks. B. Jonson, Masques.

You may seek them
In Bridewell, or the hole; here are none of your comrogues. Massinger, Cit. Madam.

CON.† A Latin inseparable preposition, which, at the beginning of words, signifies union or association: as concourse, a running together; to convene, to come together. Dr. Johnson has omitted to notice, that con, in compound words, is by many writers converted into co. Thus some write cotemporary, where others use contemporary; cogenial, instead of congenial; and the like. The variations of spellings, however, are now often noticed in words, which have been given without any attention to such distinction.

CON.† [abbreviated from contra, against, Lat.] A cant word for the negative side of a question; as the pros and cons.

We may enquire and judge — what may be said pro and con. James on the Corrupt. of Script. (1688,) p. 526.

Of many knotty points they spoke,
And pro and con by turns they took. Prior, Alma.

To CON.† v. a. [connan, Sax. to know; as in Chaucer, "Old wymen connen mochil thinge;" that is, Old women have much knowledge. "To conne, or have connynge, scio." Prompt. Parv.]

1. To know.

Of muses, Hobinol, I conne no skill: —
But pyping low in shade of lowly grove,
I play to please myselfe, all be it ill.

Spenser, Shep. Cal. June.

They say they con to heaven the high way.

Spenser, Shep. Cal. Sept.

2. To study; to commit to memory; to fix in the mind. It is a word now little in use, except in ludicrous language.

Pretty answers: have you not been acquainted with goldsmiths wives, and conn'd them out of rings. Shakspeare.

Here are your parts; and I am to intreat you to con them by to-morrow night.

Shakspeare, Mids. N. Dream.

Our understanding cannot in this body arrive so clearly to the knowledge of God, and things invisible, as by orderly conning over the visible and inferiour creatures. Milton.

Shew it him written; and, having the other also written in the paper, shew him that, after he has conn'd the first, and require it of him.

Holder, Elem. of Speech.

The books of which I'm chiefly fond,
Are such as you have whilom conn'd. Prior.

All this while John had conn'd over such a catalogue of hard words, as were enough to conjure up the devil. Arbuthnot.

3. To CON thanks; an old expression for to thank. It is the same with sçavoir gré.

I con him no thanks for't, in the nature he delivers it. Shakspeare.

To CONCA'MERATE. v. a. [concamero, Lat.] To arch over; to vault; to lay concave over.

Of the upper beak, an inch and a half consisteth of one concamerated bone, bended downwards, and toothed as the other. Grew, Museum.

CONCAMERA'TION.† n. s. [from concamerate.] Arch; vault.

The insides of these hot-houses are divided into many cells and concamerations.

Sir T. Herbert, Trav. p. 164.

What a romance is the story of those impossible concamerations, and feigned rotations of solid orbs. Glanville, Sceps.

Gervasius Dorobernensis, in his account of the burning of Canterbury cathedral in the year 1174, says, that not only the beam-work was destroyed, but the ceiling underneath it, or concameration called cœlum, being of wood, beautifully painted, was also consumed. Warton, H. E. P. i. 303.

To CONCA'TENATE.† v. a. [from catena, Lat. a chain, Dr. Johnson says; who also cites no example of this old English verb. Cotgrave and Sherwood write it to concathenate, and give the old Fr. concathener. "The elements be so concatenate," however, is the form in an ancient poem in Ashmole's Theatrum Chemicum, 1652.] To link together; to unite in a successive order.

Nature has concatenated our fortunes and affections together with indissoluble bands of mutual sympathy. Barrow, Serm. ii. S. 2.

Both can only be referable to that concatenated order of events, which cannot but be best.

Harris, Three Treatises, P. II.

If Chapman affected the reputation of rendering line for line, the specious expedient of chusing a protracted measure which concatenated two lines together, undoubtedly favoured his usual propensity to periphrasis.

Warton, Hist. of Eng. Poetry, iii. 444.

CONCATENA'TION.† n. s. [from concatenate, and old Fr. concathenation.] A series of links; an uninterrupted, unvariable succession.

Seek the consonancy and concatenation of truth.

B. Jonson, Discoveries.

In this concatenation of causes, there is a progress ordinary from the first to the last.

Mountagu, App. to Cæs. (1625,) p. 104.

Meanes are not meanes, but in their concatenation, as they depend, and are chained together.

Donne, Devo. p. 497.

His quickness or volubility proceeds partly from that concatenation he useth among his syllables, by linking the syllable of the precedent word with the last of the following.

Howell, Lett. iv. 19.

The stoics affirmed a fatal, unchangeable concatenation of causes, reaching even to the elicit acts of man's will. South, Serm. ii. 262.

CONCAVA'TION. n. s. [from concave.] The act of making concave.

CO'NCAVE. adj. [concavus, Latin.]

1. Hollow with angles; as the inner surface of an eggshell, the inner curve of an arch: opposed to convex.

These great fragments falling hollow, inclosed under their concave surface a great deal of air. Burnet, Theory of the Earth.

2. Hollow.

Have you not made an universal shout,
That Tiber trembled underneath his banks,
To hear the replication of your sounds
Made in his concave shores. Shaksp. Julius Cæsar.

For his verity in love, I do think him as concave as a covered goblet, or a worm-eaten nut. Shakspeare, As you like it.

CO'NCAVE.* n. s. [from the adjective.] An hollow; a cavity.

His wit the most exuberant of all that ever entered the concave of this ear. B. Jonson, Every Man out of his Humour.

At which the universal host sent up
A shout, that tore hell's concave. Milton, P. L.

To CO'NCAVE.* v. a. [The old French language has concavé, hollowed, made concave. Cotgrave.] To make hollow.

Into that western bay concaved by vast mountains, western winds only can blow. Seward's Leti. iv. 118.

CO'NCAVENESS. n. s. [from concave.] Hollowness. Dict.

CONCA'VITY.† n. s. [old Fr. concavité.] Internal surface of a hollow spherical or spheroidical body.

Niches that contain figures of white marble should not be coloured in their concavity too black. Wotton.

They have taken the impresses of these shells with that exquisite niceness, that no metal, when melted and cast in a mould, can ever possibly represent the concavity of that mould with greater exactness than these flints do the concavities of the shells, wherein they were moulded. Woodward, Nat. Hist.

CO'NCAVO-CONCAVE. adj. Concave or hollow on both sides.

CO'NCAVO-CONVEX. adj. [from concave and convex.] Concave one way, and convex the other.

I procured another concavo-convex plate of glass, ground on both sides to the same sphere with the former plate. Newton.

A concavo-convex pentangular plate, part of a shell that belongs to the entrochus. Woodward on Fossils.

CO'NCAVOUS.† adj. [concavus, Lat.] Concave; hollow without angles.

This, as so much leaf-gold, drawn out to a very great thinness, doth securely, tenderly, and universally wrap up all those little hills and valleys, those convex or concavous parts, that are within the compass of its own circumference. Smith's Portraiture of old Age, p. 221.

The concavous part of the liver was called ἑσίας, i. e. belonging to the family, because the signs observed there concerned themselves and their friends. Potter, Antiq. of Greece, i. ch. 14.

CO'NCAVOUSLY. adv. [from concavous.] With hollowness; in such a manner as discovers the internal surface of a hollow sphere.

The dolphin that carrieth Arion is concavously inverted, and hath its spine depressed. Brown, Vulg. Err.

CO'NCAUSE.* n. s. [from con and cause.] Joint cause.

The power of all these he ascribes unto the Efficient, making it in effect the only true cause of all the rest; and all the rest to be rather as instruments unto it, than concauses with it. Fotherby, Atheom. p. 223.

To CONCE'AL. v. a. [concelo, Latin.] To hide; to keep secret; not to divulge; to cover; not to detect.

He oft' finds med'cine, who his grief imparts;
But double griefs afflict concealing hearts. Spenser, F. Q.

Come, Catesby, thou art sworn
As deeply to effect what we intend,
As closely to conceal what we impart. Shakspeare, Rich. III.

Ulysses himself adds, he was the most eloquent and the most silent of men: he knew that a word spoke never wrought so much good as a word concealed. Broome.

There is but one way I know of conversing safely with all men, that is, not by concealing what we say or do, but by saying or doing nothing that deserves to be concealed. Pope.

CONCE'ALABLE. adj. [from conceal.] Capable of being concealed; possible to be kept secret, or hid.

Returning a lye unto his Maker, and presuming to put off the searcher of hearts, he denied the omnisciency of God, whereunto there is nothing concealable. Brown, Vulg. Err.

CONCE'ALEDLY.* adv. [from conceal.] So as to be not detected.

Disguises and windings, by which worldly lusts and interests slily creep in, and concealedly work in their hearts. Bp. Ganden's Hieraspistes, p. 379.

CONCE'ALEDNESS. n. s. [from conceal.] The state of being concealed; privacy; obscurity. Dict.

CONCE'ALER.† n. s. [from conceal.] One that conceals any thing.

The lords made themselves culpable as concealers. Sir W. Ashton, (1624,) Sup. to Cabala, p. 153.

The notice of treason, if too long smothered, draws the concealer into danger. Bp. Hall, Cases of Consc. Add.

They were to undergo the penalty of forgery; and the concealer of the crime was equally guilty. Clarendon.

CONCE'ALING.* n. s. [from the verb.] A hiding, or keeping close. Barret.

All ingenuous concealings, or amendings, of what is originally or casually amiss, or seems so, in our bodies and outsides. Bp. Taylor, Artif. Hands. p. 163.

CONCE'ALMENT. n. s. [from conceal.]

1. The act of hiding; secrecy.

She never told her love;
But let concealment, like a worm i'the bud,
Feed on her damask cheek. Shaksp. Twelfth N.

He is a worthy gentleman,
Exceedingly well read and profited
In strange concealments. Shaksp. Hen. IV. P. I.

Few own such sentiments, yet this concealment derives rather from the fear of man than of any Being above. Glanville.

2. The state of being hid; privacy; delitescence.

A person of great abilities is zealous for the good of mankind, and as solicitous for the concealment as the performance of illustrious actions. Addison, Freeholder.

3. Hiding place; retreat; cover; shelter.

The choice of this holy name, as the most effectual concealment of a wicked design, supposes mankind satisfied that nothing but what is jest is directed by the principles of it. Rogers.

The cleft tree
Offers its kind concealment to a few;
Their food its insects, and its moss their nests. Thomson.

To CONCE'DE. v. a. [concedo, Latin.] To yield; to admit; to grant; to let pass undisputed.

By expurgatory animadversions we might strike our great numbers of hidden qualities; and having once a conceded list we might with more safety attempt their reasons. Brown.

This must not be conceded without limitation. Boyle.

To CONCE'DE.* v. n. To admit; to grant.

We concede that self-love is the strongest and most natural love of man; and it is the greatest antagonist and enemy to the love of God. Hewyt, Serm, (1658,) p. 93.

The atheist, if you concede to him that fortune may be an agent, doth presume himself safe and invulnerable. Bentley.

CONCE'IT. n. s. [concept, French; conceptus, Latin.]

1. Conception; thought; idea; image in the mind.

Here the very shepherds have their fancies lifted to so high conceits, as the learned of other nations are content both to borrow their names and imitate their cunning. Sidney.

Impossible it was, that ever their will should change or incline to remit any part of their duty, without some object having force to avert their conceit from God. Hooker, b. i.

His grace looks chearfully and smooth this morning:
There's some conceit, or other, likes him well,
When that he bids good-morrow with such spirit. Shakspeare.

In laughing there ever precedeth a conceit of somewhat ridiculous, and therefore it is proper to man. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

2. Understanding; readiness of apprehension.

How often, alas! did her eyes say unto me, that they loved? and yet, I not looking for such a matter, had not my conceit open to understand them. Sidney.

The first kind of things appointed by laws humane, containeth whatsoever is good or evil, is notwithstanding more secret than that it can be discerned by every man's present conceit, without some deeper discourse and judgment. Hooker.

I shall be found of a quick conceit in judgment, and shall be admired. Wisd. viii. 11.

3. Opinion; generally in a sense of contempt; fancy; imagination; fantastical notion.

I know not how conceit may rob
The treasury of life, when life itself
Yields to the theft. Shaksp. King Lear.

Strong canceit, like a new principle, carries all easily with it, when yet above common sense. Locke.

Malbranche has an odd conceit,
As ever enter'd Frenchman's pate. Prior.

4. Opinion in a neutral sense.

Seest thou a man wise in his own conceit?
There is more hope of a fool than of him. Prov. xxvi. 12.

I shall not fail t' approve the fair conceit,
The king hath of you. Shakspeare, Hen. VIII.

5. Pleasant fancy; gaiety of imagination; acuteness.

His wit is as thick as Tewksbury mustard: there is no more conceit in him than is in a mallet. Shakspeare, Hen. IV. P. II.

While he was on his way to the gibbet, a freak took him in the head to go off with a conceit. L'Estrange.

6. Sentiment; striking thought.

Some to conceit alone their works confine,
And glittering thoughts struck out at every line. Pope.

7. Fondness; favourable opinion; opinionative pride.

Since by a little studying in learning, and great conceit of himself, he has lost his religion; may he find it again by harder study under humbler truth. Bentley.

3. Out of CONCEIT with. No longer fond of.

Not that I dare assume to myself to have put him out of conceit with it, by having convinced him of the fantasticalness of it. Tillotson, Pref.

What hath chiefly put me out of conceit with this moving manner, is the frequent disappointment. Swift.

To CONCE'IT. v. a. [from the noun.] To conceive; to imagine; to think; to believe.

One of two bad ways you must conceit me,
Either a coward or a flatterer.
Shakspeare, Julius Cæsar.

They looked for great matters at their hands, in a cause which they conceited to be for the liberty of the subject. Bacon.

He conceits himself to be struck at, when he is not so much as thought of, L'Estrange.

The strong, by conceiting themselves weak, are thereby rendered as unactive, and consequently as useless, as if they really were so. South, Serm.

To CONCE'IT.* v. n. To form a notion; to conceive.

There must be a specifick essence, which is the root of those powers, &c. for 'tis too coarse and slovenly to conceit, that these are clarted on them. Annot. on Bp. Rust's Disc. of Truth, 1682, p. 235.

CONCE'ITED. particip. adj. [from conceit.]

1. Endowed with fancy.

He was of countenance amiable, of feature comely, active of body, pleasantly conceited, and sharp of wit. Knolles.

2. Proud; fond of himself; opinionative; affected; fantastical.

There is another extreme in obscure writers, which some empty conceited heads are apt to run into, out of a prodigality of words, and a want of sense. Felton on the Classicks.

If you think me too conceited,
Or to passion quickly heated. Swift.

What you write of me, would make me more conceited than what I scribbled myself. Pope.

3. With of before the object of conceit.

Every man is building a several way, impotently conceited of his own model and his own materials. Dryden.

If we consider how vicious and corrupt the Athenians were, how conceited of their own wit, science, and politeness. Bentley.

CONCE'ITEDLY. adv. [from conceited.] Fancifully; whimsically.

Conceitedly dress her, and be assign'd
By you fit place for every flower and jewel;
Make her for love fit fuel. Donne, Poems, p. 115.

CONCE'ITEDNESS.† n. s. [from conceited.] Pride; opinionativeness; fondness of himself.

There is notorious testimony of Aristotle's pride, conceitedness, and unthankfulness towards Plato. More, Notes upon Psych. p. 375.

When men think none worthy esteem, but such as claim under their own pretences, partiality and conceitedness makes them give the pre-eminence. Collier on Pride.

Who can deal with an Ignoramus, that is wrapt by his inclination, fixt there by his conceitedness, jealous of all contrary instruction, and incapable of seeing the force of it. Bentley, Phil. Lips. § xv.

CONCE'ITLESS. adj. [from conceit.] Stupid; without thought; dull of apprehension.

Think'st thou, I am so shallow, so conceitless,
To be seduced by thy flattery.
Shakspeare, Two Gent. of Ver.

CONCE'IVABLE. adj. [from conceive.]

1. That may be imagined or thought.

If it were possible to contrive an invention, whereby any conceivable weight may be moved by any conceivable power with the same quickness, without other instrument, the works of nature would be too much subjected to art. Wilkins.

2. That may be understood or believed.

The freezing of the words in the air in the Northern climes, is as conceivable as this strange union. Glanville's Scepsis.

It is not conceivable that it should be indeed that very person, whose shape and voice it assumed. Atterbury, Serm.

CONCE'IVABLENESS. n. s. [from conceivable.] The quality of being conceivable. Dict.

CONCE'IVABLY.† adv. [from conceivable.] In a conceivable or intelligible manner.

The first thing God did, or possibly and conceivably could do, was to determine to communicate Himself: and did so accordingly. Mountagu, App. to Cæs. p. 61.

To CONCE'IVE. v. a. [conçevoir, Fr. concipere, Lat.]

CONCE'NT.† n. s. [concentus, Lat. concento, Ital.]

1. Concert of voices; harmony; concord of sound.

It is to be considered, that whatsoever virtue is in numbers, for conducing to concent of notes, is rather to be ascribed to the ante-number than to the entire number. Bacon.

Birds, winds, and waters sing with sweet concent.
Fairfax, Tass. xviii. 19.

That undisturbed song of pure concent,
Aye sung before the sapphire-colour'd throne
To Him that sits thereon.
Milton, Ode at a Solemn Musick.

2. Consistency.

Reasons borrowed from nature and the schoolmen as subservient mediums, carry a musick and concent to that which God hath said in his word. Dr. Maine.

'Tis in concent to his own principles, which allow no merit, no intrinsick worth to accompany one state more than another. Atterbury.

CONCE'NTFUL.* adj. [from concent and full.] Completely harmonious.

Geometry, in giving unto every one his proper form and figure; and musick, in joining them in so concentful an harmony, each of them with one another. Fotherby, Atheom. p. 295.

CONCE'NTED.* part. adj. [Lat. part. concentus.] Made to agree with.

Such musick is wise words with time concented.

CONCENTRA'TION. n. s. [from concentrate.] Collection into a narrow space round the center; compression into a narrow compass.

All circular bodies, that receive a concentration of the light, must be shadowed in a circular manner. Peacham on Drawing.

To CONCE'NTRE. v. n. [concentrer, Fr. from con and centrum, Lat.] To tend to one common centre; to have the same centre with something else.

The bricks having first been formed in a circular mould, and then cut, before their burning, into four quarters or more, the sides afterwards join so closely, and the points concentre so exactly, that the pillars appear one entire piece. Wotton.

All these are like so many lines drawn from several objects, that some may relate to him, and concentre in him. Hale.

To CONCE'NTRE. v. a. To direct or contract towards one centre.

The having a part less to animate, will serve to concentre the spirits, and make them more active in the rest. Decay of Piety.

In thee concentring all their precious beams
Of sacred influence! Milton, P. L.

CONCE'NTRICAL. } adj. [concentricus, Lat.]
CONCE'NTRICK. } Having one common centre.

If, as in water stirr'd, more circles be
Produc'd by one, love such additions take;
Those, like so many spheres, but one heav'n make;
For they are all concentrick unto thee.
Donne, Poems, p. 27.

Any substance, pitched steddy upon two points, as on an axis, and moving about on that axis, also describes a circle concentrick to the axis. Moxon, Mech. Exer.

If the crystalline humour had been concentrical to the sclerodes, the eye would not have admitted a whole hemisphere at one view. Ray on the Creation.

If a stone be thrown into stagnating water, the waves excited thereby continue some time to arise in the place where the stone fell into the water, and are propagated from thence into concentrick circles upon the surface of the water to great distances. Newton, Opt.

The manner of its concretion is by concentrical rings, like those of an onion about the first kernel. Arbuthnot on Diet.

Circular revolutions in concentrick orbs about the sun, or other central body, could in no wise be attained without the power of the Divine arm. Bentley, Serm. 7.

CONCEN'TRICALLY, or CONCE'NTRICKLY.* adv. [from the adj.] In a manner directing to, or exhibiting, one common centre.

CONCE'NTUAL.* adj. [from concent.] Harmonious.

Milton, full of these Platonick ideas, has here a reference to this consummate or concentual song of the ninth sphere, which is undisturbed and pure, that is, unallayed and perfect. Warton, Notes on Milton's Poems.

CONCE'PTACLE.† n. s. [old Fr. conceptacle, from conceptaculum, Lat.] That in which any thing is contained; a vessel.

There is at this day resident, in that huge conceptical, water enough to effect such a deluge. Woodward, Nat. Hist. Pref.

CONCE'PTIBLE. adj. [from concipio conceptum, Lat.] That may be conceived; intelligible; capable to be understood.

Some of his attributes, and the manifestations thereof, are not only highly delectable to the intellective faculty, but are most suitable and easily conceptible by us, because apparent in his works. Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

CONCE'PTION. n. s. [conceptio, Lat.]

1. The act of conceiving, or growing quick with pregnancy.

I will greatly multiply thy sorrow, and thy conception; in sorrow thou shalt bring forth children. Gen. iii. 16.

Thy sorrow I will greatly multiply
By thy conception; children thou shalt bring
In sorrow forth. Milton, P.L.

2. The state of being conceived.

Joy had the like conception in our eyes,
And at that instant, like a babe, sprung up. Shakspeare.

Our own productions flatter us: it is impossible not to be fond of them at the moment of their conception. Dryden, Dufresnoy.

3. Notion; idea; image in the mind.

As conceptions are the images or resemblances of things to the mind within itself, in the like manner are words or names the marks, tokens, or resemblances of those conceptions to the minds of them whom we converse with. South, Serm.

Consult the acutest poets and speakers, and they will confess that their quickest, most admired conceptions were such as darted into their minds, like sudden flashes of lightning, they knew not how, nor whence; and not by any certain consequence, or dependence of one thought upon another, as it is in matters of ratiocination. South, Serm.

To have right conceptions about them, we must bring our understandings to the inflexible natures and unalterable relations of things, and not endeavour to bring things to any preconceived notions of our own. Locke.

4. Sentiments; purpose.

Thou but remember'st me of my own conception. I have perceived a most faint neglect of late; which I have rather blamed as my own jealous curiosity, than as a very pretence and purpose of unkindness. Shakspeare, K. Lear.

Please your highness, note
His dangerous conception in this point:
Not friended by his wish to your high person,
His will is most malignant, and it stretches
Beyond you to your friends. Shaksp. Hen. VIII.

5. Apprehension; knowledge.

And as if beasts conceiv'd what reason were,
And that conception should distinctly show
They should the name of reasonable bear;
For, without reason, none could reason know. Davies.

6. Conceit; sentiment; pointed thought.

He is too flatulent sometimes, and sometimes too dry; many times unequal, and almost always forced; and, besides, is full of conceptions, points of epigram, and witticisms; all which are not only below the dignity of heroic verse, but contrary to its nature. Dryden, Juv. Ded.

CONCE'PTIOUS. adj. [conceptum, Lat.] Apt to conceive; fruitful; pregnant.

Common mother,
Ensear thy fertile and conceptious womb;
Let it no more bring out to ingrateful man. Shakspeare, Timon.

CONCE'PTIVE. adj. [conceptum, Lat.] Capable to conceive.

In hot climates, and where the uterine parts exceed in heat, by the coldness of this simple they may be reduced into a conceptive constitution. Brown, Vulg. Err.

To CONCE'RN. v. a. [concerner, Fr. concerno, low Lat.]

1. To relate to; to belong to.

Exclude the use of natural reasoning about the sense of holy scripture, concerning the articles of our faith; and then, that the scripture doth concern the articles of our faith, who can assure us? Hooker, iii. § 8.

Count Claudio may hear; for what I would speak of concerns him. Shakspeare.

Gracious things
Thou hast reveal'd; those chiefly which concern
Just Abraham, and his seed. Milton, P.L.

This place concerns not at all the dominion of one brother over the other. Locke.

2. To affect with some passion; to touch nearly; to be of importance to.

I would not
The cause were known to them it most concerns. Shakspeare.

Our wars with France have affected us in our most tender interests, and concerned us more than than those with any other nation. Addison on the War.

It much concerns them not to suffer the king to establish his authority on this side. Addison on Italy.

The more the authority of any station in society is extended, the more it concerns publick happiness that it be committed to men fearing God. Rogers, Sermons.

3. To interest; to engage by interest.

I knew a young negroe who was sick of the small-pox: I found by enquiry, at a person's concerned for him, that the little tumours left whitish specks behind them. Boyle on Colours.

Above the rest two goddesses appear,
Concern'd for each: here Venus, Juno there. Dryden, Æn.

Providence, where it loves a nation, concerns itself to own and assert the interest of religion, by blasting the spoilers of religious persons and places. South. Serm.

Whatever past actions it cannot reconcile, or appropriate to that present self by consciousness, it can be no more concerned in than if they had never been done. Locke.

They think themselves out of the reach of Providence, and no longer concerned to solicit his favour. Rogers.

4. To disturb; to make uneasy.

In one compressing engine I shut a sparrow, without forcing any air in; and in an hour the bird began to pant, and be concerned, and in less than an hour and a half to be sick. Derham.

5. To concern himself. To intermeddle; to be busy.

Being a layman I ought not to have concerned myself with speculations which belong to the profession. Dryden.

CONCE'RN. n. s. [from the verb.]

1. Business; affair; considered as relating to some one.

Let early care thy main concerns secure,
Things of less moment may delays endure. Denham.

This manner of exposing the private concerns of families, and sacrificing the secrets of the dead to the curiosity of the living, is one of those licentious practices, which might well deserve the animadversion of our government. Addison, Freeholder.

A heathen emperor said, if the gods were offended, it was their own concern, and they were able to vindicate themselves. Swift.

Religion is no trifling concern, to be performed in any careless and superficial manner. Rogers.

2. Interest; engagement.

No plots th' alarm to his retirements give;
'Tis all mankind's concern that he should live. Dryden.

When we speak of the conflagration of the world, these have no concern in the question. Burnet, Theory of the Earth.

3. Importance; moment.

Mysterious secrets of a high concern,
And weighty truths, solid convincing sense,
Explain'd by unaffected eloquence. Roscommon.

The mind is stunned and dazzled amidst that variety of objects: she cannot apply herself to those things which are of the utmost concern to her. Addison, Spectator.

4. Passion; affection; regard.

Ah, what concerns did both your souls divide!
Your honour gave us what your love deny'd. Dryden.

O Marcia, let me hope thy kind concerns,
And gentle wishes follow me to battle! Addison, Cato.

Why all this concern for the poor? We want them not as the country is now managed: where the plough has no work, one family can do the business of fifty. Swift.

CONCE'RNEDLY.† adv. [from concerned.] With affection; with interest.

They had more positively and concernedly wedded his cause, than they were before understood to have done. Clarendon.

Those discourses, together with a little book newly printed at Paris, according to the license of that nation, of the amours of Henry IV. which was by them presented to him, and too concernedly read by him, made that impression upon his mind, that he was resolved to raise the quality and degree of that lady. Life of Lord Clarendon, ii. 322.

CONCE'RNING. prep. [from concern: this word originally a participle, has before a noun the force of a preposition.] Relating to; with relation to.

There is not any thing more subject to errour than the true judgment concerning the power and forces of an estate. Bacon.

The ancients had no higher recourse than to nature, as may appear by a discourse concerning this point in Strabo. Brown.

None can demonstrate that there is such an island as Jamaica, yet upon testimony, I am free from all doubt concerning it. Tillotson, Pref.

CONCE'RNING.* n. s [from concern.] Business; affair of moment.

We shall write to you,
As time and our concernings shall importune. Shakspeare, Meas. for Meas.

For who, that's but a queen fair, sober, wise,
Would from a paddock, from a bat, a gib,
Such dear concernings hide? Shaksp. Hamlet.

CONCE'RNMENT. n. s. [from concern.]

1. The thing in which we are concerned or interested; affair; business; interest.

To mix with thy concernments I desist,
Henceforth not too much disapprove my own.
Milton, S. A.

This shews how useful you have been,
To bring the king's concernments in. Hudibras.

Yet when we're sick, the doctor's fetcht in haste,
Leaving our great concernment to the last.
Denham.

When my concernment takes up no more room or compass than myself, then, so long as I know where to breathe and to exist, I know also where to be happy. South.

He that is wise in the affairs and concernments of other men, but careless and negligent of his own, that man may be said to be busy, but he is not wise. Tillotson.

Our spiritual interests, and the great concernments of a future state, would doubtless recur often. Atterbury.

Propositions which extend only to the present life, are small, compared with those that have influence upon our everlasting concernments.
Watts on the Mind.

2. Relation; influence.

Sir, 'tis of near concernment, and imports
No less than the king's life and honour.
Denham, Sophy.

He justly fears a peace with me would prove
Of ill concernment to his haughty love.
Dryden, Ind. Emp.

3. Intercourse; business.

The great concernment of men is with men, one amongst another. Locke.

4. Importance; moment.

I look upon experimental truths as matters of great concernment to mankind. Boyle.

5. Interposition; regard; meddling.

He married a daughter to the earl, without any other approbation of her father, or concernment in it, than suffering him and her to come into his presence. Clarendon.

6. Passion; emotion of mind.

While they are so eager to destroy the fame of others, their ambition is manifest in their concernment. Dryden.

If it carry with it the notion of something extraordinary, if apprehension and concernment accompany it, the idea is likely to sink the deeper.
Locke.

To CONCE'RT.† v. a. [concerter, Fr. from concertare, Lat. to prepare themselves for some publick exhibition or performance, by private encounters among themselves.]

1. To settle any thing in private by mutual communication.

Will any man persuade me that this was not, from the beginning to the end, a concerted affair? Tatler, No. 171.

2. To settle; to contrive; to adjust.

Mark how already in his working brain
He forms the well-concerted scheme of mischief.
Rowe.

There should be a continual consort of ravishing harmony among them. Scott, Christian Life, i. iii.

CONCERTA'TION.† n. s. [concertatio, Lat.] Strife; contention.

As to the man himself, Mr. Edwards has been serviceable to the common christianity by divers learned books; therefore I wish to him whatsoever good himself desires to himself, these concertations between us notwithstanding.
Life of Firmin, Acc. of his Rel. p. 47.

CONCE'RTATIVE. adj. [concertativus, Lat.] Contentious; quarrelsome; recriminating. Dict.

*CONCE'RTO. n. s. [Ital.] A piece of musick composed for a concert.

A well-composed concerto of instrumental musick, by the number and variety of the instruments, by the variety of the parts which are performed in them, &c. presents an object so agreeable, so great, so various, and so interesting.
A. Smith on the Imit. Arts, P. ii.

Nor will a concerto of Geminiani's be so readily understood as an overture of Jomelli's, though performed by one and the same orchestra.
Mason on Ch. Musick, p. 17.

CONCE'SSION. n. s. [concessio, Lat.]

1. The act of granting or yielding.

The concession of these charters was in a parliamentary way. Hale, Com. Law of England.

2. A grant; the thing yielded.

I still counted myself undiminished by my largest concessions, if by them I might gain the love of my people. King Charles.

When a lover becomes satisfied by small compliances, without further pursuits, then expect to find popular assemblies content with small concessions. Swift.

CONCE'SSIONARY. adj. [from concession.] Given by indulgence or allowance.

CONCE'SSIVE.* adj. [from the Lat. concessus.] Implying concession.

He never refused to be concluded by the authority of one legally summoned. Atterbury.

To CONCLU'DE. v. n.

1. To perform the last act of ratiocination; to collect the consequence; to determine.

For why should we the busy soul believe,
When boldly she concludes of that and this;
When of herself she can no judgment give,
Nor how, nor whence, nor where, nor what she is?
Davies.

The blind man's relations import no necessity of concluding, that though black was the roughest of colours, therefore white should be the smoothest. Boyle on Colours.

There is something infamous in the very attempt; the world will conclude I had a guilty conscience. Arbuthnot, Hist. of J. Bull.

2. To settle opinion.

Can we conclude upon Luther's instability, as our author has done, because in a single notion no way fundamental, an enemy writes that he had some doubtings? Atterbury.

I question not but your translation will do honour to our country; for I conclude of it already from those performances. Addison to Pope.

3. Finally to determine.

They humbly sue unto your excellence,
To have a goodly peace concluded of,
Between the realms of England and of France.
Shakspeare.

4. To end.

And all around wore nuptial bonds, the ties
Of love's assurance, and a train of lies,
That, made in lust, conclude in perjuries.
Dryden, Fab.

We'll tell when 'tis enough,
Or if it wants the nice concluding bout. King.

CONCLU'DENCY. n. s. [from concludent.] Consequence; regular proof; logical deduction of reason.

CONCLU'SIBLE. adj. [from conclude.] Determinable; certain by regular proof.

'Tis as certainly conclusible from God's prescience, that they will voluntarily do this, as that they will do it at all. Hammond.

CONCLU'SION. n. s. [from conclude.]

1. Determination; final decision.

Ways of peaceable conclusion there are but these two certain; the one a sentence of judicial decision, given by authority thereto appointed within ourselves; the other, the like kind of sentence given by a more universal authority. Hooker.

2. The collection from propositions premised; the consequence.

The conclusion of experience, from the time past to the time present, will not be sound and perfect. Bacon, War with Spain.

And marrying divers principles and grounds,
Out of their match a true conclusion brings.
Davies.

Then doth the wit
Build fond conclusions on those idle grounds;
Then doth it fly the good, and ill pursue. Davies.

I only deal by rules of art,
Such as are lawful, and judge by
Conclusions of astrology. Hudibras.

It is of the nature of principles, to yield a conclusion different from themselves. Tillotson.

He granted him both the major and the minor; but denied him the conclusion. Addison, Freeholder.

3. The close; the last result of argumentative deduction.

Let us hear the conclusion of the whole matter, fear God and keep his commandments; for this is the whole duty of man. Eccles. xii. 13.

I have been reasoning, and in conclusion have thought it best to return to what fortune hath made my home. Swift.

4. The event of experiments; experiment.

Her physician tells me,
She has pursu'd conclusions infinite
Of easy ways to die. Shakspeare, Ant. and Cleop.

We practise likewise all conclusions of grafting and inoculating, as well of wild trees as fruit trees. Bacon, New Atlant.

5. The end; the last part.

I can speak no longer; yet I will strain myself to breathe out this one invocation, which shall be my conclusion. Howell.

6. In Shakspeare it seems to signify silence; confinement of the thoughts.

Your wife Octavia, with her modest eyes
And still conclusion, shall acquire no honour,
Demuring upon me. Shakspeare, Ant. and Cleop.

CONCLU'SIONAL.* adj. [from conclusion.] Concluding.

Such separations of initiatory dedications, as well as conclusional separations, are made with wine. Hooper on Lent, p. 278.

CONCLU'SIVE. adj. [from conclude.]

1. Decisive; giving the last determination to the opinion.

The agreeing votes of both houses were not by any law or reason conclusive to my judgment. King Charles.

The last dictate of the understanding is not always absolute in itself, nor conclusive to the will, yet it produces no antecedent nor external necessity. Bp. Bramhall, Answer to Hobbes.

They have secret reasons for what they seem to do, which, whatever they are, they must be equally conclusive for us as they were for them. Rogers.

2. Regularly consequential.

Those that are not men of art, not knowing the true forms of syllogism, cannot know whether they are made in right and conclusive modes and figures. Locke.

CONCLU'SIVELY. adv. [from conclusive.] Decisively; with final determination.

This I speak only to desire Eupolis not to speak peremptorily or conclusively, touching the point of possibility, 'till they have heard me deduce the means of the execution. Bacon.

CONCLU'SIVENESS. n. s. [from conclusive.] Power of determining the opinion; regular consequence.

Consideration of things to be known, of their several weights, conclusiveness, or evidence. Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

To CONCOA'GULATE. v. a. [from con and coagulate.] To curdle or congeal one thing with another.

The saline parts of those, upon their solution by the rain, may work upon those other substances, formerly concoagulated with them. Boyle, Experiments.

They do but coagulate themselves, without concoagulating with them any water. Boyle, Hist. of Firmness.

CONCOAGULA'TION. n. s. [from concoagulate.] A coagulation by which different bodies are joined in one mass.

To CONCO'CT. v. a. [concoquo, Lat.]

1. To digest by the stomach, so as to turn food to nutriment.

The working of purging medicines cometh two or three hours after the medicines taken; for that the stomach first maketh a proof, whether it can concoct them. Bacon.

Assuredly he was a man of a feeble stomach, unable to concoct any great fortune, prosperous or adverse. Hayward.

The vital functions are performed by general and constant laws; the food is concocted, the heart beats, the blood circulates, the lungs play. Cheyne, Phil. Prin.

The notions and sentiments of others judgment, as well as of our own memory, makes our property: it does, as it were, concoct our intellectual food, and turns it into a part of ourselves. Watts on the Mind.

2. To purify or sublime by heat; or heighten to perfection.

The small, close-lurking minister of fate,
Whose high concocted venom through the veins
A rapid lightning darts. Thomson, Summer.

3. To ripen.

The root which continueth ever in the earth, is still concocted by the earth; and fruits and grains are half a year in concocting; whereas leaves are out and perfect in a month. Bacon.

CONCO'CTION. n. s. [from concoct.] Digestion in the stomach; maturation by heat; the acceleration of any thing towards purity and perfection.

This hard rolling is between concoction and a simple maturation. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

The constantest notion of concoction is, that it should signify the degrees of alteration of one body into another, from crudity to perfect concoction, which is the ultimity of that action or process. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

He, though he knew not which soul spake,
Because both meant, both spake the same,
Might thence a new concoction take,
And part far purer than he came. Donne.

CONCO'CTIVE.* adj. [from concoct.] Digesting by the stomach; turning food to nourishment.

It were more easy — to force the concoctive stomach to turn that into flesh, which is so totally unlike that substance as not to be wrought on. Milton, Tetrach.

With keen dispatch
Of real hunger, and concoctive heat
To transubstantiate. Milton, P. L. v. 437.

The fallow ground laid open to the sun,
Concoctive. Thomson, Autumn.

CONCO'LOUR. adj. [concolor, Lat.] Of one colour; without variety.

In concolour animals, and such as are confined unto the same colour, we measure not their beauty thereby; for if a crow or blackbird grow white, we account it more pretty. Brown.

CONCO'MITANCE.† } n. s. [old Fr. concomitance, from concomitor. Lat.] Subsistence together with another thing.
CONCO'MITANCY. }

The secondary action subsisteth not alone, but in concomitancy with the other; so the nostrils are useful for respiration and smelling, but the principal use is smelling. Brown.

Stain not fair acts with foul intentions; maim not uprightness by halting concomitances, nor circumstantially deprave substantial goodness. Brown, Christ. Mor. i. 1.

To argue from a concomitancy to a causality, is not infallibly conclusive. Glanville, Scepsis.

The concomitance of pain and sorrow. More, Conj. Cabb. p. 179.

CONCO'MITANT. adj. [concomitans, Lat.] Conjoined with; concurrent with; coming and going with, as collateral, not causative, or consequential.

The spirit that furthereth the extension or dilatation of bodies, and is ever concomitant with porosity and dryness. Bacon.

It has pleased our wise Creator to annex to several objects, as also to several of our thoughts, a concomitant pleasure; and that in several objects to several degrees. Locke.

CONCO'MITANT. n. s. Companion; person or thing collaterally connected.

These effects are, from the local motion of the air, a concomitant of the sound, and not from the sound. Bacon.

He made him the chief concomitant of his heir apparent and only son, in a journey of much adventure. Wotton.

In consumptions, the preternatural concomitants, an universal heat of the body, a torminous diarrhœa, and hot distillations, have all a corrosive quality. Harvey on Consump.

The other concomitant of ingratitude is hard-heartedness, or want of compassion. South, Serm.

Horrour stalks around,
Wild staring, and his sad concomitant,
Despair, of abject look. Philips.

Reproach is a concomitant to greatness, as satires and invectives were an essential part of a Roman triumph. Addison.

And for tobacco, who could bear it?
Filthy concomitant of claret! Prior.

Where antecedents, concomitants and consequents, causes and effects, signs and things signified, subjects and adjuncts, are necessarily connected with each other, we may infer. Watts.

CONCO'MITANTLY.† adv. [from concomitant.] In company with others.

Christ, as God, hath the first (original, autocratical, judiciary power) together with the Father, and the Holy Ghost. Christ, as man, hath the second (delegated power) from the Father expressly, from the Holy Ghost concomitantly. Pearson on the Creed, Art. 7.

In the same sense, therefore, that the wicked may be said to repent, they may be said to have their prayers and services accepted; that is, the wicked antecedently so taken, and (as they speak, in sensu diviso,) to wit, before the instant of their repentance, not concomitantly, and in sensu composito; the wicked as such, and while he is such, can neither repent nor pray, nor have any audience of acceptance at the throne of grace. South, Serm. ix. 301.

To CONCO'MITATE. v. a. [concomitatus, Lat.] To be collaterally connected with any thing; to come and go with another.

This simple bloody spectation of the lungs, is differenced from that which concomitates a pleurisy. Harvey on Consump.

CO'NCORD.† n. s. [old Fr. concorde; Lat. concordia; from the Gr. σὺν, with, and καρδιά, the heart; signifying the union of hearts.]

1. Agreement between persons or things; suitableness of one to another; peace; union; mutual kindness.

Had I power, I should
Pour the sweet milk of concord into hell,
Uproar the universal peace. Shaksp. Macb.

What concord hath Christ with Belial? 2 Cor. vi. 15.

One shall rise
Of proud ambitious heart, who not content
With fair equality, fraternal state,
Will arrogate dominion undeserved
Over his brethren, and quite dispossess
Concord and law of nature from the earth. Milton, P. L.

Unsafe within the wind
Of such commotion; such as, to set forth
Great things by small, if nature's concord broke,
Among the constellations war were sprung. Milton, P. L.

Kind concord, heavenly born! whose blissful reign
Holds this vast globe in one surrounding chain;
Soul of the world! Tickel.

2. A compact.

It appeareth by the concord made between Henry and Roderick the Irish king. Davies on Ireland.

3. Harmony; consent of sounds.

The man who hath not musick in himself,
Nor is not mov'd with concord of sweet sounds,
Is fit for treasons. Shakspeare, Merch. of Ven.

4. Principal grammatical relation of one word to another, distinct from regimen.

Have those who have writ about declensions, concords, and syntaxes lost their labour? Locke.

To CONCO'RD.* v. n. [from the noun.] To agree.

The king was not without apprehension, that the resort of either of these into England might find too many of their old friends and associates, ready to concord with them in any desperate measure. Ld. Clarendon's Life, ii. 199.

CONCO'RDABLE.* adj. [from concord.] Agreeing; harmonious.

CONCO'RDABLY.* adv. With agreement.

But such a work nature dispos'd and gave,
Where all the elements concordance have.
Browne, Brit. Past.

The tradition of divers there inhabiting, and all concordance of stories assure us, &c.
Blount, Voyage into the Levant, p. 35.

2. A book which shews in how many texts of scripture any word occurs.

I shall take it for an opportunity to tell you how you are to rule the city out of a concordance.
South, Serm. Ded.

Some of you turn over a concordance, and there, having the principal word, introduce as much of the verse as will serve your turn. Swift.

An old concordance bound long since. Swift.

3. A concord in grammar; one of the three chief relations in speech. It is not now in use in this sense.

After the three concordances learned, let the master read unto him the epistles of Cicero.
Ascham's Schoolmaster.

CONCO'RDANCY.* n. s. [Lat. concordantia.] Agreement. Cockeram.

They expect to prosper in this concordancy.
W. Mountagu, Dev. Ess. (1648,) p. 174.

CONCO'RDANT.† adj. [concordant, old Fr. concordans, Lat.] Agreeable; agreeing; correspondent; harmonious.

Were every one employed in points concordant to their natures, professions, and arts, commonwealths would rise up of themselves.
Brown, Vulg. Err.

CONCO'RDANT.* n. s. [from the adjective.] That which is correspondent, or agreeing with.

I gave my reasons by special reciting many concordants inter partes. Montagu, App. to Cæs. p. 84.

They hope to lodge concordantly together an idol and an ephod. W. Mountagu, Dev. Ess. p. 174.

CONCO'RDATE. n. s. [concordat, Fr. concordatum, Lat.] A compact; a convention.

How comes he to number the want of synods in the Gallican church among the grievances of that concordate, and as a mark of their slavery, since he reckons all convocations of the clergy in England to be useless and dangerous? Swift.

CONCO'RPORAL. adj. [from concorporo, Lat. to incorporate.] Of the same body. Dict.

To CONCO'RPORATE.† v. a. [from con and corpus.] To unite in one mass or substance.

We are all concorporated, as it were, and made copartners of the promise in Christ.
Abp. Usher, Serm. (1621,) p. 9.

When we concorporate the sign with the signification, we conjoin the word with the spirit.
Bp. Taylor, Worthy Com.

To CONCO'RPORATE.† v. n. To unite into one body.

As things of a like nature presently concorporate, (as we see one drop of water diffuseth itself, and runs into another,) so temptations to sin meeting with a sinful nature, are presently entertained, and as it were embodyed together.
Bp. Hopkins, Expos. p. 149.

Thus we chastise the god of wine
With water that is feminine,
Until the cooler nymph abate
His wrath, and so concorporate. Cleaveland.

CONCORPORA'TION. n. s. [from concorporate.] Union in one mass; intimate mixture. Dict.

CO'NCOURSE. n. s. [concursus, Latin.]

1. The confluence of many persons or things to one place.

Do all the nightly guards,
The city's watches, with the people's fears,
The concourse of all good men, strike thee nothing? B. Jonson.

The coalition of the good frame of the universe was not the product of chance, or fortuitous concourse of particles of matter.
Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

Vain is his force, and vainer is his skill,
With such a concourse comes the flood of ill.
Dryden, Fab.

2. The persons assembled.

The prince with wonder hears, from every part,
The noise and busy concourse of the mart.
Dryden, Virg.

3. The point of junction or intersection of two bodies.

So soon as the upper glass is laid upon the lower, so as to touch it at one end, and to touch the drop at the other end, making with the lower glass, an angle of about ten or fifteen minutes; the drop will begin to move towards the concourse of the glasses, and will continue to move with an accelerated motion, 'till it arrives at that concourse of the glasses. Newton.

4. Concurrence; agreement.

He that aims at a good end, and knows he uses proper means to attain it, why should he despair of success, since effects naturally follow their causes, and the divine providence is wont to afford its concourse to such proceedings? Barrow, vol. i. S. 1.

No creature can move, or act, or do any thing, without the concourse and co-operation of God.
Sherlock on Providence, ch. 2.

To CONCREA'TE.* v. a. [old Fr. concreer, from the Lat. con and creo.] To create at the same time.

Upon loving God above all, and our neighbour as ourselves, hang all the law and the gospel. And this, as a rule concreated with man, is that which the apostle calls the royal law; which if we fulfil, we do well. Feltham, Res. ii. 3.

To CONCRE'DIT.* v. a. [Lat. concredo, part. concreditus.] To entrust; to commit upon trust.

The which reason may well be applied to excuse every Christian from swearing, who is a most high priest to the Most High God, and hath the most celestial and important matters concredited to him. Barrow, Serm. i. S. 15.

Ecclesia commendata, so called in contradistinction to ecclesia titulata, is that church, which for the custodial charges and government thereof, is by a revocable collation concredited with some ecclesiastical person, in the nature of a trustee.
Lett. to the Bp. of Rochester, (1772,) p. 2.

CONCREMA'TION. n. s. [from concremo, Lat. to burn together.] The act of burning many things together. Dict.

CO'NCREMENT. n. s. [from concresco, Latin.] The mass formed by concretion; a collection of matter growing together.

There is the cohesion of the matter into a more loose consistency, like clay, and thereby it is prepared to the concrement of a pebble or flint.
Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

CONCRE'SCENCE. n. s. [from concresco, Lat.] The act or quality of growing by the union of separate particles.

Seeing it is neither a substance perfect, nor inchoate, how any other substance should thence take concrescence hath not been taught.
Ralegh, Hist. of the World.

To CONCRE'TE. v. n. [concresco, Latin.] To coalesce into one mass; to grow by the union and cohesion of parts.

The mineral or metallick matter, thus concreting with the crystalline, is equally diffused throughout the body of it. Woodward, Nat. Hist.

When any saline liquor is evaporated to a cuticle, and let cool, the salt concretes in regular figures; which argues that the particles of the salt, before they concreted, floated in the liquor at equal distances, in rank and file. Newton.

The blood of some who died of the plague, could not be made to concrete, by reason of the putrefaction begun. Arbuthnot.

To CONCRE'TE.† v. a. To form by concretion; to form by the coalition of scattered particles.

That there are in our inferiour world divers bodies, that are concreted out of others, is beyond all dispute: we see it in the meteors.
Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

I hope he will not desert his own principle, that all fluid bodies being congealed or concreted, rest in the same form as they were in before concretion.
Bp. H. Croft on Burnet's Theory, p. 169.

CO'NCRETE. adj. [from the verb.]

1. Formed by concretion; formed by coalition of separate particles into one mass.

The first concrete state, or consistent surface of the chaos, must be of the same figure as the last liquid state. Burnet.

2. [In logick.] Not abstract: applied to a subject.

A kind of mutual commutation there is, whereby those concrete names, God and man, when we speak of Christ, do take interchangeably one another's room: so that, for truth of speech, it skilleth not whether we say that the Son of God hath created the world, and the son of man by his death hath saved it; or else that the son of man did create, and the Son of God died to save the world.
Hooker.

Concrete terms, while they express the quality, do also either express or imply, or refer to some subject to which it belongs; as white, round, long, broad, wise, mortal, living, dead: but these are not always noun adjectives in a grammatical sense; for a knave, a fool, a philosopher, and many other concretes, are substantives, as well as knavery, folly and philosophy, which are the abstract terms that belong to them. Watts, Logick.

CO'NCRETE. n. s. A mass formed by concretion; or union of various parts adhering to each other.

If gold itself be admitted, as it must be, for a porous concrete, the proportion of void to body, in the texture of common air, will be so much the greater. Bentley, Serm.

CONCRE'TELY. adv. [from concrete.] In a manner including the subject with the predicate; not abstractly.

Sin considered not abstractedly for the mere act of obliquity, but concretely, with such a special dependence of it upon the will as serves to render the agent guilty. Norris.

CONCRE'TENESS. n. s. [from concrete.] Coagulation; collection of fluids into a solid mass. Dict.

CONCRE'TION.† n. s. [old Fr. concretion.]

1. The act of concreting; coalition.

The mind surmounts all power of concretion, and can place in the simplest manner every attribute by itelf; convex without concave; colour without superficies, &c. Harris, Hermes iii. 1.

2. The mass formed by a coalition of separate particles.

Some plants upon the top of the sea, are supposed to grow of some concretion of slime from the water, where the sea stirreth little. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

Heat, in general, doth not resolve and attenuate the juices of a human body; for too great heat will produce concretions. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

CO'NCRETIVE. adj. [from concrete.] Having the power to produce concretions; coagulative.

When wood and other bodies petrify, we do not ascribe their induration to cold, but unto salinous spirit, or concretive juices. Brown, Vulg. Err.

CONCRE'TURE. n. s. [from concrete.] A mass formed by coagulation.

To CONCRE'W.* v. n. [Lat. concresco.] To grow together. Not in use.

His faire locks —
He let to grow and grisely to concrew,
Uncomb'd, uncurl'd. Spenser, F. Q. iv. vii. 40.

CONCU'BINAGE. n. s. [concubinage, Fr. concubinatus, Lat.] The act of living with a woman not married.

Adultery was punished with death by the ancient heathens: concubinage was permitted. Broome.

CONCU'BINARY.* adj. [from concubine.] Relating to concubinage.

Choosing rather the incumbrances of honest and honourable marriage, than to live either in concubinary scandals, or other ways of luxury and lubricity. Bp. Ganden, Hieraspistes, 1653, p. 478.

CONCU'BINATE.* n. s. [Lat. concubinatus.] Whoredom; fornication; concubinage.

Holy marriage in all men is preferred before unclean concubinate in any. Bp. Taylor, Diss. from Popery, iii. § 3.

CO'NCUBINE. n. s. [concubina, Lat.] A woman kept in fornication; a whore; a strumpet.

I know, I am too mean to be your queen;
And yet too good to be your concubine.
Shakspeare, Henry VI.

When his great friend was suitor to him to pardon an offender, he denied him: afterwards, when a concubine of his made the same suit, he granted it to her; and said, Such suits were to be granted to whores. Bacon.

He caused him to paint one of his concubines, Campaspe, who had the greatest share in his affection. Dryden.

The wife, though a bright goddess, thus gives place
To mortal concubines of fresh embrace. Granville.

To CONCU'LCATE.† v. a. [conculco, Latin.] To tread or trample under foot.

Conculcating and trampling under foot whatsoever is named of God, he [Mahomet] advanceth his own (blasphemous, reprobate, and forlorne miscreant as he is) divine power and authority forsooth, in the devil's name, above all things whatsoever in heaven and earth. Mountagu, App. to Cæs. p. 153.

CONCULCA'TION. n. s. [conculcatio, Latin.] Trampling with the feet. Dict.

CONCU'PISCENCE.† n. s. [old Fr. concupiscence, Lat. concupiscentia. Our word is now rarely used in the plural number; formerly it was not uncommon.] Irregular desire; libidinous wish; lust; lechery.

We know even secret concupiscence to be sin, and are made fearful to offend, though it be but in a wandering cogitation. Hooker.

Taking their pleasures and lustes, after their inordinate concupiscences. Outred's Tr. of M. Cope on Proverbs, (1580,) p. 77. b.

In such sort doth Satan deal with us every day, by the means of our concupiscences sette on fire. Harmar, Tr. of Beza's Serm. (1587,) p. 218.

In our faces evident the signs
Of foul concupiscence; whence evil store;
Even shame, the last of evils. Milton, P. L.

Nor can they say, that the difference of climate inclines one nation to concupiscence and sensual pleasures, another to blood-thirstiness: it would discover great ignorance not to know, that a p e ple has been overrun with recently invented vice. Bentley, Serm.

CONCU'PISCENT. adj. [concupiscens, Latin.] Libidinous; lecherous.

He would not, but by gift of my chaste body
To his concupiscent intemperate lust,
Release my brother! Shakspeare, Meas. for Meas.

CONCUPISCE'NTIAL. adj. [from concupiscent.] Relating to concupiscence. Dict.

CONCUPI'SCIBLE.† adj. [concupiscibilis, Lat.] Impressing desire; eager; desirous; inclining to the pursuit or attainment of any thing.

To the vegetative, from which, as from a fountain, they said, the concupiscible appetite doth flow, they appointed the liver for her place. Bryskett, Disc. of Civil. Life, (1606,) p. 47.

It is not to be supposed, there should be any predominancy of any of those passions, that proceed from the concupiscible appetite. Smith's Portraiture of Old Age, p. 153.

The schools reduce all the passions to these two heads, the concupiscible and irascible appetite. South, Serm.

To CONCU'R.† v. n. [concurro, Latin. This word is the parent of a joke, reflecting on Dr. Adam Littleton, the well-known author of a Latin dictionary; which has been so confidently asserted in Anecdotes of the English Language, as well as in other publications, that I think it right to shew the inaccuracy of the pretended narrative, and to undeceive the wits as well as the more sober investigators of lexicography. "When Dr. Littleton was compiling his dictionary, and announced the verb concurro to his amanuensis, the scribe, imagining that the various senses of the word would, as usual, begin with the most literal translation, said, concur, I suppose, sir; to which the doctor replied peevishly — concur! condog! The secretary, whose business it was to write what his master dictated, accordingly did his duty; and the word condog was inserted, and is actually printed as one interpretation of concurro in the first edition, 1678, (to be seen in the British Museum,) though it has been expunged, and does not appear in subsequent editions." Pegge's Anecdotes of the English Language. — But condog had before appeared in English lexicography. In Cockeram's English dictionary, under To Agree, in the second part, (I am citing from the edition of 1642,) are these definitions, "concurre, cohere, condog, condescend." Littleton therefore cited what had before been used, but justly discharged it afterwards; though the editors of the Cambridge dictionary in 1693 thought proper to readmit it under concurro.]

1. To meet in one point.

Though reason favour them, yet sense can hardly allow them; and, to satisfy, both these must concur. Temple.

Is it not now utterly incredible, that our two vessels, placed there antipodes to each other, should ever happen to concur? Bentley, Serm. 7.

2. To agree; to join in one action, or opinion.

Acts which shall be done by the greater part of my executors, shall be as valid and effectual as if all my executors had concurred in the same. Swift, Last Will.

3. It has with before the person with whom one agrees.

It is not evil simply to concur with the heathens, either in opinion or action, and that conformity with them is only then a disgrace, when we follow them in that they do amiss, or generally in that they do without reason. Hooker.

4. It has to before the effect to which one contributes.

Their affections were known to concur to the most desperate counsels. Clarendon.

Extremes in nature equal good produce,
Extremes in man concur to general use. Pope.

5. To be united with; to be conjoined.

To have an orthodox belief, and a true profession, concurring with a bad life, is only to deny Christ with a greater solemnity. South.

Testimony is the argument; and, if fair probabilities of reason concur with it, this argument hath all the strength it can have. Tillotson.

6. To contribute to one common event with joint power.

When outward causes concur, the idle are soonest seized by this infection. Collier on the Spleen.

CONCU'RRENCE. } CONCU'RRENCY. } n. s. [from concur.]

1. Union; association; conjunction.

We have no other measure but our own ideas, with the concurrence of other probable reasons, to persuade us. Locke.

2. Agreement; act of joining in any design, or measures.

Their concurrence in persuasion, about some material points belonging to the same polity, is not strange. Hooker, Pref.

The concurrence of the peers in that fury, can be imputed to the irreverence the judges were in. Clarendon.

Tarquin the proud was expelled by an universal concurrence of nobles and people. Swift on the Dissent. in Athens and Rome.

3. Combination of many agents or circumstances.

Struck with these great concurrences of things. Crashaw.

He views our behaviour in every concurrence of affairs, and sees us engage in all the possibilities of action. Addison, Spect.

4. Assistance; help.

From these sublime images we collect the greatness of the work, and the necessity of the divine concurrence to it. Rogers.

5. Joint right; equal claim.

A bishop might have officers, if there was a concurrency of jurisdiction between him and the archdeacon. Ayliffe.

CONCU'RRENT.† adj. [old Fr. concurrent.]

1. Acting in conjunction; agreeing in the same act; contributing to the same event; concomitant in agency.

I join with these laws the personal presence of the king's son, as a concurrent cause of this reformation. Davies on Ireland.

Every bishop, that shall be nominated by us to another bishoprick, shall from that day of nomination not presume to make any lease for three lives or one and twenty years, or concurrent lease, or any way renew any estate, &c.
K. James, Instruct. concerning Bishops, 1622.

For without the concurrent consent of all these three parts of the legislature, no such law is or can be made. Hale.

This sole vital faculty is not sufficient to exterminate noxious humours to the periphery, unless the animal faculty be concurrent with it to supply the fibres with animal spirits. Harvey.

All combin'd,
Your beauty, and my impotence of mind;
And his concurrent flame, that blew my fire;
For still our kindred souls had one desire.
Dryden, Fab.

2. Conjoined; associate; concomitant.

There is no difference between the concurrent echo and the iterant, but the quickness or slowness of the return. Bacon.

CONCU'RRENT.† n. s. [old Fr. concurrent.]

1 That which concurs; a contributory cause.

To all affairs of importance there are three necessary concurrents, without which they can never be dispatched; time, industry, and faculties.
Decay of Piety.

2. Equal claim; joint right.

Stepping over to the south-sea (for the distance is, in comparison, but a step) St. Michael's Mount looketh so aloft, as it brooketh no concurrent for the highest place.
Carew, Survey of Cornwall.

CONCU'RRENTLY.* adv. [from concurrent.] In an agreeing manner.

They did not vote these special and precise means concurrently with the voice of God.
W. Mountagu, Dev. Ess. (1648,) p. 301.

CONCUSSA'TION.* n. s. [Lat. concusso, concussatus.] A violent agitation or shaking.

Surely he were a bold man that could sleep whiles the earth rocks him; and so were he that could give himself to a stupid security when he feels any vehement concussations of government.
Bp. Hall, Rem. p. 68.

CONCU'SSED.* part. adj. [Lat. concussus.] Shaken. Cockeram.

CONCU'SSION. n. s. [concussio, Lat.]

1. The act of shaking; agitation; tremefaction.

Bacon, Nat. Hist.

The strong concussion on the heaving tide,
Roll'd back the vessel to the island's side.
Pope, Odyssey.

2. The state of being shaken.

There want not instances of such an universal concussion of the whole globe, as must needs imply an agitation of the whole abyss.
Woodward, Nat. Hist.

CONCU'SSIVE. adj. [concussus, Latin.] Having the power or quality of shaking.

To CONDE'MN. v. a. [condemno, Latin.]

1. To find guilty; to doom to punishment: contrary to absolve.

My conscience hath a thousand several tongues,
And every tongue brings in a sev'ral tale,
And ev'ry tale condemns me for a villain.
Shakspeare, Rich. III.

Is he found guilty? ——
—— Yes truly, is he, and condemn'd upon't.
Shakspeare, Hen. VIII.

Consider'd as a judge, it condemns where it ought to absolve, and pronounces absolution where it ought to condemn. Fiddes, Serm.

2. It has to before the punishment.

The son of man shall be betrayed unto the scribes, and they shall condemn him to death.
St. Matt. xx. 18.

3. To censure; to blame; to declare criminal: contrary to approve.

Who then shall blame
His pester'd senses to recoil and start,
When all that is within him does condemn
Itself for being there! Shakspeare, Macbeth.

The poet who flourished in the scene, is condemned in the ruelle. Dryden, Æn. Pref.

He who was so unjust as to do his brother an injury, will scarce be so just as to condemn himself for it. Locke.

They who approve my conduct in this particular, are much more numerous than those who condemn it. Spectator, No. 488.

CONDE'MNATORY.† adj. [old Fr. condemnatoire.] Passing a sentence of condemnation, or of censure.

The evidence being clear and convictive, the doom can be no other than condemnatory.
Bp. Hall, Cases of Consc. ii. 6.

He that passes the first condemnatory sentence, is like the incendiary in a popular tumult, who is chargeable with all those disorders to which he gave rise. Gov. of the Tongue.

CONDE'MNER.† n. s. [from condemn.] A blamer; a censurer; a censor.

Thus are ye all one in opinion with heretyques olde and newe, and yet ye pretende to be condempners of them.
Bale, Yet a Course, &c. fol. 62. b.

Some few are the only refusers and condemners of this catholick practice.
Bp. Taylor, Worthy Communicant.

Some of the later and lesser edition of divines, who would be counted great reformers of the times, because they were vehement censurers and condemners of whatever they listed to dislike or not to fancy. Bp. Taylor, Artif. Hands, p. 118.

But we shall meet, where our condemners
Shall not. Beaum. and Fl. Four Plays in One.

CONDE'NSABLE. adj. [from condensate.] That which is capable of condensation; that which can be drawn or compressed into a narrower compass.

This agent meets with resistance in the moveable, and not being in the utmost extremity of density, but condensable yet further, every resistance works something upon the mover to condense it. Digby on the Soul.

To CONDE'NSATE.† v. a. [condenso, Latin.] To condense; to make thicker.

They say a little critical learning makes one proud; if there were more, it would condensate and compact itself into less room.
Hammond's Works, iv. 611.

To CONDE'NSATE. v. n. To grow thicker.

CONDE'NSATE. adj. [condensatus, Latin.] Made thick; condensed; compressed into less space.

Water by nature is white; yea, thickened or condensate, most white, as it appeareth by the hail and snow. Peacham.

CONDENSA'TION. n. s. [from condensate.] The act of thickening any body, or making it more gross and weighty. Opposite to rarefaction.

If by natural arguments it may be proved, that water, by condensation, may become earth; the same reason teacheth the earth, rarefied, may become water. Ralegh. Hist. of the World.

By water-glasses the account was not regular; for, from attenuation and condensation, the hours were shorter in hot weather than in cold.
Brown, Vulg. Err.

The supply of its moisture [is] by rains and snow, and dews and condensation of vapours, and perhaps by subterraneous passages.
Bentley, Serm. iv.

CONDE'NSATIVE.* adj. [from condensate.] Having the power of condensating.

To CONDE'NSE.† v. a. [condenso, Lat.] To make any body more thick, close, and weighty; to drive or attract the parts of any body nearer to each other. To inspissate; opposed to rarefy.

The midst was all of dark and condensed clouds. B. Jonson, Masques at Court.

Moving in so high a sphere, he must needs, as the sun, raise many envious exhalations; which condensed by a popular odium, were capable to cloud the brightest merit. K. Charles.

Some lead their youth abroad, while some condense
Their liquid store, and some in cells dispense.
Dryden, Virg.

Such dense and solid strata arrest the vapour, at the surface of the earth, and collect and condense it there. Woodward.

To CONDE'NSE. v. n. To grow close and weighty; to withdraw its parts into a narrow compass.

The water falling from the upper parts of the cave, does presently there condense into little stones. Boyle, Scep. Chym.

All vapours, when they begin to condense and coalesce into small parcels, become first of that bigness whereby azure must be reflected, before they can constitute other colours. Newton, Opticks.

CONDE'NSITY.† n. s. [old Fr. condensité.] The state of being condensed; condensation; denseness; density.

CO'NDERS. n. s. [conduire, French.]

Such as stand upon high places near the sea coast, at the time of herring-fishing, to make signs to the fishers which way the shole passeth, which may better appear to such as stand upon some high cliff, by a kind of blue colour that the fish causeth in the water than to those in the ships. These be likewise called huers, by likelihood of the French huyer, exclamare, and balkers. Cowel.

CONDESCE'NCE.* n. s. [from condescend.] Descent from superiority. See CONDESCENT.

Which passage I find cited by Cressie's Answer to Dr. Pierce, adding thus, See the condescence of this great king.

Puller's Moderat. of the Ch. of Eng. p. 440.

To CONDESCE'ND.† v. n. [condescendre, Fr. from condescendo, Lat.]

1. To depart from the privileges of superiority by a voluntary submission; to sink willingly to equal terms with inferiours; to sooth by familiarity.

This method carries a very humble and condescending air, when he that instructs seems to be the enquirer. Watts.

2. To consent to do more than mere justice can require.

Spain's mighty monarch,
In gracious clemency does condescend,
On these conditions to become your friend.
Dryden, Ind. Emp.

He did not primarily intend to appoint this way; but condescended to it as accommodate to their present state. Tillotson.

3. To stoop; to bend; to yield; to submit; to become subject.

Can they think me so broken, so debas'd
With corporal servitude, that my mind ever
Will condescend to such absurd commands?
Milton, S. A.

Nor shall my resolution
Disarm itself, nor condescend to parly
With foolish hopes. Denham, Sophy.

4. To agree to, or concur with, simply. This sense is not noticed by Dr. Johnson. Huloet.

This queen of most familiar condescendings is content to be our every week's prospect.

Hammond's Works, iv. 525.

CONDESCE'NDINGLY.† adv. [from condescending.] By way of voluntary humiliation; by way of kind concession.

Not starting of high and intricate questions, and concluding them by subtile arguments, but familiarly and condescendingly setting out the creation, according to the most easy and obvious conceits they themselves had of those things they saw in the world.

More, Conj. Cabb, (1653,) p. 101.

We condescendingly made Luther's works umpires in the controversy. Atterbury.

CONDESCE'NSION. n. s. [from condescend.] Voluntary humiliation; descent from superiority; voluntary submission to equality with inferiours.

It forbids pride and ambition, and vain glory; and commands humility and modesty, and condescension to others. Tillotson.

Courtesy and condescension is an happy quality, which never fails to make its way into the good opinion, and into the very heart, and allays the envy which always attends a high station.

Atterbury, Sermons.

Raphael, amidst his tenderness, shews such a dignity and condecension in all his behaviour, as are suitable to a superior nature. Addison.

CONDESCE'NSIVE.† adj. [from condecension.] Courteous; willing to treat with inferiours on equal terms; not haughty; not arrogant.

There is not the least of the divine favours, which, if we consider the condescensive tenderness, the clear intention, the unreserved frankness, the cheerful debonairity expressed therein, has not dimensions larger than our comprehension, colours too fair, lineaments too comely for our weak sight throughly to discern, requiring therefore our highest and our utmost thanks.

Barrow, Serm. vol. i. S. 8.

CONDESCE'NT.* n. s. [from condescend. This is our old substantive for condescension, which also formerly appeared in condescence.] Accordance; agreement; submission; condescension.

God turns the hearts of men which way soever he pleases; sometimes dreadfully forward to a right down opposition; sometimes sideways to a fair accommodation; sometimes circularly bringing them about to a full condescent and accordance. Bp. Hall, Rem. p. 79.

They rather, to gratify Herodias, make way for so slight and easy a condescent.

Bp. Hall, Contempl. B. 4.

Some worthy person that can deny himself in stooping to such a condescent.

Worthington, to Hartlib, (1661,) Ep. 17.

CONDI'GN.† adj. [old Fr. condigne, from condignus, Lat.] Worthy of a person; suitable; deserved; merited: it is always used of something deserved by crimes, Dr. Johnson says; which is by no means the case. Sir Thomas Elyot uses it indifferently; and other good authorities shew, that it is used strictly for praiseworthy.

Unto so excellent a prince there shall not lack hereafter condigne writers to register his acts.

Sir T. Elyot, Gov. fol. 76.

Then shall they give condigne reprehensions, manifesting their faults.

Sir T. Elyot, Gov. fol. 209.

Herselfe, of all that rule, she deemed most condigne. Spenser, F. Q. vii. vi. 11.

They rather accrue unto the works already made, not only worthy or condign, but also meritorious. Mountagu, App. to Cæs. p. 202.

Unless it were a bloody murtherer,
I never gave them condign punishment.
Shakspeare, Hen. VI.

Consider who is your friend, he that would have brought him to condign punishment, or he that has saved him. Arbuthnot.

CONDI'GNESS. n. s. [from condign.] Suitableness; agreeableness to deserts. Dict.

CONDI'GNITY.* n. s. [from condign.] Merit; desert.

Condignity is much made of, [by the church of Rome,] as being a piece for the nonce of some importance; an opposite of some spirit to affront God, and peremptorily to challenge, This is my due. Mountagu, App. to Cæs. p. 201.

Such a worthiness of condignity, and proper merit of the heavenly glory, cannot be found in any the best, most perfect, and excellent of created beings. Bp. Bull's Works, i. 364.

He, who prays for a thing as God has appointed, gets thereby a right to the thing prayed for: but it is a right, not springing from any merit or condignity, either in the prayer itself, or the person that makes it, to the blessing which he prays for. South, Serm. on Extemp. Prayer.

CONDI'GNLY.† adv. [from condign.] Deservedly; according to merit. Dict.

Here you may see what persons may condignly bear the signs and tokens of arms.

Co'NFESSOR. n. s. [confesseur, Fr.]

1. One who makes profession of his faith in the face of danger. He who dies for religion is a martyr; he who suffers for it is a confessor.

The doctrine in the thirty-nine articles is so orthodoxly settled, as cannot be questioned without danger to our religion, which hath been sealed with the blood of so many martyrs and confessors. Bacon, Advice to Villiers.

Was not this an excellent confessor at least, if not a martyr, in this cause. Stilling fleet.

The patience and fortitude of a martyr or confessor lie concealed in the flourishing times of Christianity. Addison, Spect.

It was the assurance of a resurrection that gave patience to the confessor and courage to the martyr. Rogers.

2. He that hears confessions, and prescribes rules and measures of penitence.

See that Claudio
Be executed by nine to-morrow morning:
Bring him his confessor, let him be prepared;
For that's the utmost of his pilgrimage. Shaksp.

If you find any sin that lies heavy upon you, disburthen yourself of it into the bosom of your confessor, who stands between God and you to pray for you. Bp. Taylor.

One must be trusted; and he thought her fit,
As passing prudent, and a parlous wit:
To this sagacious confessor he went,
And told her. Dryden, Wife of Bath.

3. He who confesses his crimes. Dict.

CONFE'ST. adj. [a poetical word for confessed.] Open; known; acknowledged; not concealed; not disputed; apparent.

We contain a confiture house, where we make all sweetmeats, dry and moist, and divers pleasant wines. Bacon.

To CONFI'X. v. a. [configo confixum, Lat.] To fix down; to fasten.

As this is true,
Let me in safety raise me from my knees;
Or else, for ever be confixed here,
A marble monument! Shaks. Meas. for Meas.

CONFI'XURE.* n. s. [from confix.] The act of fastening.

How subject are we to embrace this earth, even while it wounds us by this confixure of ourselves to it! W. Mountagu, Dev. Ess. P. II. 1654, p. 55.

CONFLA'GRANT. adj. [conflagrans, Lat.] Burning together; involved in a general fire.

Then raise
From the conflagrant mass, purg'd and refin'd,
New heav'ns, new earth. Milton, P. L.

CONFLAGRA'TION. n. s. [conflagratio, Lat.]

1. A general fire spreading over a large space.

The opinion deriveth the complexion from the deviation of the sun, and the conflagration of all things under Phaeton. Brown, Vulg. Err.

Next o'er the plains, where ripen'd harvests grow,
The running conflagration spreads below.
Addison, Ovid.

Mankind hath had a gradual increase, notwithstanding what floods and conflagrations, and the religious profession of celibacy, may have interrupted. Bentley's Sermons.

2. It is generally taken for the fire which shall consume this world at the consummation of things.

CONFLA'TION. n. s. [conflatum, Lat.]

1. The act of blowing many instruments together.

The sweetest harmony is, when every part or instrument is not heard by itself, but a conflation of them all. Bacon.

2. A casting or melting of metal.

CONFLE'XURE. n. s. [conflexura, Lat.] A bending or turning.

To CONFLI'CT. v. n. [confligo, Lat.] To strive; to contest; to fight; to struggle; to contend; to encounter; to engage: properly by striking against one another.

Bare unhoused trunks
To the conflicting elements exposed,
Answer meer nature. Shakspeare, Timon.

You shall hear under the earth a horrible thundering of fire and water conflicting together. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

A man would be content to strive with himself, and conflict with great difficulties, in hopes of a mighty reward. Tillotson.

Lash'd into foam, the fierce conflicting brine
Seems o'er a thousand raging waves to burn.
Thomson.

Co'NFLICT. n. s. [conflictus, Lat.]

1. A violent collision, or opposition of two substances.

Pour dephlegmed spirit of vinegar upon salt of tartar, and there will be such a conflict or ebullition, as if there were scarce two more contrary bodies in nature. Boyle.

2. A combat; a fight between two. It is seldom used of a general battle.

The luckless conflict with the giant stout,
Wherein captiv'd, of life or death he stood in doubt.
Spenser, F. Q.

It is my father's face,
Whom in this conflict I unawares have kill'd.
Shakspeare.

3. Contest; strife; contention.

There is a kind of merry war betwixt signior Benedick and her: they never meet but there's a skirmish of wit between them. — Alas! he gets nothing by that. In our last conflict, four of his five wits went halting off. Shakspeare.

4. Struggle; agony; pang.

No assurance touching victories can make present conflicts so sweet and easy, but nature will shrink from them. Hooker.

If he attempt this great change, with what labour and conflict must he accomplish it? Rogers.

He perceiv'd
Th' unequal conflict; then, as angels look
On dying saints. Thomson, Summer.

Co'NFLUENCE. n. s. [confluo, Lat.]

1. The junction or union of several streams.

Nimrod, who usurped dominion over the rest, sat down in the very confluence of all those rivers which watered Paradise. Ralegh, Hist. of the World.

In the veins innumerable little rivulets have their confluence into the great vein, the common channel of the blood. Bentley.

2. The act of crowding to a place.

You see this confluence, this great flood of visitors. Shakspeare.

Some come to make merry, because of the confluence of all sorts. Bacon.

You had found by experience the trouble of all men's confluence, and for all matters, to yourself. Bacon to Villiers.

3. A concourse; a multitude crowded into one place.

This will draw a confluence of people from all parts of the country. Temple.

4. Collection; concurrence.

We may there be instructed how to rate all goods by those that will concentre into the felicity we shall possess, which shall be made up of the confluence, perfection and perpetuity of all true joys. Boyle.

CO'NFLUENT.† adj. [confluent, Fr. confluens, Lat.] Running one into another; meeting.

At length, to make their various currents one,
The congregated floods together run:
These confluent streams make some great river's head,
By stores still melting and descending fed.
Blackmore.

Co'NFLUX. n. s. [confluxio, Lat.]

1. The union of several currents; concourse.

Knots by the conflux of meeting sap
Infect the sound pine and divert his grain. Shaks.

2. Crowd; multitude collected.

To the gates cast round thine eye, and see
What conflux issuing forth, or entering in.
Milton, P. L.

He quickly, by the general conflux and concourse of the whole people, streightened his quarters. Clarendon.

CONFO'RM.† adj. [conformis, Latin. We write deform and uniform; and this adjective also is the true word; conformable, however, has taken place of it.] Assuming the same form; wearing the same form; resembling; similar.

Variety of tunes doth dispose the spirits to variety of passions conform unto them.
Bacon, Nat. Hist.

Your opinion seemeth to you to be conform to all reason, law, religion, piety, wisdom, and policy. Hayward, Answ. to Dolman, ch. 8.

Care must be taken that the interpretation given be every way conform to the analogy of faith, and fully accordant to other Scripture.
Bp. Hall, Cases of Conscience.

To CONFO'RM.† v. a. [conformo, Lat.]

1. To reduce to the like appearance, shape, or manner with something else: with to.

Then followed that most natural effect of conforming one's self to that which she did like.
Sidney.

The apostles did conform the Christians, as much as might be, according to the pattern of the Jews. Hooker.

Demand of them wherefore they conform not themselves unto the order of the church? Hooker.

2. Without to.

That in perfection, this in sorrow, dies:
Yet death, more equal, these extremes conforms,
And covers their corrupting flesh with worms.
Sandys, Paraphr. of Job, p. 32.

To CONFO'RM. v. n. To comply with; to yield: with to.

Among mankind so few there are,
Who will conform to philosophick fare.
Dryden, Juv.

CONFO'RMABLE. adj. [from conform.]

1. Having the same form; using the same manners; agreeing either in exterior or moral characters; similar; resembling.

The Gentiles were not made conformable unto the Jews, in that which was to cease at the coming of Christ. Hooker.

2. It has commonly to before that with which there is agreement.

He gives a reason conformable to the principles.
Arbuthnot.

3. Sometimes with, not improperly: but to is used with the verb.

The fragments of Sappho give us a taste of her way of writing, perfectly conformable with that character we find of her. Addison, Spect.

4. Agreeable; suitable; not opposite: consistent.

Nature is very consonant and conformable to herself. Newton.

The productions of a great genius, with many lapses, are preferable to the works of an inferiour author, scrupulously exact, and conformable to all the rules of correct writing. Addison.

5. Compliant: ready to follow directions; submissive; peaceable; obsequious.

I've been to you a true and humble wife,
At all time to your will conformable.
Shakspeare, Hen. VIII.

For all the kingdoms of the earth to yield themselves willingly conformable, in whatever should be required, it was their duty. Hooker.

Such delusions are reformed by a conformable devotion, and the well-tempered zeal of the true Christian spirit. Sprat.

CONFO'RMABLY, adv. [from conformable.] With conformity; agreeably; suitably: it has to.

So a man observe the agreement of his own imaginations, and talk conformably, it is all certainty. Locke.

I have treated of the sex conformably to this definition. Addison.

CONFORMA'TION. n. s. [French; conformatio, Latin.]

1. The form of things as relating to each other; the particular texture, and consistence of the parts of a body, and their disposition to make a whole: as, light of different colours is reflected from bodies according to their different conformation.

Varieties are found in the different natural shapes of the mouth, and several conformations of the organs. Holder.

Where there happens to be such a structure and conformation of the earth, as that the fire may pass freely into these spiracles, it then readily gets out. Woodward, Nat. Hist.

2. The act of producing suitableness, or conformity to any thing: with to.

Virtue and vice, sin and holiness, and the conformation of our hearts and lives to the duties of true religion and morality, are things of more consequence than the furniture of understanding. Watts.

CONFO'RMER.* n. s. [from conform.] One that conforms to, or complies with, an established doctrine.

He meant it of the publick authorized doctrine of the church of England, and of conformers unto the said doctrine of that church. Mountagu, App. to Cæs. p. 187.

CONFO'RMIST.† n. s. [from conform.]

1. One that complies with the worship of the church of England; not a dissenter, Dr. Johnson says; citing only the authority of Dunton. It has, however, a general sense also; and a better example than that of Dunton, in the present meaning, may be given from the admirable author of the Christian Life.

There are too many men, who, to credit their ill designs against government, shelter themselves under the wings of the church; yet it's evident, they are either non-conformists to the church, or conformists that act against their own principles. Scott, Serm. iv.

They were not both nonconformists, neither both conformists. Dunton.

2. One who submits or yields.

So much have you made me a cheerful conformist to your judgement and charity. Bp. Taylor, Artif. Handsom. p. 199.

CONFO'RMITY. n. s. [from conform.]

1. Similitude; resemblance; the state of having the same character of manners or form.

By the knowledge of truth, and exercise of virtue, man, amongst the creatures of this world, aspireth to the greatest conformity with God. Hooker.

Judge not what is best
By pleasure, though to nature seeming meet;
Created as thou art to nobler end,
Holy and pure, conformity divine! Milton, P. L.

Space and duration have a great conformity in this, that they are justly reckoned amongst our simple ideas. Locke.

This metaphor would not have been so general, had there not been a conformity between the mental taste and the sensitive taste. Addison, Spect.

2. It has in some authors with before the model to which the conformity is made.

The end of all religion is but to draw us to a conformity with God. Decay of Piety.

3. In some to.

We cannot be otherwise happy but by our conformity to God. Tillotson.

Conformity in building to other civil nations, hath disposed us to let our old wooden dark houses fall to decay. Graunt.

4. Consistency.

Many instances prove the conformity of the essay with the notions of Hippocrates. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

CONFORTA'TION. n. s. [from conforto, a low Latin word.] Collation of strength: corroboration.

For corroboration and confortation, take such bodies as are of astringent quality, without manifest cold. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

To CONFO'UND. v. a. [confondre, Fr. confundo, Latin.]

1. To mingle things so that their several forms or natures cannot be discerned.

Let us go down, and there confound their language, that they may not understand one another's speech. Gen. xi. 7.

Two planets rushing from aspect malign
Of fiercest opposition, and mid sky
Should combat, and their jarring spheres confound. Milton, P. L.

2. To perplex; to compare or mention without due distinction.

A fluid body and a wetting liquor are wont, because they agree in many things, to be confounded. Boyle.

They who strip not ideas from the marks men use for them, but confound them with words, must have endless dispute. Locke.

3. To disturb the apprehension by indistinct words or notions.

I am yet to think, that men find their simple ideas agree, though, in discourse, they confound one another with different names. Locke.

4. To throw into consternation; to perplex; to terrify; to amaze; to astonish; to stupify.

So spake the son of God; and Satan stood
A while as mute, confounded what to say. Milton, P. R.

Now with furies surrounded,
Despairing, confounded,
He trembles, he glows,
Amidst Rhodope's snows. Pope, St. Cecilia.

5. To destroy; to overthrow.

The sweetest honey
Is loathsome in its own deliciousness,
And in the taste confounds the appetite. Shaksp.

The gods confound thee! do'st thou hold there still! Shakspeare.

Let them be confounded in all their power and might, and let their strength be broken. Dan. xxi.

So deep a malice to confound the race
Of mankind in one root. Milton, P. L.

CONFO'UNDED. particip. adj. [from confound.] Hateful; detestable; enormous; odious: a low cant word.

A most confounded reason for his brutish conception. Grew.

Sir, I have heard another story,
He was a most confounded Tory;
And grew, or he is much bely'd,
Extremely dull before he dy'd. Swift.

CONFO'UNDEDLY. adv. [from confounded.] Hatefully; shamefully; a low or ludicrous word.

You are confoundedly given to squirting up and down, and chattering. L'Estrange.

Thy speculations begin to smell confoundedly of woods and meadows. Addison, Spect.

CONFO'UNDEDNESS.* n. s. [from confounded.] State of being confounded or vanquished.

Of the same strain is their witty descant of my confoundedness. Milton, Animad. Rem. Def.

CONFO'UNDER.† n. s. [from confound.]

1. He who disturbs, perplexes, terrifies, or destroys.

Ignorance — the darkener of man's life, the disturber of his reason, and common confounder of truth. B. Jonson, Discov.

In the confounders of those houses, [there was] some detestation of the vices of friars, more desire of the wealth of friars. Fuller's Holy War, p. 242.

2. He who mentions things without due distinction.

The confounder of our church with Charenton-Temple, is now at leisure to finish and polish those precious manuscripts, wherewith he adorns certain of his elect ladies' closets here. Dean Martin's Letters, (1660,) p. 71.

CONFRATE'RNITY.† n. s. [from con and fraternitas, Latin.] A brotherhood; a body of men united for some religious purpose.

We find days appointed to be kept, and a confraternity established for that purpose with the laws of it. Stillingfleet

The confraternities are in the Roman church, what corporations are in a commonwealth. Brevint, Saul and Sam. at Endor, p. 264.

CONFRI'ER.* n. s. [Fr. confrere.] One of the same religious order.

It was enacted, that none of the brethren or confriers of the said religion within this realm of England, and land of Ireland, should be called knights of Rhodes. Weever.

CONFRICA'TION. n. s. [from con and frico, Lat.] The act of rubbing against any thing.

It hath been reported, that ivy hath grown out of a stag's horn; which they suppose did rather come from a confrication of the horn upon the ivy, than from the horn itself. Bacon.

To CONFRO'NT. v. a. [confronter, Fr.]

1. To stand against another in full view; to face.

He spoke, and then confronts the bull;
And on his ample forehead, aiming full,
The deadly stroke descended. Dryden, Virg.

2. To stand face to face, in opposition to another.

The East and West churches did both confront the Jews and concur with them. Hooker.

Blood hath bought blood, and blows have answer'd blows,
Strength match'd with strength, and power confronted power. Shakspeare, K. John.

Bellona's bridegroom, lapt in proof,
Confronted him with self comparisons,
Point against point rebellious, arm 'gainst arm. Shakspeare, Macbeth.

3. To oppose one evidence to another in open court.

We began to lay his unkindness unto him: he seeing himself confronted by so many, went not to denial, but to justify his cruel falshood. Sidney.

4. To compare one thing with another.

When I confront a medal with a verse, I only shew you the same design executed by different hands. Addison on Medals.

CONFRONTA'TION.† n. s. [French.] The act of bringing two evidences face to face.

The argument would require a great number of comparisons, confrontations, and combinations, to find out the connection between the two manners. Swinburne, Trav. through Spain, L. 44.

To CONFU'SE. v. a. [confusus, Latin.]

1. To disorder; to disperse irregularly.

Thus roving on
In confus'd march forlorn, the adventurous bands —

View'd first their lamentable lot, and found
No rest. Milton, P. L.

2. To mix; not separate.
At length an univeral hubbub wild,
Of stunning sounds and voices all confus'd,
Borne through the hollow dark, assaults his ear.
Milton, P. L.

3. To perplex, not distinguish; to obscure.
We may have a clear and distinct idea of the existence of many things, though our ideas of their intimate essences and causes are very confused and obscure. Watts, Logick.

4. To hurry the mind.
Confus'd and sadly she at length replies.
Pope, Statius.

CONFU'SE.* adj. [Lat. confusus.] Mixed; confounded; not separated. Huloet.
A confuse cry, shout, or noise of sundry tunes.
Barret.

CONFU'SEDLY. adv. [from confused.]

1. In a mixed mass; without separation.
These four nations are every where mixt in the Scriptures, because they dwelt confusedly together. Ralegh, Hist.

2. Indistinctly; one mingled with another.
Th' inner court with horror, noise and tears,
Confus'dly fill'd; the women's shrieks and cries
The arch'd vaults re-echo. Denham.
On mount Vesuvius next he fix'd his eyes,
And saw the smoaking tops confus'dly rise;
A hideous ruin! Addison on Italy.
I viewed through a prism, and saw them most confusedly defined, so that I could not distinguish their smaller parts from one another.
Newton, Opticks.
Heroes and heroines shouts confus'dly rise,
And base and treble voices strike the skies. Pope.

3. Not clearly; not plainly.
He confusedly and obscurely delivered his opinion. Clarendon.

4. Tumultuously; hastily; not deliberately; not exactly.
The propriety of thoughts and words, which are the hidden beauties of a play, are but confusedly judged in the vehemence of action. Dryden.

CONFU'SEDNESS.† n. s. [from confused.] Want of distinctness; want of clearness.
Hitherunto these titles of honour carry a kind of confusedness, and rather betokened a successive office than an established dignity.
Carew, Surv. of Cornwal.
Yet do I see through this confusedness some little comfort. Beaum. and Fl. Woman-hater.
The cause of the confusedness of our notions, next to natural inability, is want of attention.
Norris.

CONFU'SELY.* adv. [from the adj. confuse.] Obscurely, not with sufficient declaration; without order; in a mixed manner. Barret.

CONFU'SION. n. s. [from confuse.]

1. Irregular mixture; tumultuous medley.
God, only wise, to punish pride of wit,
Among men's wits hath this confusion wrought;
As the proud tow'r, whose points the clouds did hit,
By tongues confusion was to ruin brought.
Davies.

2. Tumult; disorder.
God is not a God of sedition and confusion, but of order and of peace. Hooker, Pref.
This is a happier and more comely time,
Than when these fellows ran about the streets
Crying confusion. Shakspeare, Coriol.

3. Indistinct; combination.
The confusion of two different ideas, which a customary connexion of them in their minds hath made to them almost one, fills their head with false views, and their reasonings with false consequences. Locke.

4. Overthrow; destruction.
The strength of their illusion,
Shall draw him in to his confusion. Shasks. Macb.

5. Astonishment; distraction of mind; hurry of ideas.
Confusion dwelt in ev'ry face,
And fear in ev'ry heart,
When waves on waves, and gulphs in gulphs,
O'ercame the pilot's art. Spectator, No. 489.

CONFU'TABLE. adj. [from confute.] Possible to be disproved; possible to be shewn false.
At the last day, that inquisitor shall not present to God a bundle of calumnies, or confutable accusations; but will offer unto his omniscience a true list of our transgressions. Brown.

CONFU'TANT.* n. s. [from confute.] One who undertakes to confute another.
Now that the confutant may also know as he desires, what force of teaching there is sometimes in laughter. Milton, Apology for Smectym.

CONFUTA'TION. n. s. [confutatio, Latin.] The act of confuting; disproof.
A confutation of atheism from the frame of the world. Bentley.

To CONFU'TE. v. a. [confuto, Latin.] To convict of errour or falsehood; to disprove.
He could on either side dispute;
Confute, change hands, and still confute.
Hudibras.
For a man to doubt whether there be any hell, and thereupon to live as if there were none, but, when he dies, to find himself confuted in the flames, must be the height of woe. South.

CONFU'TEMENT.* n. s. [from confute.] Disproof.
An opinion held by some of the best among reformed writers without scandal or confutement.
Milton, Tetrachordon.

CONFU'TER.* n. s. [from confute.] One who convicts another of mistake.
We have promised that their own dearest doctors and divines should be their confuters.
Bp. Morton, Episc. Asserted. p. 102.
And this is the immediate reason here why our enraged confuter, that he may be as perfect a hypocrite as Caiaphas, ere he be a high priest, cries out, "Horrid blasphemy!" and, like a recreant Jew, calls for stones.
Milton, Apology for Smectym.

CONGE'.† n. s. [congé, French. Our word is often written congie.]

1. Act of reverence; bow; courtesy.
Because they cannot ride a horse, which every clown can do; salute and court a gentlewoman, carve at table, cringe, and make congies, which every swasher can do; they are laughed to scorn!
Burton, Anat. of Mel. p. 127.
The captain salutes you with conge profound,
And your ladyship curt'sies half way to the ground.
Swift.

2. Leave; farewell.
So, courteous conge both did give and take,
With right hands plighted, pledges of good will.
Spenser, F. Q.

To CONGE.† v. n. [from the noun.] To take leave.
I have congeed with the duke, and done my adieu with his nearest. Shakspeare, All's well.
Then with short flight up to the oak he springs,
Where he thrice congied after his ascent.
More, Song of the Soul, ii. 63.

CONGE' D'ELIRE is French; and signifies, in common law, the king's permission royal to a dean and chapter, in time of vacation, to choose a bishop. The king, as sovereign patron of all archbishopricks, bishopricks, and other ecclesiastical benefices, had, in ancient times, the free appointment of all ecclesiastical dignities; investing them first per baculum & annulum, and afterwards by his letters patent. In process of time he made the election over to others, under certain forms and conditions; as, that they should, at every vacation, before they choose, demand of the king a congé d'elire, that is, licence to proceed to election. Cowel.
A woman, when she has made her own choice, for form's sake, sends a conge d'elire to her friends.
Spectator, No. 475.

CO'NGE. n. s. [In architecture.] A moulding in form of a quarter round, or a cavetto, which serves to separate two members from one another: such is that which joins the shaft of the column to the cincture. Chambers.

To CONGE'AL.† v. a. [congelo, Latin. Formerly the word was also accented on the first syllable; as in the passage from Shakspeare's Rich. III. And in the old tragedy of Locrine, ascribed to Shakspeare; as also in Milton's Comus.]

1. To turn, by frost, from a fluid to a solid state.
What more miraculous thing may be told,
Than ice which is congeal'd with senseless cold,
Should kindle fire by wonderful device? Spenser.
I'll pass the frozen zone, where icy flakes
Do lie, like mountains in the congeal'd sea.
Tragedy of Locrine.
Wherewith she freez'd her foes to congeal'd stone. Milton, Com. 449.
In whose capacious womb,
A vapoury deluge lies, to snow congeal'd.
Thomson, Winter.

2. To bind or fix, as by cold.
Oh, gentlemen, see! see, dead Henry's wounds
Open their congeal'd mouths, and bleed afresh.
Shakspeare, Rich. III.
Too much sadness hath congeal'd your blood.
Shakspeare.

To CONGE'AL. v. n. To concrete; to gather into a mass by cold.
In the midst of molten lead, when it beginneth to congeal, make a little dent, into which put quicksilver wrapt in linen, and it will fix and run no more, and endure the hammer. Bacon.
When water congeals, the surface of the ice is smooth and level, as the surface of the water was before. Burnet's Theory.

CONGE'ALMENT.† n. s. [from congeal.] The clot formed by congelation; concretion.
Enter the city, clip your wives, your friends;
Tell them your feats, whilst they with joyful tears
Wash the congealment from your wounds.
Shakspeare, Ant. and Cleop.
We do not see that while we still affect by all means a rigid external formality, we may as soon fall again into a gross conforming stupidity, a stark and dead congealment of "wood, hay, and stubble." Milton, Areopagitica.

CONGE'LABLE. adj. [from congeal.] Susceptible of congelation; capable of losing its fluidity.
The consistencies of bodies are very divers: dense, rare, tangible, pneumatical, fixed, hard, soft, congelable, not congelable, liquefiable, not liquefiable. Bacon.
The chymists define salt, from some of its properties, to be a body fixable in the fire, and congelable again by cold into brittle glebes or crystals.
Arbuthnot on Aliments.

CONGELA'TION. n. s. [from congeal.]

1. Act of turning fluids to solids, by cold.

The capillary tubes are obstructed either by outward compression or congelation of the fluid. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

There are congelations of the redundant water, precipitations, and many other operations. Arbuthnot on Air.

2. State of being congealed, or made solid, by cold.

Many waters and springs will never freeze; and many parts in rivers and lakes, where there are mineral eruptions, will still persist without congelation. Brown, Vulg. Err.

CONGEMINA'TION.* n. s. [old Fr. congemination, from the Lat. congeminatio.] A doubling, or often repeating; a figure of speech, as epizeuxis. Cotgrave.

The cherry-tree has been often grafted on the laurel, to which it is a congener. Miller.

CONGE'NERACY.* n. s. [from congener.] Similarity of origin.

That they are ranged neither according to the merit, nor congeneracy, of their conditions. More, Expos. Seven Ch. p. 172.

CONGE'NEROUS. adj. [congener, Latin.] Of the same kind; arising from the same original.

Those bodies being of a congenerous nature, do readily receive the impressions of their nature. Brown, Vulg. Err.

From extreme and lasting colds proceeds a great run of apoplexies, and other congenerous diseases. Arbuthnot on Air.

CONGE'NEROUSNESS.† n. s. [from congenerous.] The quality of being from the same original; belonging to the same class. Dict.

Rational means, and persuasive arguments, whose force and strength must lye in their congenerousness and suitableness with the ancient ideas and inscriptions of truth upon our souls. Hallywell, Sav. of Souls, (1677,) p. 84.

CONGE'NIAL. adj. [con and genus, Lat.] Partaking of the same genius; kindred; cognate; in Swift it is followed by with.

He sprung, without any help, by a kind of congenial composure, as we may term it, to the likeness of our late sovereign and master. Wotton.

You look with pleasure on those things which are somewhat congenial, and of a remote kindred to your own conceptions. Dryd. Ded. of Juvenal.

Smit with the love of sister arts we came,
And met congenial mingling flame with flame. Pope.

He acquires a courage, and stiffness of opinion, not at all congenial with him. Swift.

CONGENIA'LITY.† n. s. [from congenial.] Participation of the same genius; cognation of mind, or nature.

Painters and poets have alwayes had a kind of congeniality. Wotton, Elements of Architecture.

CONGE'NIALNESS. n. s. [from congenial.] Cognation.

CONGE'NIOUS.* adj. [con and genus, Lat.] Of the same kind. Not now in use.

In the blood thus drop'd there remains a spirit of life congenious to that in the body. Hales, Rem. p. 288.

CONGE'NITE. adj. [congenitus, Latin.] Of the same birth; born with another; connate; begotten together.

Many conclusions of moral and intellectual truths seem, upon this account, to be congenite with us, connatural to us, and engraven in the very frame of the soul. Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

Did we learn an alphabet in our embryo-state! And how comes it to pass, that we are not aware of any such congenite apprehensions? Glanville's Scepsis.

CO'NGER.† n. s. [congrus, Latin, γόγγρος, Gr. formed of γράω, to eat, the fish being very voracious.] The sea-eel.

Many fish, whose shape and nature are much like the eel, frequent both the sea and fresh rivers; as the mighty conger taken often in the Severn. Walton's Angler.

CONGE'RIES.† n. s. [Latin.] A mass of small bodies heaped up together.

Congeries [is] a multiplication or heaping together of manye wordes, signifying divers thinges of like nature. Peacham, Garden of Eloquence, (1577,) Q. ij.

The air is nothing but a congeries or heap of small, and for the most part, of flexible particles of several sizes, and of all kinds of figures. Boyle.

To CONGE'ST.† v. a. [congero, congestum, Lat. It is very remarkable, that of this well established word Dr. Johnson should have given neither authority nor example; merely introducing it into his dictionary, as if before unnoticed or unused.] To heap up; to gather together.

It shewed his bounty and magnificence in congesting matter for building the temple, as gold, silver, brass, &c. Ralegh, Maxims of State.

Thou that didst order this congested heap,
When it was chaos; 'twixt thy spacious palms
Forming it to this vast rotundity.
Beaum. and Fl. Four Plays in One.

In which place is congested the whole sum of all those heads, which before I have collected. Fotherby, Atheom. p. 253.

He had congested and amassed together such infinite monies. Fotherby, Atheom. p. 205.

Yet his congested wealth shall melt like snow. Sandys, Paraphr. of Job, p. 24.

When thou, O Lord, the rivers didst divide,
And on the chariots of salvation ride,
Through the congested billows of the seas.
Sandys, Sacred Songs, p. 21.

CONGE'STIBLE. adj. [from congest.] That may be heaped up. Dict.

CONGE'STION.† n. s. [congestio, Latin.]

1. A collection of matter, as in abscesses and tumours. Quincy.

Congestion is then said to be the cause of a tumour, when the growth of it is slow, and without pain. Wiseman.

2. A gathering together; formation of a mass.

So is the opinion of some divines, that, until after the flood, were no mountains, but that by congestion of sand, earth, and such stuff as we now see hills strangely fraughted with, in the waters they were first cast up. Selden, on Drayton's Polyolb. S. 9.

CO'NGIARY.† n. s. [congiarium, from congius, a measure of corn, Lat.] A gift distributed to the Roman people or soldiery, originally in corn, afterwards in money.

Thus did Constantine settle on the church, and on learned men, all those congiaries, titles, oblations, and other ways of support. Waterhouse's Apol. for Learn. 1653, p. 24.

We see on them the emperor and general officers, standing as they distributed a congiary to the soldiers or people. Addison.

To CONGLA'CIATE. v. n. [conglaciatus, Latin.] To turn to ice.

No other doth properly conglaciate but water; for the determination of quicksilver is properly fixation, and that of milk coagulation. Brown, Vulg. Err.

CONGLACIA'TION. n. s. [from conglaciate.] The state of being changed, or act of changing into ice.

If crystal be a stone, it is concreted by a mineral spirit and lapidifical principles; for, while it remained in a fluid body, it was a subject very unfit for proper conglaciation. Brown.

To CO'NGLOBATE.† v. a. [conglobatus, Latin. This is not a word of frequent occurrence; but it has been admirably employed by Johnson himself, who also has adopted, in imitation of it, the verb conglobulate. See To CONGLOBULATE.] To gather into a hard firm ball.

The testicle, as is said, is one large conglobated gland, consisting of soft fibres, all in one convolution. Grew.

He, who is not accustomed to require rigorous accuracy from himself, will scarcely believe how much a few hours take from certainty of knowledge, and distinctness of imagery; how the succession of objects will be broken; how separate parts will be confused; and how many particular features and discriminations will be compressed and conglobated into one gross and general idea. Johnson, Journ to the West. Islands.

CO'NGLOBATE.† adj. [from the verb.] It has escaped Dr. Johnson, that Dryden uses this word, and places the accent on the second syllable. Moulded into a firm ball, of which the fibres are not distinctly visible.

Heaven's gifts, which do like falling stars appear
Scatter'd in others; all, as in their sphere,
Were fix'd conglobate in his soul.
Dryden, on the Death of Ld. Hastings.

Fluids are separated from the blood in the liver, and the other conglobate and conglomerate glands. Cheyne, Phil. Prin.

CO'NGLOBATELY. adv. [from conglobate.] In a spherical form. Dict.

CONGLOBA'TION. n. s. [from conglobate.] A round body; collection into a round mass.

In this spawn are discerned many specks, or little conglobations, which in time become black. Brown.

To CONGLO'BE. v. a. [conglobo, Lat.] To gather into a round mass; to consolidate in a ball.

Then [he] founded, then conglob'd
Like things to like. Milton, P. L.

For all their centre found,
Hung to the goddess, and coher'd around:
Not closer, orb in orb conglob'd, are seen
The buzzing bees about their dusky queen.
Pope, Dunciad.

To CONGLO'BE. v. n. To coalesce into a round mass.

Thither they
Hasted with glad precipitance, up-roll'd
As drops on dust conglobing from the dry.
Milton, P. L.

To CONGLO'BULATE.* v. n. [from Lat. con and globulus.] To gather together into a little round mass.

Swallows certainly sleep all the winter. A number of them conglobulate together, by flying round and round, and then all in a heap throw themselves under water, and lye in the bed of a river. Johnson, in Boswell's Life of Johnson.

To CONGLO'MERATE. v. a. [conglomero, Lat.] To gather into a ball, like a ball of thread: to inweave into a round mass.

The liver is one great conglomerated gland, composed of innumerable small glands, each of which consisteth of soft fibres, in a distinct or separate convolution. Grew, Cosmol.

CONGLO'MERATE. adj. [from the verb.]

1. Gathered into a round ball, so as that the constituent parts and fibres are distinct.

Fluids are separated in the liver, and the other conglobate and conglomerate glands. Cheyne, Phil. Prin.

2. Collected; twisted together.

The beams of light, when they are multiplied and conglomerate, generate heat. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

CONGLOMERA'TION. n. s. [from conglomerate.]

1. Collection of matter into a loose ball.
2. Intertexture; mixture.

The multiplication and conglomeration of sounds doth generate rarefaction of the air. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

To CONGLU'TINATE.† v. a. [conglutino, Latin. This is one of our oldest verbs, (though given without any authority by by Dr. Johnson,) being in Huloet's dictionary.] To cement; to reunite; to heal wounds.

Without an infinite power God could not conjoin, cement, conglutinate, and incorporate them [our bodies] again into the same flesh. Pearson on the Creed, Art. XI.

Starch, which is nothing but the flower of bran, will make a clinging paste, the which will conglutinate some things, though not every thing. Sir W. Petty, Sprat's Hist. R. Soc. p. 291.

To CONGLU'TINATE. v. n. To coalesce; to unite by the intervention of a callus.

CONGLU'TINATE.* adj. [from the verb.] Joined together.

All these together conglutinate, and effectually executed, maketh a perfect definition of justice. Sir T. Elyot, Gov. fol. 142.

CONGLUTINA'TION.† n. s. [old Fr. conglutination.]

1. The act of uniting wounded bodies; reunion; healing.

The cause is a temperate conglutination; for both bodies are clammy and viscous, and do bridle the deflux of humours to the hurts. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

To this elongation of the fibres is owing the union or conglutination of parts separated by a wound. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

2. Simply, junction; union.

The common name of Spain, no doubt, hath been a special means of the better union and conglutination of the several kingdoms of Castile, Arragon, &c. Bacon, of the Union of England and Scotland.

CONGLU'TINATIVE. adj. [from conglutinate.] Having the power of uniting wounds.

CONGLU'TINATOR. n. s. [from conglutinate.] That which has the power of uniting wounds.

The osteocolla is recommended as a conglutinator of broken bones. Woodward on Fossils.

CONGRA'TULANT. adj. [from congratulate.] Rejoicing in participation; expressing participation of another's joy.

Forth rush'd in haste the great consulting peers,
Rais'd from the dark divan, and with like joy
Congratulant approach'd him. Milton, P. L.

To CONGRA'TULATE.† v. a. [gratulor, Latin.]

1. To compliment upon any happy event; to expres joy for the good of another.

He sent Hadoram his son to king David, to congratulate him, because he had fought against Hadarezer, and smitten him. 1 Chron. xviii. 10.

I congratulate our English tongue, that it has been enriched with words from all our neighbours. Watts, Logick.

2. It has sometimes the accusative case of the cause of joy, and to before the person.

An ecclesiastical union within yourselves, I am rather ready to congratulate to you. Sprat's Serm.

The subjects of England may congratulate to themselves, that the nature of our government and the clemency of our king secure us. Dryden, Pref. to Aurengzebe.

To CONGRA'TULATE. v. n. To rejoice in participation.

I cannot but congratulate with my country, which hath outdone all Europe in advancing conversation. Swift.

CONGRATULA'TION.† n. s. [from congratulate.]

1. The act of professing joy for the happiness or success of another.

Wherefore then serves all this, but to stir us up to a threefold use; of holy thankfulness, of pity, of indignation? The two first are those "duo ubera sponsæ," the two breasts of Christ's spouse, as Barnard calls them, congratulation and compassion. Bp. Hall, Serm. Works, ii. 360.

All our good old friends that are gone to heaven before us, shall meet us as soon as we are landed upon the shore of eternity; and, with infinite congratulations for our safe arrival, shall conduct us into the company of the patriarchs and prophets, apostles, and martyrs. Scott, Christian Life, i. i.

What unspeakable rejoicing and congratulations will there be between us. Ibid. i. iii.

2. The form in which joy for the happiness of another is expressed.

CONGRA'TULATOR.* n. s. [Lat.] One who offers congratulation to another.

Nothing more fortunately auspicious could happen to us, at our first entrance upon the government, than such a congratulator. Milton, Lett. of State.

CONGRATULA'TORY.† adj. [from congratulate.] Expressing joy for the good fortune of another.

Letters are — consolatory, monitory, or congratulatory. Howell, Lett. i. i. 1.

A solemn congratulatory procession of all the monks marching out to meet and receive him. Warton, Hist. of Eng. Poetry, i. 283.

To CONGRE'E. v. n. [from gré, French.] To agree; to accord; to join; to unite. Not in use.

For government,
Put into parts, doth keep in one concent,
Congreeing in a full and natural close. Shakspeare, Hen. V.

To CONGRE'ET. v. n. [from con and greet.] To salute reciprocally. Not in use.

My office hath so far prevail'd,
That face to face, and royal eye to eye,
You have congreeted. Shakspeare, Hen. V.

To CO'NGREGATE. v. a. [congrego, Lat.] To collect together; to assemble; to bring into one place.

Any multitude of Christian men congregated, may be termed by the name of a church. Hooker.

These waters were afterwards congregated, and called the sea. Ralegh, Hist. of the World.

Tempests themselves, high seas, and howling winds,
The gutter'd rocks and congregated sands,
As having sense of beauty, do omit
Their mortal natures. Shakspeare, Othello.

The dry land, earth; and the great receptacle
Of congregated waters, he call'd seas;
And saw that it was good. Milton, P. L.

Heat congregates homogeneal bodies and separates heterogeneal ones. Newton, Opticks.

Light, congregated by a burning glass, acts most upon sulphureous bodies, to turn them into fire. Newton, Opticks.

To CO'NGREGATE. v. n. To assemble; to meet; to gather together.

He rails,
Ev'n there where merchants most do congregate,
On me, my bargains. Shaksp. Merch. of Venice.

'Tis true, (as the old proverb doth relate)
Equals with equals often congregate. Denham.

CO'NGREGATE.† adj. [from the verb.] Collected; compact.

Who now, in th' highest sky,
Was placed in his principall estate,
With all the gods about him congregate. Spenser, F. Q. vii. vi. 19.

Where the matter is most congregate, the cold is the greater. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

CONGREGA'TION.† n. s. [from congregate.]

1. The act of collecting.

The means of reduction by the fire, is but by congregation of homogeneal parts. Bacon.

2. A collection; a mass of various parts brought together.

This brave o'erhanging firmament appears no other thing to me, than a foul and pestilent congregation of vapours. Shakspeare.

3. An assembly met to worship God in publick, and hear doctrine.

The words which the minister first pronounceth, the whole congregation shall repeat after him. Hooker.

The practice of those that prefer houses before churches, and a conventicle before the congregation. South.

If those preachers, who abound in epiphonemas, would look about them, they would find part of their congregation out of countenance, and the other asleep. Swift.

4. A distinct academical assembly; by the members of which particular business of the university is transacted. See also CONVOCATION.

By a composition entered into between the university of Oxford and the founder of New College, it was agreed that the fellows thereof should be admitted to all degrees in the university without asking any grace of the congregation of masters. Le Neve, Lives of Eng. Bishops, P. I. p. 84.

CONGREGA'TIONAL.† adj. [from congregation.]

1. Pertaining to a congregation or assembly of such Christians as hold every congregation to be a separate and independant church.

The consistorial and congregational pretences were twins of the same birth; though the younger served the elder; and, being much overpowered, sunk in the stream of time, till it appeared again in this unhappy age, amongst the ghosts of so many revived errors, that have escaped from their tombs, to walk up and down, and disturb the world. Abp. Sancroft, Serm. p. 13.

Mr. Baxter — takes great pains to unite the classical and congregational brethren. Bp. Nicolson to Mr. Yates, 1699.

Every parish had a congregational or parochial presbytery for the affairs of its own circle. Warton, Notes on Milton's Poems.

2. Publick; general; respecting the audience as assembled in the church.

He [Abp. Parker] directs a distinct and audible mode of congregational singing. Warton, Hist. of Eng. Poetry, iii. 176.

My subject is only general congregational psalmody. Mason on Church Musick, p. 196.

CO'NGRESS.† n. s. [congressus, Lat.]

1. A meeting; a shock; a conflict.

Here Pallas urges on, and Lausus there;
Their congress in the field great Jove withstands,
Both doom'd to fall, but fall by greater hands.
Dryden, Æn.

From these laws may be deduced the rules of the congresses and reflections of two bodies.
Cheyne, Phil. Prin.

2. A meeting, not as a shock, or conflict, but of ceremony; an introduction to others.

In modern practice, especially with us in England, that ceremony is used as much in our adieus, as in the first congress.
Sir K. Digby, Annot. on Rel. Med. p. 76.

3. An appointed meeting for settlement of affairs between different nations; as, the congress of Cambray.

4. A coming together, in a sexual meaning. See CONGRESSIVE.

The congress between the bitch and the wolf was immediate. Pennant.

CONGRE'SSION.* n. s. [old Fr. congression.] Company; an assembly, or meeting together. Cotgrave.

CONGRE'SSIVE. adj. [from congress.] Meeting; encountering; coming together.

If it be understood of sexes conjoined, all plants are female; and if of disjoined and congressive generation, there is no male or female in them.
Brown, Vulg. Err.

To CONGRU'E. v. n. [from congruo, Lat.] To agree; to be consistent with; to suit; to be agreeable. Not in use.

Our sovereign process imports at full,
By letters congruing to that effect,
The present death of Hamlet. Shaks. Hamlet.

CO'NGRUENCE.† n. s. [congruentia, Lat.] Agreement; suitableness of one thing to another; consistency.

The same which thereto is accessary, and of congruence appertaining.
Martin on the Marr. of Priests, (1554,) x. ii.

Those virtues of whom I have spoken of good reason and congruence. Sir T. Elyot, Gov. fol. 190.

Divers translations, saith he, [St. Augustin,] have made many times the harder and darker sentences more plain and open; so that of congruence no offence can justly be taken for this new labour.
Abp. Parker, Pref. to the Tr. of the Old Test.

O, now methinks a sullen tragick scene
Would suit the time with pleasing congruence.
Marston, Antonio's Revenge.

CO'NGRUENCY.* n. s. [from congruence.] Agreement.

The philosophick cabbala and the text have a marvellous fit and easy congruency in this place.
More, Conj. Cab. (1653,) p. 236.

CO'NGRUENT.† adj. [congruens, Lat.] Agreeing; correspondent.

For humble grammar first doth set the parts
Of congruent and well-according speech.
Sir J. Davies's Orchestra, (1599.)

The congruent and harmonious fitting of parts in a sentence hath almost the fastening and force of knitting and connexion. B. Jonson, Discoveries.

These planes were so separated as to move upon a common side of the congruent squares, as an axis. Cheyne, Phil. Prin.

CONGRU'ITY.† n. s. [from congrue.]

1. Suitableness; agreeableness.

Congruity of opinions to our natural constitution, is one great incentive to their reception.
Glanville.

2. Fitness; pertinence.

A whole sentence may fail of its congruity by wanting one particle. Sidney.

I must remember our ever-memorable Sir Philip Sidney, whose wit was in truth the very rule of congruity. Wotton, Elem. of Architecture.

3. Consequence of argument; reason; consistency.

With what congruity doth the church of Rome deny, that her enemies do at all appertain to the church of Christ? Hooker.

4. [In geometry.] Figures or lines which exactly correspond, when laid over one another, are in congruity.

5. [In theology.] Some of the schoolmen have devised a twofold merit; a merit of congruity, and a merit of condignity. The latter they ascribe to works which a man does by the assistance of grace, and to which a reward is in justice due. The former they ascribe to such works as a man does by the mere strength of freewill, and which are to be rewarded only out of liberality. But what foundation is there for this sort of merit, since all of us are by nature evil? Welchman on the 39 Articles, Art. xiii. See also CONDIGNITY.

CO'NGRUMENT.† n. s. [from congrue.] Fitness; adaptation. Not in use, Dr. Johnson says; and, I may add, perhaps never was in use. Dr. Johnson, however, cites as an example the passage from B. Jonson, which I have given under congruent; where congrument, in some editions of the poet, seems to be an errour of the press; and it is rightly given congruent in the Rev. Mr. Whalley's edition of the poet's works.

CO'NGRUOUS.† adj. [congruus, Lat.]

1. Agreeable to; consistent with.

They also perform actions of life and motion, congruous and convenient unto their nature and kind. Mountagu, App. to Cæsar, (1625,) p. 232.

The existence of God is so many ways manifest, and the obedience we owe him so congruous to the light of reason, that a great part of mankind give testimony to the law of nature. Locke.

2. Suitable to; accommodated to; proportionate or commensurate.

It had been more congruous to have continued the same manner of expression.
Smith's Portraiture of Old Age, p. 114.

The faculty is infinite, the object infinite, and they infinitely congruous to one another.
Cheyne, Phil. Prin.

3. Rational; fit.

Therefore was it very singularly congruous, that from this place, from whence the seafaring men took their notice by a light to escape the hazard of those ways they knew not, it should please God also, by the lantern of his word, to give aim to the people that sate in darkness.
Gregory's Posthuma, (1650,) p. 3.

Motives that address themselves to our reason, are fittest to be employed upon reasonable creatures: it is no ways congruous, that God should be always frightening men into an acknowledgement of the truth. Atterbury.

CO'NGRUOUSLY.† adv. [from congruous.] Suitably; pertinently; consistently.

There they must of necessity, if they will speak congruously, by the first Christian æra, mean the first hundred years after Christ, or that, and some of the next centuries following.
Bp. Barlow's Rem. p. 114.

Nothing can sound more congruously or harmoniously. More, Expos. Seven Churches, p. 64.

I could wish that in their speech and compliment they [the French] would not use the Latin tongue, or else speak it more congruously.
Heylin's Voyage of France, p. 296.

This conjecture is to be regarded, because congruously unto it, one having warmed the bladder, found it then lighter than the opposite weight.
Boyle, Spring of the Air.

CO'NICAL. } CO'NICK. } adj. [conicus, Lat.] Having the form of a cone, or round decreasing.

Tow'ring firs in conick forms arise,
And with a pointed spear divide the skies. Prior.

A brown flint of a conick figure: the basis is oblong. Woodward.

They are conical vessels, with their bases towards the heart; and as they pass on, their diameters grow still less. Arbuthnot.

CO'NICALLY. adv. [from conical.] In form of a cone.

In a watering pot, shaped conically, or like a sugar loaf, filled with water, no liquour falls through the holes at the bottom, whilst the gardener keeps his thumb upon the orifice at the top.
Boyle, Spring of the Air.

CO'NICALNESS. n. s. [from conical.] The state or quality of being conical.

CO'NICK Section. n. s. A curve line arising from the section of a cone by a plane.

CO'NICK Sections.† } CO'NICKS. } n. s. That part of geometry which considers the cone, and the curves arising from its sections.

By the thirty-third proposition of the first book of the conicks of Apollonius, and from similar triangles. Bp. Berkeley, Analyst, § 22.

To CONJE'CT. v. n. [conjectum, Lat.] To guess; to conjecture. Not in use.

I intreat you then,
From one that but imperfectly conjects,
Your wisdom would not build yourself a trouble.
Shakspeare.

To CONJE'CT.* v. a. [Lat. conjicio, conjectum.] To cast together; to throw.

Particular calumnies — congested and conjected at a mass upon the church of England.
Mountagu, App. to Cæsar, (1625,) p. 298.

CONJE'CTOR.† n. s. [from conject.] A guesser; a conjecturer.

And because he pretends to be a great conjector at other men by their writings, I will not fail to give ye, readers, a present taste of him from his title. Milton, Apology for Smectym.

For so conjectors would obtrude,
And from thy painted skin conclude. Swift.

CONJE'CTURABLE. adj. [from conjecture.] Being the object of conjecture; possible to be guessed.

CONJE'CTURAL.† adj. [old Fr. conjectural.] Depending on conjecture; said or done by guess.

They'll sit by th' fire, and presume to know
Who thrives, and who declines, side factions, and give out
Conjectural marriages. Shakspeare, Coriol.

Thou speak'st it falsely, as I love mine honour,
And mak'st conjectural fears to come into me.
Shakspeare.

It were a matter of great profit, save that I doubt it is too conjectural to venture upon, if one could discern what corn, herbs, or fruits, are likely to be in plenty or scarcity. Bacon.

The two last words are not in Callimachus, and consequently the rest are only conjectural. Broome.

CONJECTURA'LITY. n. s. [from conjectural.] That which depends upon guess.

They have not recurred unto chronology, or the records of time, but taken themselves unto probabilities, and the conjecturality of philosophy.
Brown, Vulg. Err.

CONJE'CTURALLY. adv. [from conjectural.] By guess; by conjecture.

Whatsoever may be at any time out of Scripture, but probably and conjecturally surmised. Hooker.

Let it be probably, not conjecturally proved. Maine.

CONJE'CTURE.† n. s. [conjectura, Latin. "On appelle présomption chez les jurisconsultes, ce qui doit passer pour verité par provision, en cas que le contraire ne se prouve point, et il dit plus que conjecture, quoique la Dictionnaire de l'Academie n'en ait point épluché la difference." Leibnitz, Ess. sur la Theod. p. 28.]

1. Guess; imperfect knowledge; preponderation of opinion without proof.

In the casting of lots a man cannot, upon any ground of reason, bring the event so much as under conjecture. South.

2. Idea; notion; conception. Not now in use.

Now entertain conjecture of a time,
When creeping murmur, and the poring dark,
Fills the wide vessel of the universe.
Shakspeare, Hen. V.

To CONJE'CTURE. v. a. [from the noun.] To guess; to judge by guess; to entertain an opinion upon bare probability.

When we look upon such things as equally may or may not be, human reason can then, at the best, but conjecture what will be. South.

CONJE'CTURER. n. s. [from conjecture.] A guesser; one who forms opinion without proof.

If we should believe very grave conjecturers, carniverous animals now were not flesh devourers then. Brown.

I shall leave conjecturers to their own imaginations. Addison.

CONI'FEROUS.† adj. [conifere, old Fr. conus and fero, Lat.]

Such trees or herbs are coniferous as bear a squamose, scaly fruit, of a woody substance, and a figure approaching to a cone, in which are many seeds; and when they are ripe, the several cells in the cone open and the seeds drop out. Of this kind are the fir, pine, and beech. Quincy.

The laurel, in its prosperity, abounds with pleasant flowers; whereas those of the cedar are very little, and scarce perceptible, answerable to the fir, pine, and other coniferous trees.
Sir T. Brown, Misc. Tracts, p. 68.

To CONJO'BBLE. v. a. [from con, together, and jobbernol, the head.] To concert; to settle; to discuss. A low cant word.

What would a body think of a minister that should conjobble matters of state with tumblers, and confer politicks with tinkers? L'Estrange.

To CONJOIN.† v. a. [conjoindre, Fr. conjungo, Lat.]

1. To unite; to consolidate into one

Whose marriages conjoin'd the white rose and the red. Drayt. Polyolb. S. 5.

Thou wrong'st Pirithous, and not him alone;
But, while I live, two friends conjoin'd in one.
Dryden.

2. To unite in marriage.

If either of you know any inward impediment, Why you should not be conjoin'd, I charge You on your souls to utter it. Shaks. Much ado.

3. To associate; to connect.

Common and universal spirits convey the action of the remedy into the part, and conjoin the virtue of bodies far disjoined. Brown. Vulg. Err.

The foresaid knight was conjoined, for the nearness of his place, on the prince's affairs.
Wotton, Life of the D. of Buckingham.

Men of differing interests can be reconciled in one communion, at least, the designs of all can be conjoined in ligatures of the same reverence, and piety, and devotion. Bp. Taylor.

Let that which he learns next be nearly conjoined with what he knows already. Locke.

To CONJO'IN. v. n. To league; to unite.

This part of his
Conjoins with my disease, and helps to end me.
Shakspeare, Hen. IV.

CONJO'INT. adj. [conjoint, Fr.] United; connected; associated.

CONJO'INT Degrees. [In musick.] Two notes which immediately follow each other in the order of the scale; as, ut and re. Dict.

CONJO'INTLY. adv. [from conjoint.] In union; together; in association; jointly; not apart.

A gross and frequent error, commonly committed in the use of doubtful remedies, conjointly with those that are of approved virtues.
Brown, Vulg. Err.

The parts of the body separately, make known the passions of the soul, or else conjointly one with the other. Dryden.

CO'NISOR. See COGNISOR.

CO'NJUGAL. adj. [conjugalis, Lat.] Matrimonial; belonging to marriage; connubial.

Their conjugal affection still is ty'd,
And still the mournful race is multiply'd.
Dryden, Fab.

I could not forbear commending the young woman for her conjugal affection, when I found that she had left the good man at home. Spectator.

He mark'd the conjugal dispute;
Nell roar'd incessant, Dick sat mute. Swift.

CO'NJUGALLY.† adv. [from conjugal.] Matrimonially; connubially.

This mighty champion challenges me with great insultation—to name but one bishop or priest of note, which after holy orders conversed conjugally with his wife, without the scandal of the church:—I do here accept his offer.
Bp. Hall, Hon. of the Married Clergy, p. 186.

Such a hater loses by due punishment that privilege, Deut. xxiv. 1. to divorce for a natural dislike; which, though it could not love conjugally, yet sent away civilly, and with just conditions.
Milton, Colast.

To CO'NJUGATE.† v. a. [conjugo, Latin.]

1. To join; to join in marriage; to unite.

Those drawing as well marriage as wardship, gave him both power and occasion to conjugate at pleasure the Norman and the Saxon houses.
Wotton, Char. of Kings of Eng.

2. To inflect verbs; to decline verbs through their various terminations.

There are some verbs, which, although perhaps anciently conjugated in the manner of those belonging to the fourth conjugation; yet are now become obsolete in that way of inflection, and may therefore be ranked among those of the third conjugation. White on the English Verb, p. 45.

CO'NJUGATE. n. s. [conjugatus, Latin.] Agreeing in derivation with another word, and therefore generally resembling in signification.

His grammatical argument, grounded upon the derivation of spontaneous from sponte, weighs nothing: we have learned in logick, that conjugates are sometimes in name only, and not in deed.
Bp. Bramhall, Answ. to Hobbes.

CO'NJUGATE Diameter, or Axis. [In geometry.] A right line, bisecting the transverse diameter. Chambers.

CONJUGA'TION. n. s. [conjugatio, Lat.]

1. A couple; a pair.

The heart is so far from affording nerves unto other parts, that it receiveth very few itself from the sixth conjugation or pair of nerves.
Brown, Vulg. Err.

2. The act of uniting or compiling things together.

The general and indefinite contemplations and notions of the elements, and their conjugations, are to be set aside, being but notional, and illimited, and definite axioms are to be drawn out of measured instances. Bacon.

All the various mixtures and conjugations of atoms do beget nothing. Bentley, Serm.

3. The form of inflecting verbs through their series of terminations.

Have those who have writ so much about declensions and conjugations, about concords and syntaxes, lost their labour, and been learned to no purpose? Locke.

4. Union; assemblage.

The supper of the Lord is the most sacred, mysterious, and useful conjugation of secret and holy things and duties. Bp. Taylor.

CONJU'NCT.† adj. [conjunctus, Latin.] Conjoined; concurrent; united. Not in use, Dr. Johnson says; citing only the example from Shakspeare.

It pleas'd the king his master to strike at me,
When he, conjunct and flattering his displeasure,
Tript me behind. Shakspeare, K. Lear.

The Lord himself being conjunct with the angels, whom he employed in this embassy.
Bp. Patrick on Genesis, xviii. 10.

There was a very conjunct friendship between the two brothers and him.
Aubrey, Anec. of Sir W. Ralegh, ii. 511.

CONJU'NCTION. n. s. [conjunctio, Lat.]

1. Union; association; league.

With our small conjunction, we should on,
To see how fortune is dispos'd to us.
Shakspeare, Hen. IV.

He will unite the white rose and the red;
Smile, heaven, upon his fair conjunction,
That long hath frown'd upon their enmity.
Shakspeare, Rich. III.

The Treaty gave abroad a reputation of a strict conjunction and amity between them.
Bacon, Henry VII.

Man can effect no great matter by his personal strength, but as he acts in society and conjunction with others. South.

An invisible hand from heaven mingles hearts and souls by strange, secret, and unaccountable conjunctions. South.

2. The congress of two planets in the same degree of the zodiack, where they are supposed to have great power and influence.

God, neither by drawing waters from the deep, nor by any conjunction of the stars, should bury them under a second flood.
Ralegh, Hist. of the World.

Has not a poet more virtues and vices within his circle? Cannot he observe their influences in their oppositions and conjunctions, in their altitudes and depressions? He shall sooner find ink than nature exhausted. Rymer, Trag. of last Age.

Pompey and Cæsar were two stars of such a magnitude, that their conjunction was as fatal as their opposition. Swift.

3. A word made use of to connect the clauses of a period together, and to signify their relation to one another. Clarke.

CONJU'NCTIVE.† adj. [conjunctivus, Lat.]

1. Closely united. A sense not in use, Dr. Johnson says. He overlooked, however, Thomson.

Taught by Thee,
Ours are the plans of policy and peace,
To live like brothers, and conjunctive all
Embellish life. Thomson, Sum. ver. 1773.
She's so conjunctive to my life and soul,
That as the star moves not but in his sphere,
I could not but by her. Shakspeare, Hen. IV.

2. [In grammar.] The mood of a verb, used subsequently to a conjunction. Dr. Johnson so styles the subjunctive mood in his Grammar of the English Language.

3. Connecting together, as a conjunction.
Though all conjunctions conjoin sentences, yet, with respect to the sense, some are conjunctive, and some disjunctive. Harris, Hermes, ii. 2.

4. United; not apart. Of this sense, as of the preceding, Dr. Johnson has taken no notice. But of the present his own writings afford an example.
Finding King James irremediably excluded, he voted for the conjunctive sovereignty, upon this principle, that he thought the title of the prince and his consort equal.
Johnson, Life of Sheffield Duke of Bucks.

CONJU'NCTIVELY.† adv. [from conjunctive.] In union; not apart.
These are good mediums conjunctively taken, that is, not one without the other.
Brown, Vulg. Err.
Of Strasburg and Ulm I may speak conjunctively, being of one nature; both free, and both jealous of their freedom. Sir H. Wotton, Letters.

CONJU'NCTIVENESS. n. s. [from conjunctive.] The quality of joining or uniting.

CONJU'NCTLY. adv. [from conjunct.] Jointly; together; not apart.

CONJU'NCTURE. n. s. [conjoncture, Fr.]

1. Combination of many circumstances, or causes.
I never met with a more unhappy conjuncture of affairs than in the business of that earl. K. Charles.
Every virtue requires time and place, a proper object, and a fit conjecture of circumstances.
Addison, Spect.

2. Occasion; critical time.
Such censures always attend such conjunctures, and find fault for what is not done, as with that which is done. Clarendon.

3. Mode of union; connection.
He is quick to perceive the motions of articulation, and conjunctures of letters in words.
Holder, Elem. of Speech.

4. Consistency.
I was willing to grant to presbytery what with reason it can pretend to, in a conjuncture with episcopacy. K. Charles.

CONJURA'TION.† n. s. [from conjure.]

1. The form or act of summoning another in some sacred name.
We charge you, in the name of God, take heed: Under this conjuration speak, my lord.
Shakspeare, Hen. V.

2. A magical form of words; an incantation, an enchantment.
Your conjuration, fair knight, is too strong for my poor spirit to disobey. Sidney.
What drugs, what charms,
What conjuration, and what mighty magick,
For such proceeding I am charg'd withal,
I won his daughter with? Shakspeare, Othello.

3. A plot; a conspiracy.
And because this information might be made more clear, he did make many instances unto the said ambassadors, that they would give him the authors of the said conjuration, this being the sole means whereby their own honour might be preserved. Sir W. Ashton, (1624,) Sup. to Cabala, p. 153.

4. Earnest entreaty. Not now in use.
Ger. But my father's charge.
Win. My conjuration shall dispense with that;
You may be up as early as you please,
But hence to-night you shall not.
Heywood's English Traveller.

To CONJU'RE.† v. a. [conjuro, Latin.]

1. To summon in a sacred name; to enjoin with the highest solemnity.
O, prince, I cónjure thee, as thou believ'st
There is another comfort than this world.
Shakspeare, Meas. for Meas.
He concluded with sighs and tears to conjure them, that they would no more press him to consent to a thing so contrary to his reason. Clarendon.
The church may address her sons in the form St. Paul does the Philippians, when he conjures them to unity. Decay of Piety.
I conjure you! let him know,
Whate'er was done against him, Cato did it.
Addison, Cato.

2. To bind many by an oath to some common design. This sense is rare.
[He] in proud rebellious arms
Drew after him the third part of heaven's sons,
Conjur'd against the Highest. Milton, P. L.

3. To influence by magick; to affect by enchantment; to charm.
What black magician conjures up this fiend,
To stop devoted charitable deeds?
Shakspeare, Rich. III.
What is he whose griefs
Bear such an emphasis? whose phrase of sorrow
Conjures the wand'ring stars, and makes them stand
Like wonder-wounded hearers? Shaks. Hamlet.
I thought their own fears, whose black arts first raised up those turbulent spirits, would force them to conjure them down again. King Charles.
You have conjured up persons that exist no where else but on old coins, and have made our passions and virtues visible. Addison on Anc. Med.

4. It is to be observed, that when this word is used for summon or conspire, its accent is on the last syllable, conjúre; when for charm, on the first, cónjure. This is Dr. Johnson's observation. But, that this has not always been observed, may be perceived in the example which I have given from Shakspeare under the first definition; where, though certainly improperly, the accent is on the first syllable.

To CO'NJURE. v. n. To practise charms or enchantments; to enchant.
My invocation is honest and fair; and in his mistress's name I conjure only but to raise up him.
Shakspeare, Rom. and Jul.
Out of my door, you witch! you hag, you baggage, you poulcat, you runaway! Out, out, out; I'll conjure you, I'll fortunetell you.
Shakspeare, Mer. W. of Windsor.

To CONJU'RE.* v. n. To enter into conspiracy.
When those 'gainst states and kingdoms do conjure,
Who then can think their headlong ruin to recure.
Spenser, F. Q. v. x. 26.

CO'NJURER. n. s. [from conjure.]

1. An enchanter; one that uses charms.
Good doctor Pinch, you are a conjurer;
Establish him in his true sense again.
Shaks. Com. of Errours.
Figures in the book
Of some dread conjurer, that would enforce nature. Donne.
Thus has he done you British consorts right,
Whose husbands, should they pry like mine to-night,
Would never find you in your conduct slipping,
Though they turn'd conjurers to take you tripping.
Addison.

2. An impostor who pretends to secret arts; a cunning man.
From the account the loser brings,
The conj'rer knows who stole the things. Prior.

3. By way of irony; a man of shrewd conjecture; a man of sagacity.
Though ants are very knowing, I don't take them to be conjurers; and therefore they could not guess that I had put some corn in that room.
Addison.

CONJU'REMENT. n. s. [from conjure.] Serious injunction; solemn demand.
I should not be induced but by your earnest intreaties and serious conjurements.
Milton on Education.

CONNA'SCENCE. n. s. [con and nascor, Lat.]

1. Common birth; production at the same time; community of birth.

2. Being produced together with another being.
Christians have baptized these geminous births and double connascencies, as containing in them a distinction of soul. Brown, Vulg. Err.

3. The act of uniting or growing together: improperly.
Symphysis denotes a connascence, or growing together. Wiseman, Surgery.

CO'NNATE. adj. [from con and natus, Lat.] Born with another; being of the same birth.
Many, who deny all connate notions in the speculative intellect, do yet admit them in this. South.
Their dispositions to be reflected some at a greater, and others at a less thickness of thin plates or bubbles, are connate with the rays, and immutable. Newton, Opt.

CONNA'TURAL. adj. [con and natural.]

1. United with the being; connected by nature.
First, in man's mind we find an appetite
To learn and know the truth of ev'ry thing,
Which is connatural, and born with it. Davies.
These affections are connatural to us, and as we grow up so do they. L'Estrange.

2. Participant of the same nature.
Is there no way, besides
These painful passages, how we may come
To death, and mix with our connatural dust?
Milton, P. L.
Whatever draws me on,
Or sympathy, or some connat'ral force,
Pow'rful at greatest distance to unite,
With secret amity. Milton, P. L.

CONNATURA'LITY. n. s. [from connatural.] Participation of the same nature; natural inseparability.
There is a connaturality and congruity between that knowledge and those habits, and that future estate of the soul. Hale.

To CONNA'TURALIZE.* v. a. [from con and naturalize.] To connect by nature; to make natural.
How often have you been forced to swallow sickness, to drink dead palsies and foaming epilepsies, to render your intemperances familiar to you, — before ever you could connaturalize your midnight revels to your temper.
Scott, Christ. Life, i. iv.

CONNA'TURALLY. adv. [from connatural.] In co-existence with nature; originally.
Some common notions seem connaturally engraven in the soul, antecedently to discussive ratiocination. Hale.

CONNA'TURALNESS. n. s. [from connatural.] Participation of the same nature; natural union.
Such is the connaturalness of our corruptions, except we looked for an account hereafter.
Pearson on the Creed, Art. vii.

To CONNE'CT. v. a. [connecto, Lat.]

1. To join; to link; to unite; to conjoin; to fasten together.

The corpuscles that constitute the quicksilver, will be so connected to one another, that, instead of a fluid body, they will appear in the form of a red powder. Boyle.

2. To unite by intervention; as a cement.

The natural order of the connecting ideas must direct the syllogisms, and a man must see the connection of each intermediate idea with those that it connects, before he can use it in a syllogism. Locke.

3. To join in a just series of thought, or regular construction of language: as, the authour connects his reasons well.

To CONNE'CT. v. n. To cohere; to have just relation to things precedent and subsequent. This is seldom used but in conversation.

CONNE'CTIVE.* adj. [from connect.] Having the power of joining or connecting together.

There are times when prepositions totally lose their connective nature, being converted into adverbs, and used in syntax accordingly. Harris, Hermes, ii. 3.

CONNE'CTIVE.* n. s. [from the adjective.] A conjunction.

Connectives, according as they connect either sentences or words, are called by the different names of conjunctions or prepositions. Harris, Hermes, ii. 2.

CONNE'CTIVELY. adv. [from connect.] In conjunction; in union; jointly; conjointly; conjunctly.

The people's power is great and indisputable, whenever they can unite connectively, or by deputation, to exert it. Swift.

To CONNE'X. v. a. [connexum, Lat.] To join or link together; to fasten to each other.

Those birds who are taught some words or sentences, cannot connex their words or sentences in coherence with the matter which they signify. Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

They fly,
By chains connex'd, and with destructive sweep
Behead whole troops at once. Philips.

CONNE'XION. n. s. [from connex, or connexio, Lat.]

1. Union; junction; the act of fastening together; the state of being fastened together.

My heart, which, by a secret harmony,
Still moves with thine, join'd in connexion sweet. Milton, P. L.

There must be a future state, where the eternal and inseparable connexion between virtue and happiness shall be manifested. Atterbury.

2. Just relation to some thing precedent or subsequent; consequence of argumentation; coherence.

Contemplation of human nature doth, by a necessary connexion and chain of causes, carry us up to the Deity. Hale.

Each intermediate idea must be such as, in the whole chain, hath a visible connexion with those two it is placed between. Locke.

A conscious, wise, reflecting cause,
That can deliberate, means elect, and find
Their due connexion with the end design'd. Blackmore's Creation.

CONNE'XIVE. adj. [from connex.] Having the force of connexion; conjunctive.

The predicate and subject are joined in a form of words by connexive particles. Watts, Logick.

CONNICTA'TION n. s. [from connicto, Lat.] A winking. Dict.

CONNI'VANCE.† n. s. [from connive. This word is often written, and particularly in our old lexicography, connivence; but Dr. Johnson has chosen connivance. The old Fr. connivence, and Ital. connivenza, countenance the former. See also CONNIVENCY.

1. The act of winking. Not in use.

2. Voluntary blindness; pretended ignorance; forbearance.

It is better to mitigate usury by declaration, than to suffer it to rage by connivance. Bacon, Ess. 42.

Disobedience, having gained one degree of liberty, will demand another: every vice interprets a connivance an approbation. South.

A connivance to admit half, will produce ruin. Swift.

To CONNI'VE.† v. n. [conniveo, Lat.; conniver, old Fr. But Cotgrave, who notices our substantive, does not render the French verb by our English one. The earliest example of this verb, which Dr. Johnson cites, is from the Decay of Christian Piety, which was published in 1667. Milton's is only coeval authority; yet ought to be admitted. But Beaumont and Fletcher, of older authority, are the earliest users of the word which I have hitherto met with.]

1. To wink.

This artist is to teach them how to nod judiciously, to connive with either eye. Spect. No. 305.

2. To pretend blindness or ignorance; to forbear; to pass uncensured.

I have conniv'd at this, your friend and you,
But what is got by this connivancy. Beaum. and Fl. Martial Maid.

I suffer them to enter and possess
A place so heavenly; and, conniving, seem
To gratify my scornful enemies. Milton, P. L. x. 624.

The licentiousness of inferiours, and the remissness of superiours, the one violates, and the other connives. Decay of Piety.

With whatever colours he persuades authority to connive at his own vices, he will desire its protection from the effects of other men's. Rogers.

He thinks it a scandal to government to connive at such tracts as reject all revelation. Swift.

CONNI'VENCY.* n. s. [Ital. connivenza, old Fr. connivence. This was the more usual word with our ancestors for connivence.] Pretended ignorance; forbearance.

She did not ransack their consciences by any severe inquisition, but rather secured them by a gracious connivancy. Bacon, Collect. of Q. Elizabeth.

Yourself, and many others, have been driven, of late, to excuse and countenance your execrable ingratitude with a false and scandalous report of some further hope and comfort yielded to the Catholicks for toleration or connivency, before his [K. James I.] coming to the crown, than since hath been performed. Ld. Northampton, Proc. ag. Garnet, M. 2.

By connivency and silence, they in a manner partake in their sins. Hales, Rem. p. 134.

CONNI'VENT.* adj. [from connive.] Dormant; not attentive.

His legal justice cannot be so fickle and so variable, sometimes like a devouring fire, and by and by connivent in the embers, or, if I may so say, oscitant and supine. Milton, Doct. and Disc. of Divorce, ii. 3.

CONNI'VER.* n. s. [from connive.] One who pretends blindness; who passes wickedness uncensured.

All sins which we give allowance to, being committed, or not hindered by us if we may, are ours, as if we committed them; first, commanders; abettors, counsellors; consenters; commenders; connivers; concealers; not hinderers; each of these will be found guilty before God's tribunal. Junius, Sin. Stigm. (1639,) p. 825.

*CONNOISSE'UR.† n. s. [French.] A judge; a critick. It is often used of a pretended critick, Dr. Johnson says.

Your lesson learnt, you'll be secure
To get the name of connoisseur. Swift.

He has been at a considerable expence in the improvement of it, [his villa,] in which he has shewn himself to be master of a very polite and genteel taste. You are a sort of connoisseur this way; you will have an opportunity of passing your own judgment upon it. Coventry, Phil. to Hyd. Conv. 2.

CONNOISSE'URSHIP.* n. s. [connoisseur.] The skill of a connoisseur.

To CO'NNOTATE. v. a. [con and nota, Lat.] To designate something besides itself; to imply; to infer.

God's foreseeing doth not include or connotate predetermining, any more than I decree with my intellect. Hammond.

CONNOTA'TION. n. s. [from connotate.] Implication of something besides itself; inference; illation.

By reason of the co-existence of one thing with another, there ariseth a various relation or connotation between them. Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

Plato by his ideas means only the divine essence with this connotation, as it is variously imitable or participable by created beings. Norris.

To CONNO'TE. v. a. [con and nota, Lat.] To imply; to betoken; to include.

Good, in the general notion of it, connotes also a certain suitableness of it to some other thing. South.

CONNU'BIAL. adj. [connubialis, Lat.] Matrimonial; nuptial; pertaining to marriage; conjugal.

Should second love a pleasing flame inspire,
And the chaste queen connubial rites require. Pope, Odyssey.

CONNUMERA'TION.* n. s. [con and numeration.] A reckoning together.

How could he otherwise have missed the opportunity of insisting upon the connumeration of the three persons, the assertion of their joint testimony and of their unity. Person to Travis, p. 225.

CO'NNY.* adj. [much the same as canny.] Brave; fine. North. Grose.

CO'NOID. n. s. [κωνοείδης.] A figure partaking of a cone; approaching to the form af a cone.

The tympanum is not capable of tension as a drum: there remains another way, by drawing it to the centre into a conoid form. Holder, Elem. of Speech.

CONOI'DICAL. adj. [from conoid.] Approaching to a conick form, to the form of a round decreasing.

To CONQUA'SSATE. v. a. [conquasso, Lat.] To shake; to agitate. Not in use.

1. To gain by conquest; to over-run; to win.

They had conquer'd them, and brought them under tribute. 1 Mac. viii. 2.

Welcome, great Stagirite, and teach me now
All I was born to know,
Thy scholar's victories thou dost outdo:
He conquer'd th' earth, the whole world you.
Cowley.

'Twas fit,
Who conquer'd nature, should preside o'er wit.
Pope.

We conquer'd France, but felt our captive's charms,
Their arts victorious triumph'd o'er our arms.
Pope.

2. To overcome; to subdue; to vanquish.

Both tugging to be victors, breast to breast;
Yet neither conqueror, nor conquer'd.
Shakspeare, Hen. VI.

The conquer'd also, and enslav'd by war,
Shall, with their freedom lost, all virtue lose,
And fear of God. Milton, P. L.

Anna conquers but to save,
And governs but to bless. Smith.

3. To surmount; to overcome: as, he conquered his reluctance.

To Co'NQUER. v. n. To get the victory; to overcome.

Put him to choler straight: he hath been used
Ever to conquer and to have his word
Of contradiction. Shakspeare, Coriol.

Equal success had set these champions high,
And both resolv'd to conquer, or to die. Waller.

The logick of a conquering sword has no propriety. Decay of Piety.

Co'NQUERABLE.† adj. [old Fr. conquerable.] Possible to be overcome.

While the heap is small, and the particulars few, he will find it easy and conquerable. South.

Co'NQUERABLENESS.* n. s. [from conquerable.] Possibility of being overcome.

The conquerableness of the object by our own means. Bp. Reynolds, Works, p. 697.

Phœnix's Nest, (1593,) p. 39.

The conqueress departs, and with her led
These prisoners. Fairfax, Tasso, v. 79.

Oh, Truth, thou art a mighty conqueress.
Beaum. and Fl. Queen of Corinth.

Co'NQUEROUR.† n. s. [old Fr. conquereur.]

1. A man that has obtained a victory; a victor.

Bound with triumphant garlands will I come,
And lead thy daughter to a conquerour's bed.
Shakspeare, Rich. III.

The gain of civil wars will not allow
Bags for the conq'rour's crew. Cowley.

A critick that attacks authours in reputation, is as the slave who called out to the conqueror, Remember, Sir, that you are a man. Addison, Guard.

2. One that subdues and ruins countries.

Deserving freedom more
Than those their conquerours, who leave behind
Nothing but ruin wheresoe'er they rove.
Milton, P R.

That tyrant god, that restless conqueror,
May quit his pleasure, to assert his pow'r. Prior.

Co'NQUEST.† n. s. [conqueste, French; conquert, Sax. Spenser, for the sake of the rhyme, gives an instance of the accent on the second syllable of this word, Colin Clout, ver. 950.]

1. The act of conquering; subjection.

A perfect conquest of a country reduces all the people to the condition of subjects.
Davies on Ireland.

2. Acquisition by victory; thing gained.

More willingly I mention air,
This our old conquest; than remember hell,
Our hated habitation. Milton, P. R.

3. Victory; success in arms.

I must yield my body to the earth,
And by my fall, the conquest to my foe.
Shakspeare, Hen. VI.

I'll lead thy daughter to a conquerour's bed;
To whom I will retail my conquest won,
And she shall be sole victress. Shaksp. Rich. III.

Not to be o'ercome, was to do more
Than all the conquests former kings did gain.
Dryden.

In joys of conquest he resigns his breath,
And, fill'd with England's glory, smiles in death.
Addison.

4. In feodal law, purchase. [low Lat. conquestus.]

What we call purchase, the feudists call conquest; both denoting any means of acquiring an estate out of the common course of inheritance.
Blackstone.

CONSANGUI'NEOUS. adj. [consanguineus, Lat.] Near of kin; of the same blood; related by birth, not affined.

Am I not consanguineous? Am I not of her blood? Shakspeare.

Consangui'nity. n. s. [consanguinitas, Latin.] Relation by blood; relation by descent from one common progenitor. Nearness of kin. Distinguished from affinity, or relation by marriage.

I've forgot my father;
I know no touch of consanguinity.
Shakspeare, Troil. and Cress.

There is the supreme and indissoluble consanguinity and society between men in general; of which the heathen poet, whom the apostle calls to witness, saith, We are all his generation.
Bacon, Holy War.

The first original would subsist, though he outlived all terms of consanguinity, and became a stranger unto his progeny. Brown, Vulg. Err.

Christ has condescended to a cognation and consanguinity with us. South.

Consarcina'cion. n. s. [from consarcino, Latin, to piece.] The act of patching together. Dict.

CO'NSCIENCE.† n. s. [conscience, Fr. conscientia, Lat. "Conscience is a Latin word, though with an English termination; and, according to the very notation of it, imports a double or joint knowledge; to wit, one of a divine law or rule, and the other of a man's own action: and so is properly the application of a general law to a particular instance of practice. South, Serm. vol. ii. p. 438.]

1. The knowledge or faculty by which we judge of the goodness or wickedness of ourselves.

When a people have no touch of conscience, no sense of their evil doings, it is bootless to think to restrain them. Spenser.

Who against faith, and conscience, can be heard
Infallible. Milton, P. L.

Conscience has not been wanting to itself in endeavouring to get the clearest information about the will of God. South.

But why must those be thought to 'scape, that feel
Those rods of scorpions, and those whips of steel,
Which conscience shakes? Creech, Juv.

No courts created yet, nor cause was heard;
But all was safe, for conscience was their guard.
Dryden, Ovid.

Conscience signifies that knowledge which a man hath of his own thoughts and actions; and, because if a man judgeth fairly of his actions, by comparing them with the law of God, his mind will approve or condemn him, this knowledge or conscience may be both an accuser and a judge.
Swift.

2. Justice; the estimate of conscience; the determination of conscience; honesty. This is sometimes a serious and sometimes a ludicrous sense.

This is thank-worthy, if a man, for conscience toward God, endure grief. 1 Pet. ii. 19.

Now is Cupid a child of conscience; he makes restitution. Shaksp. Merry Wives of Windsor.

He had, against right and conscience, by shameful treachery, intruded himself into another man's kingdom. Knolles.

What you require cannot, in conscience, be deferred beyond this time. Milton.

Her Majesty is obliged in conscience to endeavour this by her authority, as much as by her practice. Swift.

3. Consciousness; knowledge of our own thoughts or actions.

Merit, and good works, is the end of man's motion; and conscience of the same is the accomplishment of man's rest. Bacon.

The reason why the simpler sort are moved with authority, is the conscience of their own ignorance. Hooker.

The sweetest cordial we receive at last,
Is conscience of our virtuous actions past.
Denham.

Hector was in an absolute certainty of death, and depressed with the conscience of being in an ill cause. Pope.

4. Real sentiment; veracity; private thoughts.

Do'st thou in conscience think, tell me, Æmelia,
That there be women do abuse their husbands,
In such gross kind? Shakspeare, Othello.

They did in their consciences know, that he was not able to send them any part of it. Clarendon.

5. Scruple; principle of action.

We must make a conscience in keeping the just laws of superiours. Bp. Taylor, Holy Living.

Why should not the one make as much conscience of betraying for gold, as the other of doing it for a crust. L'Estrange.

Children are travellers newly arrived in a strange country; we should therefore make conscience not to mislead them. Locke.

6. In ludicrous language, reason; reasonableness.

Why do'st thou weep? Can'st thou the conscience lack,
To think I shall lack friends? Shaksp. Timon.

Half a dozen fools are, in all conscience, as many as you should require. Swift.

7. Knowledge of the actions of others. This sense is rare.

How might I appear at this altar, except with those affections that no less love the light and witness, than they have the conscience of your virtue?
B. Jonson, Ded. to Lady Wroth of his Alchemist.

Co'NSCIENCED.* adj. [from conscience.] Having conscience.

Nothing will hold a sanctified, tender-conscienced rebel, but a prison, or a halter.
South, Serm. v. 221.

Co'NSCIENT.* adj. [Lat. consciens.] Conscious. See the second sense of Conscientious.

As if he were conscient to himself, that he had played his part well upon the stage.
Bacon on Learning.

Conscie'ntious.† adj. [old Fr. conscientieux].

1. Scrupulous; exactly just; regulated by conscience.

Lead a life in so conscientious a probity, as in thought, word and deed to make good the character of an honest man. L'Estrange.

2. Conscious.

Among such as would persuade the world, religion were too pure to mix with the gentilism of learning, the heretick, guilty and conscientious to himself of refutability, taketh place first.

Whitlock, Mann. of the Eng. p. 141.

CONSCIE'NTIOUSLY. adv. [from conscientious.] According to the direction of conscience.

More stress has been laid upon the strictness of law, than conscientiously did belong to it.
L'Estrange.

There is the erroneous as well as the rightly informed conscience; and if the conscience happens to be deluded, sin does not therefore cease to be sin, because a man committed it conscientiously.
South.

CONSCIE'NTIOUSNESS. n. s. [from conscientious.] Exactness of justice; tenderness of conscience.

It will be a wonderful conscientiousness in them, if they will content themselves with less profit than they can make. Locke.

CO'NSCIONABLE.† adj. [from conscience.] Reasonable; just; according to conscience.

A knave, very voluble; no farther conscionable than in putting on the mere form of civil and humane seeming. Shakspeare.

Let my debtors have conscionable satisfaction.
Wotton.

These things be comely and pleasant to see, and worthy of honour from the beholder: a young saint, an old martyr, a religious soldier, a conscionable statesman, a great man courteous, a learned man humble, a silent woman, &c.
Bp. Hall, Holy Observations.

CO'NSCIONABLENESS. n. s. [from conscionable.] Equity; reasonableness. Dict.

CO'NCIONABLY. adv. [from conscionable.] In a manner agreeable to conscience; reasonably; justly.

A prince must be used conscionably as well as a common person. Bp. Taylor, Holy Living.

CO'NSCIOUS. adj. [conscius, Lat.]

1. Endowed with the power of knowing one's own thoughts and actions.

Matter hath no life nor perception, and is not conscious of its own existence. Bentley, Serm.

Among substances some are thinking or conscious beings, or have a power of thought.
Watts, Logick.

2. Knowing from memory; having the knowledge of any thing without any new information.

The damsel then to Tancred sent,
Who conscious of th' occasion, fear'd th' event.
Dryden.

3. Admitted to the knowledge of any thing: with to.

The rest stood trembling, struck with awe divine,
Æneas only conscious to the sign,
Presag'd th' event. Dryden, Æn.

Roses or honey cannot be thought to smell or taste their own sweetness, or an organ be conscious to its musick, or gunpowder to its flashing or noise.
Bentley, Serm.

4. Bearing witness by the dictate of conscience to any thing.

The queen had been solicitous with the king on his behalf, being conscious to herself that he had been encouraged by her. Clarendon.

CO'NSCIOUSLY. adv. [from conscious.] With knowledge of one's own actions.

If these perceptions, with their consciousness, always remained in the mind, the same thinking thing would be always consciously present.
Locke.

CO'NSCIOUSNESS. n. s. [from conscious.]

1. The perception of what passes in a man's own mind. Locke.

If spirit be without thinking, I have no idea of any thing left; therefore consciousness must be its essential attribute. Watts, Logick.

2. Internal sense of guilt or innocence.

No man doubts of a Supreme Being, until, from the consciousness of his provocations, it become his interest there should be none.
Government of the Tongue.

Such ideas, no doubt, they would have had, had not their consciousness to themselves, of their ignorance of them, kept them from so idle an attempt. Locke.

An honest mind is not in the power of a dishonest: to break its peace, there must be some guilt or consciousness. Pope.

CONSCRI'PT.† adj. [from conscribo, Lat.] A term used in speaking of the Roman senators, who were called Patres conscripti, from their names being written in the register of the senate.

Fathers conscript, may this our present meeting
Turn fair, and fortunate to the common-wealth.
B. Jonson, Sejanus.

CO'NSCRIPT.* n. s. [Lat. conscriptus.] One enrolled to serve in the army; a word of modern times, more particularly applied to the recruits of the French armies.

CONSCRI'PTION. n. s. [conscriptio, Lat.] An enrolling or registering. Dict.

To CO'NSECRATE. v. a. [consecro, Lat.]

1. To make sacred; to appropriate to sacred uses.

Enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus, by a new and living way which he hath consecrated for us. Heb. x. 20.

Shall I abuse this consecrated gift
Of strength again returning with my hair.
Milton, S. A.

A bishop ought not to consecrate a church which the patron has built for filthy gain, and not for true devotion. Ayliffe.

2. To dedicate inviolably to some particular purpose, or person: with to.

He shall consecrate unto the Lord the days of his separation, and shall bring a lamb of the first year for a trespass offering. Numb. vi. 12.

3. To canonize.

CO'NSECRATE. adj. [from the verb.] Consecrated; sacred; devoted; devote; dedicated.

Shouldst thou but hear I were licentious;
And that this body, consecrate to thee,
By ruffian lust should be contaminate.
Shakspeare, Com. of Err.

The cardinal standing before the choir, lets them know that they were assembled in that consecrate place to sing unto God. Bacon, Hen. VII.

Into these secret shades, cry'd she,
How dar'st thou be so bold
To enter consecrate to me;
Or touch this hallow'd mold? Drayton, Cynthia.

The water, consecrate for sacrifice,
Appears all black. Waller.

CO'NSECRATER.† See CONSECRATOR.

CONSECRA'TION. n. s. [from consecrate.]

1. A rite or ceremony of dedicating and devoting things or persons to the service of God, with an application of certain proper solemnities. Ayliffe's Parergon.

At the erection and consecration as well of the tabernacle as of the temple, it pleased the Almightly to give a sign. Hooker.

The consecration of his God is upon his head.
Numb. vi. 7.

We must know that consecration makes not a a place sacred, but only solemnly declares it so: the gift of the owner to God makes it God's, and consequently sacred. South.

2. The act of declaring one holy by canonization.

The calendar swells with new consecrations of saints. Hale.

CO'NSECRATOR.† n. s. [from consecrate. This is one of our old substantives, being in Huloet's dictionary. Some editions of Johnson's Dict. read consecrater, as indeed it was formerly written. See the example from Bramhall.] One that performs the rites by which any thing is devoted to sacred purposes.

Such an ordination subjected both the consecraters and the consecrated to deprivation.
Bp. Bramhall's Ch. of Eng. Def. 1659. p. 75.

Whether it be not against the notion of a sacrament, that the consecrator alone should partake of it. Atterbury.

CO'NSECRATORY.* adj. [from consecrate.] Making sacred.

His words of consecration, which you yourself in your letter do rightly term true consecratory words. Bp. Morton's Discharge, &c. p. 69.

CO'NSECTARY.† adj. [from consectarius, Lat.] Consequent; consequential; following by consequence.

From the inconsistent and contrary determinations thereof, consectary impieties and conclusions may arise. Brown.

The consectary doctrine is, that whereas all things are but one in the individual, and have but one root or beginning, which is God, therefore we should not part his honour among others, but give it wholly to himself.
Shelford's Learned Discourses, p. 176.

CO'NSECTARY.† n. s. [from the adjective.] Deduction from premises; consequence; corollary.

Our synodical proceedings — do shew rather an essential consent in substance, than a conspiring identity in every consectary. Divines at the Synod of Dort, 1619. Hales's Rem. p. 186.

The part of this chapter — doth orderly resolve itself into a definition of marriage, and a consectary from thence. Milton, Tetrachordon.

These propositions are consectaries drawn from the observations. Woodward, Nat. Hist.

CONSECU'TION. n. s. [consecutio, Lat.]

1. Train of consequences; chain of deductions; concatenation of propositions.

Some consecutions are so intimately and evidently connexed to or found in the premises, that the conclusion is attained, and without any thing of ratiocinative progress. Hale.

2. Succession.

In a quick consecution of the colours, the impression of every colour remains in the sensorium.
Newton, Opticks.

3. In astronomy.

The month of consecution, or, as some term it, of progression, is the space between one conjunction of the moon with the sun unto another.
Brown, Vulg. Err.

The moon makes four quarterly seasons within her little year, or month of consecution. Holder.

CONSE'CUTIVE. adj. [consecutif, Fr.]

1. Following in train; uninterrupted; successive.

That obligation upon the lands did not come into disuse but by fifty consecutive years of exemption. Arbuthnot on Coins.

2. Consequential; regularly succeeding.

This is seeming to comprehend only the actions of a man, consecutive to volition. Locke.

CONSE'CUTIVELY. adv. [from consecutive.] A term used in the school philosophy, in opposition to antecedently, and sometimes to effectively or casually. Dict.

To CONSE'MINATE. v. a. [consemino, Lat.] To sow different seeds together. Dict.

CONSE'NSION. n. s. [consensio, Latin.] Agreement; accord.

A great number of such living and thinking particles could not possibly, by their mutual contact, and pressing and striking, compose one greater individual animal, with one mind and understanding, and a vital consension of the whole body. Bentley.

CONSE'NT. n. s. [consensus, Lat.]

1. The act of yielding or consenting.

I am far from excusing or denying that compliance; for plenary consent it was not. K. Charles.

When thou canst truly call these virtues thine,
Be wise and free, by heav'n's consent and mine.
Dryden, Pers.

2. Concord; agreement; accord; unity of opinion.

The fighting winds would stop there and admire,
Learning consent and concord from his lyre.
Cowley's Davideis.

3. Coherence with; relation to; correspondence.

Demons found
In fire, air, flood, or underground,
Whose power hath a true consent
With planet or with element. Milton, Il Pens.

4. Tendency to one point; joint operation.

Such is the world's great harmony that springs
From union, order, full consent of things. Pope.

5. In physick.

The perception one part has of another, by means of some fibres and nerves common to them both; and thus the stone in the bladder, by velicating the fibres there, will effect and draw them so into spasms, as to affect the bowels in the same manner by the intermediation of nervous threads, and cause a colick; and extend their twitches sometimes to the stomach, and occasion vomitings. Quincy.

To CONSE'NT. v. n. [consentio, Lat.]

1. To be of the same mind; to agree.

Though what thou tell'st some doubt within me move,
But more desire to hear, if thou consent,
The full relation. Milton, P. L.

2. To co-operate to the same end.

3. To yield; to give consent; to allow; to admit: with to.

Ye comets, scourge the bad revolting stars
That have consented unto Henry's death.
Shakspeare, Hen. VI.

In this will we consent unto you, if ye will be as we be. Genesis, xxxiv. 15.

What in sleep thou didst abhor to dream,
Waking thou never wilt consent to do.
Milton, P. L.

Their num'rous thunder would awake
Dull earth, which does with heav'n consent
To all they wrote. Waller.

CONSENTA'NEOUS. adj. [consentaneus, Lat.] Agreeable to; consistent with.

In the picture of Abraham sacrificing his son, Isaac is described a little boy; which is not consentaneous unto the circumstance of the text. Brown, Vulg. Err.

It will cost no pains to bring you to the knowing, nor to the practice, it being very agreeable and consentaneous to every one's nature. Hammond, Pract. Catechism.

CONSENTA'NEOUSLY. adv. [from consentaneous.] Agreeably; consistently; suitably.

Paracelsus did not always write so consentaneously to himself, that his opinions were confidently to be collected from every place of his writings, where he seems to express it. Boyle.

CONSENTA'NEOUSNESS. n. s. [from consentaneous.] Agreement; consistence. Dict.

CONSE'NTER.* n. s. [from consent; old Fr. also consenteur.] One that consenteth. Huloet.

Misprision of treason by the common law is, when a person knows of a treason, though no party or consenter to it, yet conceals it, and doth not reveal it in convenient time. Hale, Hist. Pl. of the Cr. Ch. 28.

CONSE'NTIENT.† adj. [consentiens, Lat.] Agreeing; united in opinion; not differing in sentiment.

The consentient acknowledgement of mankind. Pearson, on the Creed, Art. 1.

The authority due to the consentient judgement and practice of the universal church. Oxford, Reasons against the Covenant.

Next to the Sacred Books, the consentient testimony of the ancient Fathers. Nelson, Life of Bp. Bull, p. 237.

CO'NSEQUENCE. n. s. [consequentia, Latin.]

1. That which follows from any cause or principle.

2. Event; effect of a cause.

Spirits that know
All mortal consequences have pronounc'd it.
Shakspeare, Macbeth.

Shun the bitter consequence; for know,
The day thou eatest thereof, thou shalt die.
Milton, P. L.

3. Proposition collected from the agreement of other previous propositions; deduction; conclusion.

It is no good consequence, that reason aims at our being happy, therefore it forbids all voluntary sufferings. Decay of Piety.

4. The last proposition of a syllogism: as, what is commanded by our Saviour is our duty: prayer is commanded, cons. therefore prayer is our duty.

Can syllogism set things right?
No, majors soon with minors fight:
Or both in friendly consort join'd,
The consequence limps false behind. Prior.

5. Concatenation of causes and effects; consecution.

Sorrow being the natural and direct offer of sin, that which first brought sin into the world, must, by necessary consequence, bring in sorrow too. South.

I felt
That I must after thee, with this thy son:
Such fatal consequence unites us three.
Milton, P. L.

6. That which produces consequences; influence; tendency.

Asserted without any colour of scripture-proof, it is of very ill consequence to the superstructing of good life. Hammond.

7. Importance; moment.

The instruments of darkness
Win us with honest trifles, to betray us
In deepest consequence. Shakspeare, Macbeth.

The anger of Achilles was of such consequence, that it embroiled the kings of Greece. Addison, Spect.

Their people are sunk in poverty, ignorance, and cowardice; and of as little consequence as women and children. Swift.

CO'NSEQUENT. adj. [consequens, Lat.]

1. Following by rational deduction.

2. Following as the effect of a cause: with to.

It was not a power possible to be inherited, because the right was consequent to, and built on, an act perfectly personal. Locke.

3. Sometimes with upon.

This satisfaction or dissatisfaction, consequent upon a man's acting suitably or unsuitably to conscience, is a principle not easily to be worn out. South.

CO'NSEQUENT. n. s.

1. Consequence; that which follows from previous propositions by rational deduction.

Doth it follow that they, being not the people of God, are in nothing to be followed? This consequent were good, if only the custom of the people of God is to be observed. Hooker.

2. Effect; that which follows an acting cause.

They were ill paid; and they were ill governed, which is always a consequent of ill payment. Davies on Ireland.

He could see consequents yet dormant in their principles, and effects yet unborn. South.

CONSEQUE'NTIAL.† adj. [from consequent.]

1. Produced by the necessary concatenation of effects to causes.

We sometimes wrangle, when we should debate;
A consequential ill which freedom draws;
A bad effect, but from a noble cause. Prior.

2. Having the consequences justly connected with the premises; conclusive.

Though these kind of arguments may seem obscure; yet, upon a due consideration of them, they are highly consequential, and concludent to my purpose. Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

3. Of late years, used for great, conceited, or pompous.

Consequential in no shape conveys the meaning intended by those, who use it to express a pompous, conceited, lordly man. It can never be applied to a man, unless you were to say, that an undertaker is a man consequential to death; for its use as to men, must be as it is to things, where one follows another of course; as, this is consequential to that, and that is consequential to another. If a word is wanted to express a man of fancied importance, it should naturally have a termination denotative of the circumstance, formed analogous to other words; and I will agree to adopt the term consequentious, which will rank with such as these; contemptuous, litigious, contumacious.
Pegge, Anecd. of the Eng. Language.

CONSEQUE'NTIALLY. adv. [from consequential.]

1. With just deduction of consequences; with right connection of ideas.

No body writes a book without meaning something, though he may not have the faculty of writing consequentially, and expressing his meaning. Addison, Whig. Exam.

2. By consequence; not immediately; eventually.

This relation is so necessary, that God himself cannot discharge a rational creature from it; although consequentially indeed he may do so, by the annihilation of such creatures. South.

3. In a regular series.

Were a man a king in his dreams, and a beggar awake, and dreamt consequentially, and in continued unbroken schemes, would he be in reality a king or a beggar? Addison.

CONSEQUE'NTIALNESS. n. s. [from consequential.] Regular consecution of discourse. Dict.

CO'NSEQUENTLY. adv. [from consequent.]

1. By consequence; necessarily; inevitably; by the connection of effects to their causes.

In the most perfect poem a perfect idea was required, and consequently all poets ought rather to imitate it. Dryden.

The place of the several sorts of terrestrial matter, sustained in the fluid, being contingent and uncertain, their intermixtures with each other are consequently so. Woodward.

2. In consequence; pursuantly.

There is consequently, upon this distinguishing principle, an inward satisfaction or dissatisfaction in the heart of every man, after good or evil. South.

CO'NSEQUENTNESS. n. s. [from consequent.] Regular connection of propositions; consecution of discourse.

Let them examine the consequentness of the whole body of the doctrine I deliver. Digby on the Soul, Ded.

CO'NSERTION.* n. s. [Lat. consero, consertum.] Junction; adaptation.

What order, beauty, motion, distance, size, Consertion of design, how exquisite. Young, N. Th. 9.

CONSE'RVANCY. n. s. [from conservans, Lat.] Courts held by the Lord Mayor of London for the preservation of the fishery on the river Thames, are called Courts of Conservancy.

CONSE'RVANT.* adj. [Lat. conservans.] That preserves or continues.

The papacy, — as it hath been usurped in our native country, was either the procreant or conservant cause, or both procreant and conservant, of all the ecclesiastical controversies in the Christian world. Puller, Moderat. of the Ch. of Eng. p. 493.

CONSERVA'TION. n. s. [conservatio, Lat.]

1. The act of preserving; care to keep from perishing; continuance; protection.

Though there do indeed happen some alterations in the globe, yet they are such as tend rather to the benefit and conservation of the earth, and its productions, than to the disorder and destruction of both. Woodward, Nat. Hist.

2. Preservation from corruption.

It is an enquiry of excellent use, to enquire of the means of preventing or staying of putrefaction; for therein consisteth the means of conservation of bodies. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

CONSE'RVATIVE.† adj. [from conservo, Lat.] Having the power of opposing diminution or injury.

The spherical figure, as to all heavenly bodies, so it agreeth to light, as the most perfect and conservative of all others. Peacham.

We have not lost our orb conservative,
Of which we are a ray derivative.
More, Song of the Soul, i. iii. 26.

CONSERVA'TOR. n. s. [Latin.] Preserver; one that has the care or office of keeping any thing from detriment; diminution, or extinction.

For that you declare that you have many sick amongst you, he was warned by the conservator of the city, that he should keep at a distance. Bacon, New Atlantis.

The lords of the secret council were likewise made conservators of the peace of the two kingdoms, during the intervals of parliament. Clarendon.

Such individuals as are the single conservators of their own species. Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

CONSE'RVATORY.† n. s. [old Fr. conservatoire, from conservo, Lat.] A place where any thing is kept in a manner proper to its peculiar nature; as, fish in a pond, corn in a granary.

A conservatory of snow and ice, such as they use for delicacy to cool wine in summer. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

Now these are ornaments also without, as gardens, fountains, groves, conservatories of rare beasts, birds, and fishes. Wotton, Elem. of Architect.

You may set your tender trees and plants, with the windows and doors of the greenhouses and conservatories open, for eight or ten days before April. Evelyn's Kalendar.

The water dispensed to the earth and atmosphere by the great abyss, that subterranean conservatory, is by that means restored back. Woodward, Nat. Hist.

CONSE'RVATORY. adj. Having a preservative quality. Dict.

To CONSE'RVE.† v. a. [conservo, Lat.]

1. To preserve without loss or detriment.

Jove is that one, whom first, midst, last, you call
The Power that governs and conserveth all.
B. Jonson, Masques.

CONSOLIDA'TION.† n. s. [from consolidate.]

1. The act of uniting into a solid mass.

The consolidation of the marble, and of the stone, did not fall out at random.

Woodward, Nat. Hist.

2. The act of confirming a thing.

He first offered a league to Henry the seventh, and for consolidation thereof his daughter Margaret. Ld. Herbert, Hen. VIII. p. 11.

3. The annexing of one bill in parliament to another. This appears to be of no great age in our language, by the following example.

It was some surprize to me to find myself translated all on a sudden into this bill against the directors, under the new-fashioned term of consolidation, without any new offence given, or cause assigned: — However, I now find myself tacked to them and their unhappy fate. Speech of the Rt. Hon. J. Aislabie bef. the H. of Lds. Jul. 19. 1721.

4. In law, it is used for the combining and uniting of two benefices in one. Cowel.

CONSO'LIDATIVE. adj. [from consolidate.] That has the quality of healing wounds. Dict.

CO'NSONANCE. } n. s. [consonance, Fr. consonans, Latin.]
CO'NSONANCY. }

1. Accord of sound.

The two principal consonances that most ravish the ear, are, by the consent of all nature, the fifth and the octave. Wotton.

And winds and waters flow'd
In consonance. Thomson, Spring.

2. Consistency; congruence; agreeableness.

Such decisions held consonancy and congruity with resolutions and decisions of former times.

Hale's Law of England.

I have set down this, to shew the perfect consonancy of our persecuted church to the doctrine of scripture and antiquity.

Hammond on Fundamentals.

3. Agreement; concord; friendship. A sense now not used.

Let me conjure you by the rights of our fellowship, by the consonancy of our youth.

Shakspeare, Hamlet.

CO'NSONANT.† adj. [old Fr. consonant, consonans, Lat.]

1. Agreeable; according; consistent; followed by either with or to.

Were it consonant unto reason to divorce these two sentences, the former of which doth shew how the latter is restrained? Hooker.

That where much is given there shall be much required, is a thing consonant with natural equity.

Decay of Piety.

Religion looks consonant to itself.

Decay of Piety.

He discovers how consonant the account which Moses hath left, of the primitive earth, is to this from nature. Woodward.

2. Agreeing: without to or with.

Our bards — hold agnominations, and enforcing of consonant words or syllables one upon the other, to be the greatest elegance.

Howell, Lett. i. i. 40.

CO'NSONANT. n. s. [consonans, Latin.] A letter which cannot be sounded, or but imperfectly, by itself.

In all vowels the passage of the mouth is open and free, without any appulse of an organ of speech to another: but in all consonants there is an appulse of the organs, sometimes (if you abstract the consonants from the vowels) wholly precluding all sound; and, in all of them, more or less checking and abetting it.

Holder, Elem. of Speech.

He considered these as they had a greater mixture of vowels or consonants, and accordingly employed them as the verse required a greater smoothness. Pope, Ess. on Homer.

CO'NSONANTLY. adv. [from consonant.] Consistently; agreeably.

This as consonantly it preacheth, teacheth, and delivereth, as if but one tongue did speak for all.

Hooker.

Ourselves are formed according to that mind which frames things consonantly to their respective natures. Glanville, Scepsis.

If he will speak consonantly to himself, he must say that happened in the original constitution.

Tillotson.

CO'NSONANTNESS. n. s. [from consonant.] Agreeableness; consistency.

CO'NSONOUS. adj. [consonus, Lat.] Agreeing in sound; symphonious.

To CONSO'PIATE.* v. a. [Lat. consopio; but the regular derivation must be consopite, which, as well as consopiate, is unnoticed by Dr. Johnson; though he has admitted consopiation. This verb is not now in use; but our old vocabularies present the participle consopiated. Consopite is supported by good authority.] To lull asleep. Cockeram.

CONSOPIA'TION.† n. s. [from consopiate.] The act of laying to sleep. Little in use.

One of his maxims is, that a total abstinence from intemperance is no more philosophy than a total consopiation of the senses is repose.
Pope, to Digby.

To CO'NSOPITE.* v. a. [Lat. consopio.] To compose; to calm; to lull asleep.

The masculine faculties of the soul were for a while well slaked and consopited.
More, Cong. Cabb. (1653,) p. 68.

By the same degrees that the higher powers are invigorated, the lower are consopited and abated, as to their proper exercises.
Glanville, Pre-exist. of Souls, p. 108.

The higher powers of the soul being almost quite laid asleep and consopited. Ibid. p. 121.

CO'NSOPITE.* adj. [from the verb.] Calmed; quieted; composed.

I have the barking of bold sense confuted;
Its clamorous tongue thus being consopite,
With reasons easy shall I well be suited,
To show that Pythagore's position's right.
More, Song of the Soul, iii. iii. 43.

CO'NSORT.† n. s. [consors, Latin. It had anciently the accent on the latter syllable, but has it now on the former. Milton has used them both.]

1. Companion; partner; generally a partner of the bed; a wife or husband.

Fellowship,
Such as I seek fit to participate,
All rational delight; wherein the brute
Cannot be human consort. Milton, P. L.

Male he created thee; but thy consort
Female for race; then bless'd mankind, and said,
Be fruitful, multiply, and fill the earth.
Milton, P. L.

Thy Bellona, who thy consort came
Not only to thy bed, but to thy fame. Denham.

He single chose to live, and shun'd to wed,
Well pleas'd to want a consort of his bed.
Dryden, Fables.

His warlike amazon her host invades,
The imperial consort of the crown of Spades.
Pope.

2. An assembly; a divan; a consultation.

In one consort there sat
Cruel revenge, and rancorous despite,
Disloyal treason, and heart-burning hate.
Spenser, F. Q.

3. A number of instruments playing together; a symphony. This is probably a mistake for concert, Dr. Johnson says. It is not so. Concert was certainly so written, at the beginning of the last century, and probably much beyond that time. The Italian concert banished it; and now we have also concerto. A "consort of musicians" means indeed a company of musicians, a band, as it is now called. Our old lexicography exhibits this phrase, which might be amply illustrated, if necessary, by passages in our old dramas. See also Bullokar's Expositor, ed. 1656. And see CONCERT.

A consort of musick in a banquet of wine, is as a signet of carbuncle set in gold. Ecclus. xxxii. 5.

4. Concurrence; union.

Take it singly, and it carries an air of levity; but, in consort with the rest, has a meaning quite different. Atterbury.

To CONSO'RT.† v. n. [from the noun.] To associate with; to unite with; to keep company with.

What will you do? Let's not consort with them. Shakspeare.

All flesh consorteth according to kind; and a man will cleave to his like. Ecclus. xiii. 16.

Some of them believed, and consorted with Paul and Silas. Acts, xvii. 4.

Which of the Grecian chiefs consorts with thee?
Dryden.

To CONSO'RT.† v. a.

1. To join; to mix; to marry.

He, with his consorted Eve,
The story heard atttentive. Milton, P. L.

He begins to consort himself with men, and thinks himself one. Locke on Education.

2. To accompany. Not used, Dr. Johnson says. This is certainly not the case: for the word has been well employed in this sense.

Sweet health and fair desires consort your graces. Shakspeare, Love's Lab. Lost.

It is a special prerogative of beauty, though it be in an humble and mean subject, if it be consorted with modesty and virtue, to exalt and equal itself to any dignity.
Shelton, Tr. of D. Quix. iv. 9.

CONSO'RTABLE.† adj. [from consort.] To be compared with; to be ranked with; suitable. Not now used.

He was much more consortable to Charles Brandon, under Henry VIII. who was equal to him. Wotton.

A good conscience, and a good courtier, are consortable. W. Mountagu, Dev. Ess. (1648,) p. 98.

CONSO'RTION.† n. s. [consortio, Latin.] Partnership; fellowship; society. Dict.

While others are curious in the choice of good air, and chiefly solicitous for healthful habitations, study thou conversation, and be critical in thy consortion. Brown, Chr. Mor. ii. 9.

CO'NSORTSHIP.* n. s. [from consort.] Fellowship; state of union; partnership.

Thus, consulting wisely with the state of times, and the child's disposition and abilities of containing, must the parent either keep his virgin, or labour for the provision of a meet consortship.
Bp. Hall, Cases of Consc. iv. 1.

For their having been unkind, and unmerciful to their poor brethren, they shall be cursed, and cast down into a wretched consortship with those malicious and merciless fiends, unto whose dispositions they did so nearly approach.
Barrow, Serm. i. S. 31.

CONSPE'CTABLE. adj. [from conspectus, Lat.] Easy to be seen. Dict.

CONSPE'CTION.* n. s. [old Fr. conspection.] A seeing; a beholding.
Cotgrave, and Sherwood.

CONSPECTU'ITY. n. s. [from conspectus, Lat.] Sight; view; sense of seeing. This word is, I believe, peculiar to Shakspeare, and perhaps corrupt.

What harm can your bisson conspectuities glean out of this character? Shakspeare, Coriol.

CONSPE'RSION. n. s. [conspersio, Lat.] A sprinkling about. Dict.

CONSPICU'ITY. n. s. [from conspicuous.] Brightness; favourableness to the sight.

If this definition be clearer than the thing defined, midnight may vie for conspicuity with noon.
Glanville, Scepsis.

CONSPI'CUOUS.† adj. [conspicuus, Lat. Milton, it may be observed, affords the earliest example of this word to Dr. Johnson. In 1655 indeed it seems to have been so little used, as to require explanation at the end of Bagwell's Astronomy, of that date.]

1. Obvious to the sight; seen at a distance.

Or come I less conspicuous? Or what change
Absents thee? Milton, P. L.

2. Eminent; famous; distinguished.

He attributed to each of them that virtue which he thought most conspicuous in them.
Dryden, Juv. Ded.

Thy father's merit points thee out to view,
And sets thee in the fairest point of light,
To make thy virtues or thy faults conspicuous.
Addison, Cato.

The house of Lords,
Conspicuous scene! Pope, Epist. of Horace.

CONSPI'CUOUSLY. adv. [from conspicuous.]

1. Obviously to the view.

These methods may be preserved conspicuously, and intirely distinct. Watts, Logick.

2. Eminently; famously; remarkably.

CONSPI'CUOUSNESS. n. s. [from conspicuous.]

1. Exposure to the view; state of being visible at a distance.

Looked on with such a weak light, they appear well proportioned fabricks; yet they appear so but in that twilight, which is requisite to their conspicuousness. Boyle, Proem. Essay.

2. Eminence; fame; celebrity.

Their writings attract more readers by the author's conspicuousness. Boyle on Colours.

CONSPI'RACY. n. s. [conspiratio, Lat.]

1. A private agreement among several persons to commit some crime; a plot; a concerted treason.

O conspiracy!
Sham'st thou to shew thy dang'rous brow by night,
When evils are most free? Shaksp. Jul. Cæs.

I had forgot that foul conspiracy
Of the beast Caliban, and his confed'rates,
Against my life. Shakspeare, Tempest.

When scarce he had escap'd the blow
Of faction and conspiracy,
Death did his promis'd hopes destroy. Dryden.

2. In law, an agreement of men to do any thing; always taken in the evil part. It is taken for a confederacy of two at the least, falsely to indict one, or to procure one to be indicted of felony.
Cowel.

3. A concurrence; a general tendency of many causes to one event.

When the time now came that misery was ripe for him, there was a conspiracy in all heavenly and earthly things, to frame fit occasions to lead him unto it. Sidney.

The air appearing so malicious in this morbifick conspiracy, exacts a more particular regard.
Harvey on Consumptions.

CONSPI'RANT. adj. [conspirans, Lat.] Conspiring; engaged in a conspiracy or plot; plotting.

Thou art a traitor,
Conspirant 'gainst this high illustrious prince.
Shakspeare, K. Lear.

CONSPIRA'TION.† n. s. [conspiratio, Lat.] An agreement of many to one end.

One would wonder, how from so differing premises, they should infer the same conclusion, were it not that the conspiration of interest were too potent for the diversity of judgement.
Decay of Piety.

The same [duty of praise] must also be publick and united, universal and illimited, with a general consent and holy kind of conspiration.
Bp. Pearson, Serm. Nov. 5. 1678.

What an harmony and conspiration there is betwixt all these laws, one mutually aiding and assisting the other. Hammond, of Conscience, § 28.

CONSPI'RATOR. n. s. [from conspiro, Lat.]

A person engaged in a plot; one who has secretly concerted with others commission of a crime; a plotter.

Achitophel is among the conspirators with Absalom. 2 Sam. xv. 31.

Stand back, thou manifest conspirator;
Thou that contriv'st to murder our dread lord.
Shakspeare, Hen. VI.

But let the bold conspirator beware;
For heav'n makes princes its peculiar care.
Dryden, Span. Fryar.

One put into his hand a note of the whole conspiracy against him, together with all the names of the conspirators. South.

To CONSPI'RE. v. n. [conspiro, Lat.]

1. To concert a crime; to plot; to hatch secret treason.

What was it
That mov'd pale Cassius to conspire?
Shakspeare, Ant. and Cleop.

They took great indignation, and conspired against the king. Apocrypha, Bell and the Dr. v. 28.

Let the air be excluded; for that undermineth the body, and conspireth with the spirit of the body to dissolve it. Bacon.

There is in man a natural possibility to destroy the world; that is, to conspire to know no woman. Brown, Vulg. Err.

The press, the pulpit, and the stage,
Conspire to censure and expose our age.
Roscommon.

2. To agree together: as, all things conspire to make him happy.

So moist and dry when Phœbus shines,
Conspiring give the plant to grow. Heigh.

To CONSPI'RE.* v. a. To plot; to contrive.

All wars are hush'd and gone,
Which countries did conspire.
Old Metr. Vers. of the Psalms, Ps. 46.

Tell me what they deserve,
That do conspire my death with devilish plots
Of damned witchcraft? Shakspeare, Rich. III.

CONSPI'RER.† n. s. [from conspire.] A conspirator; a plotter.

Take no care,
Who chafes, who frets, and where conspirers are;
Macbeth shall never vanquish'd be. Shaksp. Macb.

But these conspirers couched all so cleane
Through close demeanour, that their wiles did weane
My heart from doubts. Mir. for Mag. p. 406.

CONSPI'RING Powers. [In mechanicks.] All such as act in direction not opposite to one another. Harris.

CONSPI'RINGLY.* adv. [from conspiring.] In a manner criminally concerted.

Either violently without mutual consent for urgent reasons, or conspiringly by plot of lust or cunning malice. Milton, Tetrachordon.

CONSPISSA'TION.* n. s. [Lat. conspissatus.] Thickness; the act of thickening.

With taste and colour by natural conspissation
Of things dissever'd.
Ancient Poem in Ashmole's Theat. Chem. p. 176.

For body's but this spirit, fixt, gross by conspissation. More, Infin. of Worlds, st. 13.

To CO'NSPURCATE.* v. a. [Lat. conspurco.] To defile. Cockeram.

CONSPURCA'TION.† n. s. [from conspurco, Lat.] The act of defiling; defilement; pollution. It is in our old vocabularies, and is used by Bp. Hall.

So odious a conspurcation of our holy religion.
Bp. Hall, Rem. p. 162.

CO'NSTABLE.† n. s. [comes stabuli, as it is supposed, Dr. Johnson says; in which many agree with him; comes stabuli meaning the master of the stables, or master of the horse, and thence perhaps a commander of cavalry. But our antiquaries, Verstegan and Selden in particular, refer the word to the Sax. cyning, contracted into KING; and to stable or staple; signifying a prop or stay, the whole word constable being thus as much as columen regis, or one that he especially depends upon in managing his most weighty affairs. This etymology is supported by the occurrence of cunestabula in Domesday Book for maintainer of the king's right. Lord Herbert of Cherbury, in his own Life, p. 44., observes, that "Constable, anciently in France, was the first officer of the army, and so called from appointing the king a place in which he was to stand in the day of battle."]

1. Lord high constable is an ancient officer of the crown. The function of the constable of England consisted in the care of the common peace of the land in deeds of arms, and in matters of war. To the court of the constable and marshal belonged the cognizance of contracts, deeds of arms without the realm, and combats and blasonry of arms within it. The first constable of England was created by the Conqueror, and the office continued hereditary 'till the thirteenth of Henry VIII. when it was laid aside, as being so powerful as to become troublesome to the king. From these mighty magistrates are derived the inferiour constables of hundreds and franchises; two of whom were ordained, in the thirteenth of Edward I. to be chosen in every hundred for the conservation of the peace, and view of armour. These are now called high constables, because continuance of time, and increase both of people and offences, have occasioned others in every town of inferiour authority, called petty constables. Besides these, we have constables denominated from particular places; as, constable of the Tower, of Dover castle, of the castle of Carnarvon; but these are properly castellani, or governours of castles.

Cowell, and Chambers.

When I came hither, I was lord high constable,
And duke of Buckingham; now poor Edward Bohun. Shakspeare.

The knave constable had set me i' th' stocks, i' th' common stocks, for a witch.
Shakspeare, Merry Wives of Windsor.

The constable being a sober man, and an enemy to sedition, went to observe what they did.
Clarendon.

2. To over-run the CONSTABLE. [Perhaps from conte stable, Fr. the settled, firm, and stated account.] To spend more than what a man knows himself to be worth: a low phrase.

CO'NSTABLERY.* n. s. [from constable.] The district called also a constablewick. See CONSTABLEWICK.

In this parish are seven constableries and townships. Burton's Monast. Ebor. 1758, p. 434.

CO'NSTABLESHIP. n. s. [from constable.] The office of a constable.

This keepership is annexed to the constableship of the castle, and that granted out in lease.
Carew, Surv. of Cornwall.

CO'NSTABLEWICK.* n. s. The district over which the authority of a constable extends.

If directed to the constable of D. he is not bound to execute the warrant out of the precincts of his constablewick. Hale, Hist. Pl. of the Cr. ch. 50.

CO'NSTANCY. n. s. [constantia, Lat.]

1. Immutability; perpetuity; unalterable continuance.

The laws of God himself no man will ever deny to be of a different constitution from the former, in respect of the one's constancy, and the mutability of the other. Hooker.

2. Consistency; unvaried state.

Incredible, that constancy in such a variety, such a multiplicity, should be the result of chance.
Ray on the Creation.

3. Resolution; firmness; steadiness; unshaken determination.

In a small isle, amidst the widest seas,
Triumphant constancy has fix'd her seat;
In vain the syrens sing, the tempests beat. Prior.

4. Lasting affection; continuance of love, or friendship.

Constancy is such a stability and firmness of friendship, as overlooks and passes by lesser failures of kindness, and yet still retains the same habitual good-will to a friend. South.

5. Certainty; veracity; reality.

But all the story of the night told over,
More witnesseth than fancy's images,
And grows to something of great constancy,
But, however, strange and admirable. Shakspeare.

CO'NSTANT.† adj. [constans, Lat.]

1. Firm; fixed; not fluid.

If you take highly rectified spirit of wine, and dephlegmed spirit of urine, and mix them, you may turn these two fluid liquors into a constant body. Boyle, Hist. of Firmness.

2. Unvaried; unchanged; immutable; durable.

The world's a scene of changes, and to be Constant, in nature were inconstancy. Cowley.

3. Firm; resolute; determined; immoveable; unshaken.

Some shrewd contents
Now steal the colour from Bassanio's cheek:
Some dear friend dead; else nothing in the world
Could turn so much the constitution
Of any constant man. Shakspeare, Merch. of Ven.

The lord privy seal found the woman, in her examination, constant in her former sayings.
Ld. Herbert, Hist. of Hen. VIII. p. 472.

4. Consistent; steady; grave; applied to things.

I am no more mad than you are; make the trial of it in any constant question.
Shakspeare, Twelfth Night.

5. Free from change of affection.

Both loving one fair maid, they yet remained constant friends. Sidney.

6. Certain; not various; steady; firmly adherent: with to.

Now, through the land, his care of souls he stretch'd,
And like a primitive apostle preach'd;
Still chearful, ever constant to his call;
By many follow'd, lov'd by most, admir'd by all.
Dryden.

He shewed his firm adherence to religion as modelled by our national constitution, and was constant to its offices in devotion, both in publick and in his family. Addison, Freeholder.

CONSTA'NTIA *Wine. Wine, both red and white, so named from the village of Constantia at the Cape of Good Hope, where the vines, which produce this luscious but heavy liquor, are cultivated. The grape from which it is extracted is a species of the muscadel.

CO'NSTANTLY.† adv. [from constant.]

1. Unvariably; perpetually; certainly; steadily.

It is strange that the fathers should never appeal; nay, that they should not constantly do it. Tillotson,

2. Patiently; firmly.

Does our nephew
Bear his restraint so constantly, as you
Deliver it to us? Massinger, Gr. D. of Florence.

To CONSTE'LLATE. v. n. [constellatus, Latin.] To join lustre; to shine with one general light.

The several things which engage our affections, do, in a transcendent manner, shine forth and constellate in God. Boyle.

To CONSTE'LLATE.† v. a. [The accent on this word was formerly on the first syllable.] To unite several shining bodies in one splendour.

Great constitutions and such as are constellated into knowledge do nothing till they outdo all. Brown, Vulg. Err.

Who constellated your fair birth?
Beaum. and Fl. Thierry and Theodoret.

These scattered perfections, which were divided among the several ranks of inferiour natures, were summed up and constellated in ours. Glanville, Scep.

CONSTELLA'TION. n. s. [from constellate.]

1. A cluster of fixed stars.

For the stars of heaven, and the constellations thereof, shall not give their light. Isaiah, xiii. 10.

The earth, the air resounded,
The heav'ns and all the constellations rung. Milton, P. L.

A constellation is but one,
Though 'tis a train of stars. Dryden.

2. An assemblage of splendours, or excellencies.

The condition is a constellation or conjuncture of all those gospel-graces, faith, hope, charity, self-denial, repentance, and the rest. Hammond, Pract. Cat.

CONSTERNA'TION. n. s. [from consterno, Latin.] Astonishment; amazement; alienation of mind by a surprise; surprise; wonder.

They find the same holy consternation upon themselves that Jacob did at Bethel, which he called the gate of heaven. South.

The natives, dubious whom
They must obey, in consternation wait,
'Till rigid conquest will pronounce their liege. Philips.

To CO'NSTIPATE. v. a. [from constipo, Latin.]

1. To croud together into a narrow room; to thicken; to condense.

Of cold, the property is to condense and constipate. Bacon.

It may, by amassing, cooling, and constipating of waters, turn them into rain. Ray on the Creation.

There might arise some vertiginous motions or whirlpools in the matter of the chaos, whereby the atoms might be thrust and crouded to the middle of those whirlpools, and there constipate one another into great solid globes. Bentley, Serm. 7.

2. To stuff up, or stop by filling up the passages.

It is not probable that any aliment should have the quality of entirely constipating or shutting up the capillary vessels. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

3. To bind the belly; or make costive.

Omitting honey which is laxative and the powder of some loadstones in this, doth rather constipate and bind, than purge and loosen the belly. Brown, Vulg. Err.

CONSTIPA'TION. n. s. [from constipate.]

1. The act of crouding any thing into less room; condensation.

This worketh by the detention of the spirits, and constipation of the tangible parts. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

[It] requires either absolute fulness of matter, or a pretty close constipation and mutual contact of its particles. Bentley, Serm. 7.

2. Stoppage; obstruction by plenitude.

The inactivity of the gall occasions a constipation of the belly. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

3. The state of having the body bound.

CONSTI'TUENT. adj. [constituens, Latin.] That makes any thing what it is; necessary to existence; elemental; essential; that of which any thing consists.

Body, soul, and reason, are the three parts necessarily constituent of a man. Dryden, Dufresnoy.

All animals derived all the constituent matter of their bodies, successively, in all ages out of this fund. Woodward.

It is impossible that the figures and sizes of its constituent particles, should be so justly adapted as to touch one another in every point. Bentley, Serm.

CONSTI'TUENT.† n. s.

1. The person or thing which constitutes or settles any thing in its peculiar state.

Their first composure and origination requires a higher and nobler constituent than chance. Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

2. That which is necessary to the subsistence of any thing.

The obstruction of the mesentery is a great impediment to nutrition; for the lymph in those glands is a necessary constituent of the aliment. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

3. He that deputes another; as, the representatives in parliament disregard their constituents.

You may communicate this letter in any manner you think proper to my constituents. Burke to the Sheriffs of Bristol, 1777.

To CO'NSTITUTE. v. a. [constituo, Lat.]

1. To give formal existence; to make any thing what it is; to produce.

Prudence is not only a moral but christian virtue, such as is necessary to the constituting of all others. Decay of Piety.

2. To erect; to establish.

We must obey laws appointed and constituted by lawful authority, not against the law of God. Bp. Taylor, Holy Living.

It will be necessary to consider, how at first those several churches were constituted, that we may understand how in this one church they were all united. Pearson.

3. To depute; to appoint another to an office.

CO'NSTITUTE.* n. s. [Lat. constitutum, the thing appointed.] An established law.

A man that wil not obay the king's constitute. Preston, Trag. of Cambises, (about 1561.)

CO'NSTITUTER.† n. s. [old Fr. constituteur.] One that constitutes or appoints.

Faith is the foundation of justice, which is the chief constitutor and maker of a publyke weal, and, by the aforementioned authoritie, conservator of the same. Sir T. Elyot, Gov. fol. 162.

CONSTITU'TION. n. s. [from constitute.]

1. The act of constituting; enacting; deputing; establishing; producing.

2. State of being; particular texture of parts; natural qualities.

This is more beneficial than any other constitution. Bentley.

CO'NTACT. n. s. [contactus, Lat.] Touch; close union; junction of one body to another.

The Platonists hold, that the spirit of the lover doth pass into the spirits of the person loved, which causeth the desire of return into the body; whereupon followeth that appetite of contact and conjunction. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

When the light fell so obliquely on the air, which in other places was between them, as to be all reflected, it seemed in that place of contact to be wholly transmitted. Newton, Opt.

The air, by its immediate contact, may coagulate the blood which flows along the air-bladders.
Arbuthnot on Diet.

CONTA'CTION.† n. s. [contactus, Lat.] The act of touching; a joining one body to another.

That deleterious it may be at some distance, and destructive without corporal contaction, there is no high improbability. Brown, Vulg. Err.

It is a rule in philosophy, that every natural agent works by a contaction, whether bodily or virtual. Bp. Hall, Rem. p. 90.

CONTA'GION.† n. s. [Fr. contagion, Lat. contagio, from con with, and tangere, to touch.]

1. The emission from body to body, by which diseases are communicated.

If we two be one, and thou play false,
I do digest the poison of thy flesh,
Being strumpeted by thy contagion.
Shakspeare, Com. of Err.

In infection and contagion from body to body, as the plague and the like, the infection is received many times by the body passive; but yet is, by the strength and good disposition thereof, repulsed.
Bacon.

2. Infection; propagation of mischief or disease.

Nor will the goodness of intention excuse the scandal and contagion of example. K. Charles.

Down fell they,
And the dire hiss renew'd, and the dire form

3. Pestilence; venomous emanations.

Will he steal out of his wholesome bed,
To dare the vile contagion of the night?
Shakspeare, Julius Cæsar.

CONTA'GIOUS.† adj. [old Fr. contagieux.] Infectious; caught by approach; poisonous; pestilential.

The jades
That drag the tragick melancholy night,
From their misty jaws
Breathe foul, contagious darkness in the air.
Shakspeare, Hen. VI.

We sicken soon from her contagious care,
Grieve for her sorrows, groan for her despair.
Prior.

CONTA'GIOUSNESS.† n. s. [from contagious.] The quality of being contagious; infection. Huloet.

An excellent preservative against the contagiousness of sin.
W. Mountagu, Dev. Ess. (1648,) p.177.

To CONTA'IN. v. a. [contineo, Lat.]

1. To hold as a vessel.

There are many other things which Jesus did, the which, if they should be written every one, I suppose that even the world itself could not contain the books that should be written.
St. John, xxi. 25.

Gently instructed I shall hence depart,
Greatly in peace of thought, and have my fill
Of knowledge what this vessel can contain.
Milton, P. L.

What thy stores contain bring forth, and pour
Abundance. Milton, P. L.

2. To comprehend; to comprise.

What seem'd fair in all the world, seem'd now
Mean, or in her summ'd up, in her contain'd.
Milton, P. L.

The earth,
Though in comparison of heav'n so small
Nor glist'ring, may of solid good contain
More plenty, than the sun that barren shines.
Milton, P. L.

3. To comprise; as a writing.

Wherefore also it is contained in the scripture.
1 Peter, ii. 6.

4. To restrain; to withhold; to keep within bounds.

All men should be contained in duty ever after, without the terrour of warlike forces.
Spenser on Ireland.

Their king's person contains the unruly people from evil occasions. Ibid.

I tell you, sirs,
If you should smile, he grows impatient. ——
— Fear not, my lord, we can contain ourselves.
Shakspeare.

To CONTA'IN.† v. n. To live in continence.

If they cannot contain, let them marry.
1 Cor. vii. 9.

Whom we must openly charge, that either they would marry, if they cannot contain; or that they would contain, if they will not marry.
Bp. Hall, Hon. of the Married Clergy, p.51.

CONTA'INABLE. adj. [from contain.] Possible to be contained.

The air containable within the cavity of the eolipile, amounted to eleven grains. Boyle.

To CONTA'MINATE. v. a. [contamino, Lat.] To defile; to pollute; to corrupt by base mixture.

Shall we now
Contaminate our fingers with base bribes?
Shakspeare, Jul. Cæs.

A base pander holds the chamber-door,
Whilst by a slave, no gentler than a dog,
His fairest daughter is contaminated.
Shakspeare, Hen. V.

Do it not with poison; strangle her in her bed,
Even in the bed she hath contaminated.
Shakspeare, Othello.

I quickly shed
Some of his bastard-blood: and, in disgrace,
Bespoke him thus: contaminated, base,
And misbegotten blood I spill of thine.
Shakspeare, Hen. VI.

Though it be necessitated, by its relation to flesh, to a terrestrial converse; yet 'tis like the sun, without contaminating its beams.
Glanville, Apol.

He that lies with another man's wife, propagates children in another's family for him to keep, and contaminates the honour thereof as much as in him lies. Ayliffe, Parergon.

CONTA'MINATE.* adj. [from the verb.] Corrupt by base mixture; polluted.

How dearly would it touch thee to the quick,
Should'st thou but hear I were licentious;
And that this body, consecrate to thee,
By ruffian lust should be contaminate?
Shakspeare, Com. of Err.

The sons of ideots, of ignoble birth,
Contaminate, and viler than the earth.
Sandys, Paraphr. of Job, p. 42.

William Rufus was contaminate as well with his own, as his father's sacrilege.
Spelman, Hist. of Sacrilege, add. by Stephens, § viii.

CONTAMINA'TION.† n. s. [from contaminate.] Pollution; defilement.

What was he that accused marriage of unholiness out of sancti estote; of uncleannesss out of omnia munda mundis; of contamination with carnal concupiscense? Was it not his own Pope Innocentius?
Bp. Hall, Hon. of the Marr. Clergy, p. 24.

CO'NTECK.* n. s. [our old word for contest. Mr. Tyrwhitt says it is of Saxon origin; but it is more probably of French, and adopted from attaquer.] Quarrel; contention. Obsolete.

Let none mislike of that may not be mended:
So conteck soone by concord mought be ended.
Spenser, Shep. Cal. May.

CONTE'CTION.* n. s. [Lat. contego, contectum.] A covering.

Fig-leaves by sundry authors are described to have some appearance unto genitals, and so were aptly formed for such contection of those parts.
Sir T. Brown, Misc. Tracts, p.15.

CONTE'MERATED. adj. [contemeratus, Lat.] Violated; polluted. Dict.

To CONTE'MN. v. a. [contemno, Lat.] To despise; to scorn; to slight; to disregard; to neglect; to defy.

Yet better thus, and known to be contemned,
That still contemned and flattered.
Shakspeare, King Lear.

Eve, thy contempt of life and pleasure seems
To argue in thee something more sublime
And excellent than what thy mind contemns.
Milton, P. L.

Pygmalion then the Tyrian sceptre sway'd;
One who contemn'd divine and human laws,
Then strife ensu'd. Dryden, Virg. Æneid.

CONTE'MNER.† n. s. [old Fr. contemneur.] One that contemns; a despiser; a scorner.

A terrible example to all contemners and deriders of religion and godlynesse.
Woolton's Chr. Man. (1576,) k. iij.

Commonly they come home common contemners of marriage, and ready persuaders of all others to the same. Ascham's Schoolmaster.

That contemner of the world must still know, he hath not yet taken out the Baptist's copy, not made such use of the doctrine of the rod, as is expected from him. Hammond's Works, iv. 492.

St. Hierom, — a great clerk, and singular contemner of secular superfluities.
Hales, Serm. at the close of his Rem. p.31.

He counsels him to persecute innovators of worship, not only as contemners of the gods, but disturbers of the state. South.

To CONTE'MPER.† v. a. [contempero, Lat.] To moderate; to reduce to a lower degree by mixing something of opposite qualities.

I know not whether he be more feared or loved, both affections are so sweetly contempered in all hearts. Bp. Hall, Charact. 1608, p. 61.

The leaves qualify and contemper the heat, and hinder the evaporation of moisture.
Ray on the Creation.

The antidotes with which philosophy has medicated the cup of life, though they cannot give it salubrity and sweetness, have at least allayed its bitterness, and contempered its malignity.
Johnson, Rambler, No. 150.

CONTE'MPERAMENT. n. s. [from contempero, Lat.] The degree of any quality.

There is nearly an equal contemperament of the warmth of our bodies to that of the hottest part of the atmosphere. Derham.

To CONTE'MPERATE. v. a. [from contemper.] To diminish any quality by something contrary; to moderate; to temper.

The mighty Nile and Niger do not only moisten and contemperate the air, but refresh and humectate the earth. Brown.

If blood abound, let it out, regulating the patient's diet, and contemperating the humours.
Wiseman, Surgery.

CONTEMPERA'TION. n. s. [from contemperate.]

1. The act of diminishing any quality by admixture of the contrary; the act of moderating or tempering.

The use of air, without which there is no continuation in life, is not nutrition, but the contemperation of fervour in the heart. Brown, Vul. Err.

2. Proportionate mixture; proportion.

There is not greater variety in men's faces, and in the contemperations of their natural humours, than there is in their phantasies.
Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

To CONTE'MPLATE. v. a. [contemplor, Latin. This seems to have been once accented on the first syllable.] To consider with continued attention; to study; to meditate.

There is not much difficulty in confining the mind to contemplate what we have a great desire to know. Watts.

To CONTE'MPLATE. v. n. To muse; to think studiously with long attention.

So many hours must I take my rest!
So many hours must I contemplate.
Shakspeare, Hen. VI.

Sapor had an heaven of glass, which he trod upon, contemplating over the same as if he had been Jupiter. Peacham.

How can I consider what belongs to myself, when I have been so long contemplating on you.
Dryden, Juv. Pref.

CONTEMPLA'TION. n. s. [from contemplate.]

1. Meditation; studious thought on any subject; continued attention.

How now, what serious contemplation are you in? Shakspeare.

Contemplation is keeping the idea, which is brought into the mind, for some time actually in view. Locke.

2. Holy meditation; a holy exercise of the soul, employed in attention to sacred things.

I have breathed a secret vow,
To live in prayer and contemplation,
Only attended by Nerissa here.
Shakspeare, Merch. of Venice.

3. The faculty of study; opposed to the power of action.

There are two functions, contemplation and practice, according to that general division of objects; some of which entertain our speculation, others employ our actions. South.

CONTE'MPLATIVE. adj. [from contemplate.]

1. Given to thought or study; studious; thoughtful.

Fixt and contemplative their looks,
Still turning over nature's books. Denham.

2. Employed in study; dedicated to study.

I am no courtier, nor versed in state affairs: my life hath rather been contemplative than active. Bacon.

Contemplative men may be without the pleasure of discovering the secrets of state, and men of action are commonly without the pleasure of tracing the secrets of divine art. Grew's Cosmol.

3. Having the power of thought or meditation.

So many kinds of creatures might be to exercise the contemplative faculty of man. Ray on the Creation.

CONTE'MPLATIVELY.† adv. [from contemplative.] Thoughtfully; attentively; with deep attention. Huloet.

CONTE'MPLATOR. n. s. [Latin.] One employed in study; an inquirer after knowledge; a student.

In the Persian tongue the word magus imports as much as a contemplator of divine and heavenly science. Raleigh, Hist. of the World.

The Platonick contemplators reject both these descriptions, founded upon parts and colours. Brown, Vulg. Err.

CONTE'MPORARINESS.* n. s. [from contemporary.] Existence at the same point of time.

The series of the matter, the epoch of the times, and regular succession and contemporariness of princes. Howell, Instruct. for For. Trav. p. 39.

2. Born at the same time.

A grove born with himself he sees,
And loves his old contemporary trees. Cowley.

3. Existing at the same point of time.

It is impossible to make the ideas of yesterday, to-day, and to-morrow, to be the same; or bring ages past and future together, and make them contemporary. Locke.

CONTE'MPORARY. n. s. One who lives at the same time with another.

All this in blooming youth you have atchiev'd; Nor are your foil'd contemporaries griev'd. Dryd.

As he has been favourable to me, he will hear of his kindness from our contemporaries; for we are fallen into an age illiterate, censorious, and detracting. Dryden, Juv. Pref.

The active part of mankind, as they do most for the good of their contemporaries, very deservedly gain the greatest share in their applauses. Addison, Freeholder.

To CONTE'MPORISE. v. a. [con and tempus, Lat.] To make contemporary; to place in the same age.

The indifferency of their existences contemporised into our actions, admits a farther consideration. Brown, Vulg. Err.

CONTE'MPT.† n. s. [contempt, old Fr. contemptus, Lat.]

1. The act of despising others; slight regard; scorn.

It was neither in contempt nor pride that I did not bow. Esther, xiii. 12.

The shame of being miserable,
Exposes men to scorn and base contempt,
Even from their nearest friends. Denham.

There is no action in the behaviour of one man towards another, of which human nature is more impatient than of contempt; it being an undervaluing of a man, upon a belief of his utter uselessness and inability, and a spiteful endeavour to engage the rest of the world in the same slight esteem of him. South.

His friend smil'd scornful, and with proud contempt
Rejects as idle what his fellow dreamt. Dryd. Fab.

Nothing, says Longinus, can be great,
The contempt of which is great. Addison.

Wheat is contented with a meaner earth, and contenting with a suitable gain. Carew, Cornwall.

CONTE'NT.† n. s. [from the verb.]

1. Moderate happiness; such satisfaction as, though it does not fill up desire, appeases complaint.

Nought's had, all's spent,
Where our desire is got without content.
Shakspeare, Macbeth.

One thought content the good to be enjoy'd;
This every little accident destroy'd. Dryden.

A wise content his even soul secur'd;
By want not shaken, nor by wealth allur'd.
Smith on Philips.

2. Acquiescence; satisfaction in a thing nexamined.

Others for language all their care express,
And value books, as women men, for dress:
Their praise is still—the stile is excellent;
The sense they humbly take upon content.
Pope, Epist.

3. [From contentus, contained.] That which is contained, or included in any thing.

Though my heart's content firm love doth bear,
Nothing of that shall from mine eyes appear.
Shakspeare.

Scarcely any thing can be determined of the particular contents of any single mass of ore by mere inspection. Woodward.

Experiments are made on the blood of healthy animals: in a weak habit, serum might afford other contents. Arbuthnot.

4. The power of containing; extent; capacity.

This island had then fifteen hundred strong ships, of great content. Bacon.

CONTE'NTFULLY.* adv. [from contentful.] In a perfectly contented way. Huloet.

CONTE'NTION.† n. s. [contentio, Lat. It has been well observed to me by a learned friend, that the three significations, as arranged by Johnson, should be reversed. Eagerness is the primary signification. Emulation is the next, because eagerness is apt to produce emulation. And Strife is the third, as emulation is apt to produce strife.]

1. Strife; debate; contest; quarrel; mutual opposition.

Can we with manners ask what was the difference?
—— Safely, I think; 'twas a contention in publick.
Shakspeare.

Avoid foolish questions and genealogies, and contentions and strivings. Tit. iii. 9.

Can they keep themselves in a perpetual contention with their ease, their reason, and their God, and not endure a short combat with a sinful custom. Decay of Piety.

The ancients made contention the principle that reigned in the chaos at first, and then love; the one to express the divisions, and the other the union of all parties in the middle and common bond. Burnet, Theory of the Earth.

2. Emulation; endeavour to excel.

Sons and brother at a strife!
What is your quarrel? how began it first?
—— No quarrel, but a sweet contention.
Shakspeare, Hen. VI.

3. Eagerness; zeal; ardour; vehemence of endeavour.

Your own earnestness and contention to effect what you are about, will continually suggest to you several artifices. Holder.

This is an end, which, at first view, appears worthy our utmost contention to obtain. Rogers.

CONTE'NTIOUS.† adj. [old Fr. contentieux.] Quarrelsome; given to debate; perverse; not peaceable.

Thou think'st much that this contentious storm
Invades us to the skin. Shakspeare, K. Lear.

There are certain contentious humours that are never to be pleased. L'Estrange.

Rest made them idle, idleness made them curious, and curiosity contentious. Decay of Piety.

CONTE'NTIOUS Jurisdiction. [In law.] A court which has a power to judge and determine differences between contending parties. The lord chief justices, and judges, have a contentious jurisdiction; but the lords of the treasury, and the commissioners of the customs, have none, being merely judges of accounts and transactions. Chambers.

CONTE'NTIOUSLY. adv. [from contentious.] Perversely; quarrelsomely.

We shall not contentiously rejoin, or only to justify our own, but to applaud and confirm his maturer assertions. Brown.

CONTE'NTIOUSNESS. † n. s. [from contentious.] Proneness to contest; perverseness; turbulence; quarrelsomeness.

Contentiousness in a feast of charity is more scandal than any posture.
Herbert, Country Parson, ch. 22.

Bentley, Serm.

CONTE'NTLESS. adj. [from content.] Discontented; dissatisfied; uneasy.

Best states, contentless,
Have a distracted and most wretched being,
Worse than the worst, content. Shaks. Timon.

CONTE'NTLY.* adv. [from content.] In a quiet, contented way.

We'll away unto your country house,
And there we'll learn to live contently.
Beaum. and Fl. Rule a Wife.

CONTE'NTMENT.† n. s. [old Fr. contentement.]

1. Acquiescence without plenary satisfaction.

Such men's contentment must be wrought by stratagem: the usual method of fare is not for them. Hooker.

Submission is the only reasoning between a creature and its Maker, and contentment in his will is the best remedy we can apply to misfortunes. Temple.

Contentment, without external honour, is humility; without the pleasure of eating, temperance. Grew, Cosmol.

Some place the bliss in action, some in ease,
Those call it pleasure, and contentment these.
Pope, Ess.

But now no face divine contentment wears,
'Tis all blank sadness, or continual tears. Pope.

2. Gratification.

At Paris the prince spent one whole day, to give his mind some contentment in viewing of a famous city. Wotton.

Let my heart so joy in the assured expectation of it, that it may disrelish all the contentments, and contemn all the crosses, which this world can afford me. Bp. Hall, Soliloq. 57.

CONTE'RMINABLE.* adj. [from the Lat. contermino.] Capable of the same bounds.

There succeeded in the same place the departure of my no less dear niece, your long, and I dare say, your still beloved consort, (for love and life are not conterminable,) as well appeareth by your many tender expressions of that disjuncture. Sir H. Wotton, Letters.

CONTE'RMINATE.* adj. [Lat. contermino, conterminatum.] That which hath the same bounds.

Here are kingdoms mix'd
And nations join'd, a strength of empire fix'd
Conterminate with heaven.
B. Jonson, Masques at Court.

CONTE'RMINOUS. adj. [conterminus, Latin.] Bordering upon; touching at the boundaries.

This conformed so many of them, as were conterminous to the colonies and garrisons, to the Roman laws. Hale.

CONTERRA'NEAN.* adj. [Lat. conterraneus.] Of the same earth or country.

I hold that of the orator to be a wild extravagant speech, That if women were not conterranean and mingled with men, angels would descend and dwell among us. Howell, Lett. iv. 7.

CONTERRA'NEOUS. adj. [conterraneus, Lat.] Of the same country. Dict.

CONTESSERA'TION.* n. s. [from the Lat. con and tesseratus, variegated.] Assemblage; collection.

I have not, so much as with one dash of a pencil, offered to describe that person of his, which afforded so unusual a contesseration of elegancies, and set of rarities to the beholder.

B. Oley's Life of G. Herbert, (1671,) sign. O. 5.

To CONTE'ST. v. a. [contester, Fr., probably from contra testari, Latin.] To dispute; to controvert; to litigate; to call in question.

Contesting not with them, nor contradicting them with the spirit of frowardness.

Donne, Hist. of the Sept. p. 146.

The difficulty of an argument adds to the pleasure of contesting with it, when there are hopes of victory. Burnet.

2. To vie; to emulate.

I do contest
As hotly and as nobly with thy love,
As ever in ambitious strength I did
Contend against thy valour. Shakspeare, Coriol.

Of man, who dares in pomp with Jove contest,
Unchang'd, immortal, and supremely blest?
Pope, Odyss.

CO'NTEST. n. s. [from the verb. It is now accented on the first syllable.] Dispute; difference; debate.

This of old no less contests did move,
Than when for Homer's birth sev'n cities strove.
Denham.

A definition is the only way whereby the meaning of words can be known, without leaving room for contest about it. Locke.

Leave all noisy contests, all immodest clamours, and brawling language. Watts.

CONTE'STABLE. adj. [from contest.] That may be contested; disputable; controvertible.

CONTE'STABLENESS. n. s. [from contestable.] Possibility of contest. Dict.

CONTESTA'TION.† n. s. [contest.] The act of contesting; debate; strife.

Bacon, Report of the E. of Salisbury.

Never contention rise in either's breast,
But contestation whose love shall be best.
Beaum. and Fl. Four Plays in One.

Those of other warmer regions, impatient of the wrongs of their conjugal disappointments, fly out into open contestations.

Bp. Hall, Cases of Consc. iv. 10.

Doors shut, visits forbidden, and, which was worse, divers contestations, even with the queen herself. Wotton.

After years spent in domestick, unsociable contestations, she found means to withdraw. Clarendon.

CONTESTA'TION.* n. s. [old Fr. contestation, Lat. contestor, to witness.] Testimony; proof by witnesses.

We are all as well baptized into the name of the Holy Spirit, as of the Father and Son, wherein is signified, and by a solemn contestation ratified on the part of God, that those three joined are conspiringly propitious and favourable to us.

Barrow, Serm. ii. S. 34.

CONTE'STINGLY.* adv. [from To Contest.] In a contending manner.

The more contestingly they set their reason to explain them, the more difficult they, perhaps, will find them at that conjuncture.

W. Mountagu, Dev. Ess. (1648,) p. 371.

CONTE'STLESS.* adj. [from contest and less.] Not to be disputed.

Modest sense
Of my unequal worth compell'd some doubting;
But now 'tis truth contestless. A. Hill.

To CONTE'X. v. a. [contexo, Lat.] To weave together; to unite by interposition of parts. This word is not in use.

Nature may contex a plant, though that be a perfectly mixt concrete, without having all the elements previously presented to her to compound it of. Boyle.

The fluid body of quicksilver is contexed with the salts it carries up in sublimation. Boyle.

CO'NTEXT. n. s. [contextus, Latin.] The general series of a discourse; the parts of the discourse that precede and follow the sentence quoted.

That chapter is really a representation of one, which hath only the knowledge, not practice of his duty; as is manifest from the context.

Hammond on Fundamentals.

CONTE'XT. adj. [from contex.] Knit together; firm.

Hollow and thin, for lightness; but withal context and firm, for strength. Derham, Phys. Theol.

To CONTE'XT.* v. a. [from the noun.] To knit together. An unusual but useful verb.

This were to unglew the whole world's frame, which is contexted only by commerce and contracts.

Junius, Sin Stigmat. (1639,) p. 776.

CONTE'XTURAL.* adj. [from contexture.] Relating to the human frame.

Again, the contextural expressions are of the self-same nature.

Smith, Portrait. of Old Age, p. 182.

CONTE'XTURE. n. s. [from context.] The disposition of parts one amongst others; the composition of any thing out of separate parts; the system; the constitution; the manner in which any thing is woven or formed.

He was not of any delicate contexture; his limbs rather sturdy than dainty. Wotton.

Every species, afterwards expressed, was produced from that idea, forming that wonderful contexture of created beings. Dryden, Duf.

Hence 'gan relax
The ground's contexture; hence Tartarian dregs,
Sulphur, and nitrous spume, enkindling fierce,
Bellow'd within their darksome caves. Philips.

This apt, this wise contexture of the sea,
Makes it the ships, driv'n by the winds, obey:
Whence hardy merchants sail from shore to shore.
Blackmore.

CONTIGNA'TION.† n. s. [contignatio, Lat.]

1. A frame of beams joined together; a story.

We mean a porch, or cloister, or the like, of one contignation, and not in storied buildings.

Wotton, Architecture.

Where more of these orders than one shall be set in several stories or contignations, there must be an exquisite care to place the columns precisely one over another. Ibid.

Their private oratories were appointed in the uppermost contignation of their houses.

Gregory's Works, p. 10.

2. The act of framing or joining a fabrick of wood.

Their own buildings — were without any party-wall, and linked by contignation into the edifice of France. Burke.

CONTIGU'ITY.† n. s. [from contiguous.] Actual contact; situation in which two bodies or countries touch upon each other.

He defined magnetical attraction to be a natural imitation and disposition conforming unto contiguity. Brown.

The immediate contiguity of that convex were a real space. Hale, Orig. of Mankind.

Warton, Hist. of Kiddington, p. 18.

CONTI'GUOUS. adj. [contiguus, Lat.]

1. Meeting so as to touch; bordering upon each other; not separate.

Flame doth not mingle with flame as air doth with air, or water with water, but only remaineth contiguous, as it cometh to pass betwixt consisting bodies. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

The loud misrule
Of chaos far remov'd; lest fierce extremes,
Contiguous, might distemper the whole frame.
Milton, P. L.

The East and West
Upon the globe, a mathematick point
Only divides: thus happiness and misery,
And all extremes, are still contiguous.
Denham, Sophy.

Distinguish them by the diminution of the lights and shadows, joining the contiguous objects by the participation of their colours. Dryden, Dufres.

When I viewed it too near, the two halves of the paper did not appear fully divided from one another, but seemed contiguous at one of their angles. Newton, Opt.

2. It has sometimes with.

Water, being contiguous with air, cooleth it, but moisteneth it not. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

CONTI'GUOUSLY. adv. [from contiguous.] Without any intervening spaces.

Thus disembroil'd, they take their proper place,
The next of kin contiguously embrace,
And foes are sunder'd by a larger space.
Dryden, Ovid.

CONTI'GUOUSNESS.† n. s. [from contiguous.] Close connection; coherence.

The suspicious houses, as if afraid to be infected with more misery than they have already, by contiguousness to others, keep off at a distance, having many waste places betwixt them.
Fuller's Holy War, p. 276.

CO'NTINENCE. } n. s. [continentia, Lat.]
CO'NTINENCY. }

1. Restraint: command of one's self.

He knew what to say; he knew also when to leave off, a continence which is practised by a few writers. Dryden, Fab. Pref.

2. Forbearance of lawful pleasure.

Content without lawful venery, is continence; without unlawful, chastity. Grew, Cosmol.

3. Chastity in general.

Where is he?
— In her chamber, making a sermon of continency to her, and rails, and swears, and rates.
Shaksp. Tam. of the Shrew.

Suffer not dishonour to approach
Th' imperial seat; to virtue consecrate,
To justice, continence, and nobility.
Titus Andronicus.

4. Moderation in lawful pleasures.

Chastity is either abstinence or continence: abstinence is that of virgins or widows; continence, of married persons. Bp. Taylor.

5. Continuity; uninterrupted course.

Answers ought to be made before the same judge, before whom the depositions were produced, lest the continence of the course should be divided; or in other terms, lest there should be a discontinuance of the cause. Ayliffe, Parergon.

CO'NTINENT.† adj. [continens, Lat.; continent, old Fr.]

1. Chaste; abstemious in lawful pleasures.

Life
Hath been as continent, as chaste, as true,
As I am now unhappy. Shaksp. Wint. Tale.

A shamefaced and faithful woman is a double grace, and her continent mind cannot be valued.
Ecclus. xxvi. 15.

2. Restrained; moderate; temperate.

I pray you have a continent forbearance, 'till the speed of his rage goes slower.
Shakspeare, K. Lear.

3. Continuous; connected.

The North-east part of Asia is, if not continent with the West side of America, yet certainly it is the least disjoined by sea of all that coast of Asia. Brerewood on Languages.

4. Opposing; restraining.

My desire
All continent impediments would o'erbear,
That did oppose my will. Shakspeare.

CO'NTINENT.† n. s. [continens, Lat.]

1. Land not disjointed by the sea from other lands.

Whether this portion of the world were rent,
By the rude ocean, from the continent;
Or thus created, it was sure design'd
To be the sacred refuge of mankind. Waller.

The declivity of rivers will be so much the less, and therefore the continents will be the less drained, and will gradually increase in humidity.
Bentley, Serm.

2. That which contains any thing. This sense is perhaps only in Shakspeare, Dr. Johnson says. But there is abundant and good authority for this usage of the word.

O cleave my sides!
Heart, once be stronger than thy continent,
Crack thy frail case. Shaksp. Ant. and Cleop.

Close pent-up guilts,
Rive your contending continents.
Shakspeare, K. Lear.

I told our pilot that past other men
He most must bear firm spirits, since he sway'd
The continent that all our spirits convey'd.
Chapman, Odyss. 12.

I did not say that the Book of Articles only was the continent of the Church of England's publick doctrine. Abp. Laud against Fisher, p. 50.

The smaller continent which we call a pipkin.
Kennet, Paroch. Antiq. Gloss. in v. Potagium.

CONTINE'NTAL.* adj. [from continent.] Respecting a continent; particularly relating to the states on the continent of Europe; a word much used in the politicks of modern times.

CO'NTINENTLY.* adv. [from continent.] Chastely.

When Paul wrote this epistle, it was lykely enough that the man would live continently.
Martin on the Marr. of Priests, (1554,) X. i.

To CONTI'NGE. v. n. [contingo, Lat.] To touch; to reach; to happen. Dict.

CONTI'NGENCE.† } n. s. [from contingent.]
CONTI'NGENCY. }

1. The quality of being fortuitous; accidental possibility.

Their credulities assent unto any prognosticks, which, considering the contingency in events, are only in the prescience of God. Brown, Vulg. Err.

For once, O heaven! unfold thy adamantine book;
If not thy firm, immutable decree,
At least the second page of great contingency,
Such as consists with wills originally free.
Dryden.

It is a blind contingence of events?
Dryden, Amphitryon.

Aristotle says, we are not to build certain rules upon the contingency of human actions. South.

2. The act of reaching to or touching.

From the time of the sun's being in F, the point of his rising, till he came to L, the point of contingency, the shadow of the style went still forward from S by Q to M.
Gregory's Posthuma, (1650,) p. 39.

CONTI'NGENT.† adj. [contingens, Lat.]

1. Falling out by chance; accidental; not determinable by any certain rule.

Hazard naturally implies in it, first, something future; secondly, something contingent. South.

I first informed myself in all material circumstances of it, in more places than one, that there might be nothing casual or contingent in any one of those circumstances. Woodward.

2. Dependent upon an uncertainty.

If a contingent legacy be left to any one when he attains, or if he attains, the age of twenty-one, and he dies before that time, it is a lapsed legacy.
Blackstone.

CONTI'NGENT. n. s.

1. A thing in the hands of chance.

By contingents we are to understand those things which come to pass without any human forecast.
Grew, Cosmol.

His understanding could almost pierce into future contingents, his conjectures improving even to prophecy. South, Serm.

2. A proportion that falls to any person upon a division: thus, in time of war, each prince of Germany is to furnish his contingent of men, money, and munition.

CONTI'NGENTLY. adv. [from contingent.] Accidentally; without any settled rule.

It is digged out of the earth contingently, and indifferently, as the pyritæ and agates.
Woodward, Nat. Hist.

CONTI'NGENTNESS. n. s. [from contingent.] Accidentalness.

CONTI'NUAL.† adj. [continuel, old Fr. continuus, Latin.]

1. Incessant; proceeding without interruption; successive without any space of time between. Continual is used of time, and continuous of place, Dr. Johnson says; but formerly, I may observe, continual had the sense of continuous; as, "walls are either entire and continual, or intermitted." Wotton's Elem. of Architecture.

He that is of a merry heart, hath a continual feast. Proverbs, xv.

Other care perhaps
May have diverted from continual watch
Our great forbidder. Milton, P. L.

'Tis all blank sadness, or continual tears. Pope.

2. [In law.] A continual claim is made from time to time, within every year and day, to land or other thing, which, in some respect, we cannot attain without danger. For example, if I be disseised of land, into which, though I have right into it, I dare not enter, for fear of beating; it behooveth me to hold on my right of entry to the best opportunity of me and mine heir, by approaching as near it as I can, once every year as long as I live; and so I save the right of entry to my heir. Cowel.

3. It is sometimes used for perpetual.

CONTI'NUALLY. adv. [from continual.]

1. Without pause; without interruption.

The drawing of boughs into the inside of a room, where fire is continually kept, hath been tried with grapes. Bacon.

2. Without ceasing.

Why do not all animals continually increase in bigness, during the whole space of their lives?
Bentley, Serm.

CONTI'NUALNESS.* n. s. [from continual.] Permanence.

So then, though sleep partake not of our devotion, yet this hinders not the continualness of it.
Hales, Rem. p. 141.

CONTI'NUANCE. n. s. [from continue.]

1. Succession uninterrupted.

The brute immediately regards his own preservation, or the continuance of his species.
Addison, Spect.

2. Permanence in one state.

Continuance of evil doth in itself increase evil.
Sidney.

A chamber where a great fire is kept, though the fire be at one stay, yet with the continuance continually hath its heat increased. Sidney.

These Romish casuists speak peace to the consciences of men, by suggesting something which shall satisfy their minds, notwithstanding a known, avowed continuance in sin. South.

3. Abode in a place.

4. Duration; lastingness.

You either fear his humour, or my negligence, that you call in question the continuance of his love. Shaksp. Tw. Night.

Their duty depending upon fear, the one was of no greater continuance than the other. Hayward.

That pleasure is not of greater continuance, which arises from the prejudice or malice of its hearers. Addison, Freeholder.

5. Perseverance.

To them who, by patient continuance in well-doing, seek for glory, and honour, and immortality, eternal life. Rom. ii. 7.

6. Progression of time.

In thy book all my members were written, which in continuance were fashioned. Psalm cxxxix. 16.

7. Resistance to separation of parts; continuity.

Wool, tow, cotton, and raw silk, have besides the desire of continuance in regard of the tenuity of their thread, a greediness of moisture. Bacon.

To CONTI'NUATE.* v. a. [Lat. continuo.] To join closely together. Bullokar, and Cockeram.

These four lines contained and terminated that continuating superficies and imaginary plane, which did cut the length of the wall according to right angles.

Potter on the Number 666, (1647,) p. 29.

CONTI'NUATE. adj. [continuatus, Lat.]

1. Immediately united.

We are of him and in him, even as though our very flesh and bones should be made continuate with his. Hooker, b. v.

2. Uninterrupted; unbroken.

A most incomparable man breath'd, as it were, To an untirable and continuate goodness. Shakspeare, Tim.

A clear body broken to small pieces produceth white; and becometh most black, while it is continuate and undivided, as we see in deep waters and thick glasses. Peacham.

CONTI'NUATELY. adv. [from continuate.] With continuity; without interruption.

The water ascends gently, and by intermissions; but it falls continuately, and with force. Wilkins.

CONTINUA'TION. n. s. [from continuate.] Protraction, or succession uninterrupted.

These things must needs be the works of Providence, for the continuation of the species, and upholding the world. Ray.

The Roman poem is but the second part of the Ilias: a continuation of the same story. Dryden.

CONTI'NUATIVE.† n. s. [from continuate.]

1. An expression noting permanence or duration.

To these may be added continuatives: as Rome remains to this day; which includes at least two propositions, viz. Rome was, and Rome is. Watts, Logick.

2. A grammatical conjunction.

The conjunctions which conjoin both sentences and their meanings, are either copulatives or continuatives. The principal copulative in English is and. The continuatives are if, because, therefore, that, &c. Harris, Hermes, li. 2.

CONTI'NUATOR.† n. s. [from continuate.] One that continues or keeps up the series or succession.

It seems injurious to Providence to ordain a way of production which should destroy the producer, or contrive the continuation of the species by the destruction of the continuator. Brown, Vulgar Err.

We are told by the continuator of the Saxon chronicle, that a well here continued boiling with streams of blood for several days together. Aubrey, Berk. ii. 379.

This was begun by Purbach, and carried on by Regiomontanus, the disciple, the continuator, and the perfecter of the system of Purbach. A. Smith, Hist. of Astr.

To CONTI'NUE. v. n. [continuer, Fr. continuo, Lat.]

1. To remain in the same state, or place.

The multitude continue with me now three days, and have nothing to eat. St. Matt. xv. 32.

The popular vote
Inclines here to continue, and build up here
A growing empire. Milton, P. L.

Happy, but for so happy ill secured,
Long to continue. Milton, P. L.

He six days and nights

2. To last; to be durable.

Thy kingdom shall not continue. 1 Samuel, xiii. 14.

For here have we no continuing city, but we seek one to come. Heb. xiii. 14.

They imagine that an animal of the longest duration should live in a continued motion, without that rest whereby all others continue. Brown, Vulg. Err.

3. To persevere.

If ye continue in my word, then are ye my disciples indeed. St. John, viii. 31.

Down rush'd the rain
Impetuous, and continued, till the earth
No more was seen. Milton, P. L.

To CONTI'NUE. v. a.

1. To protract, or hold without interruption.

O continue thy loving kindness unto them. Psalm xxxvi. 10.

You know how to make yourself happy, by only continuing such a life as you have been long accustomed to lead. Pope.

2. To unite without a chasm, or intervening substance.

The use of the navel is to continue the infant unto the mother, and by the vessels thereof to convey its aliments and sustenance. Brown, Vulg. Err.

The dark abyss, whose boiling gulph
Tamely endur'd a bridge of wond'rous length,
From hell continu'd reaching th' utmost orb
Of this frail world. Milton, P. L.

Here Priam's son, Deiphobus, he found,
Whose face and limbs were one continu'd wound;
Dishonest, with lop'd arms, the youth appears,
Spoil'd of his nose, and shorten'd of his ears. Dryden, Æn.

Where any motion or succession is so slow, as that it keeps not pace with the ideas in our minds, there the series of a constant continued succession is lost; and we perceive it not but with certain gaps of rest between. Locke.

CONTI'NUEDLY. adv. [from continued.] Without interruption; without ceasing.

By perseverance, I do not understand a continuedly uniform, equal course of obedience, and such as is not interrupted with the least act of sin. Norris.

CONTI'NUER.† n. s. [from continue.]

1. Having the power of perseverance.

I would my horse had the speed of your tongue, and so good a continuer. Shakspeare, Much Ado.

2. One who continues in the same state; one who promotes continuance.

The second being the great plague of spiritual desertion, inflicted on indulgent continuers in sin. Hammond, of Consc. § 64.

It is both very seasonable and methodical to represent the first founder, sustainer, and continuer thereof [the church] by this emblem; Lo, I am with you to the end of the world. More, Expos. Sev. Ch. p. 170.

CONTINU'ITY. n. s. [continuitas, Lat.]

1. Connection uninterrupted; cohesion; close union.

It is certain, that in all bodies there is an appetite of union, and evitation of solution of continuity. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

After the great lights there must be great shadows, which we call reposes, because in reality the sight would be tired, if it were attracted by a continuity of glittering objects. Dryden.

It wraps itself about the flame, and by its continuity hinders any air or nitre from coming. Addison on Italy.

2. [In physick.] That texture or cohesion of the parts of an animal body, upon the destruction of which there is said to be a solution of continuity. Quincy.

As in the natural body a wound or solution of continuity is worse than a corrupt humour, so in the spiritual. Bacon, Essays.

The solid parts may be contracted by dissolving their continuity; for a fibre, cut through, contracts itself. Arbuthnot.

CONTI'NUOUS. adj. [continuus, Lat.] Joined together without the intervention of any space.

As the breadth of every ring is thus augmented, the dark intervals must be diminished, until the neighbouring rings become continuous, and are blended. Newton, Opt.

To whose dread expanse,
Continuous depth, and wond'rous length of course,
Our floods are rills. Thomson, Summer.

CONTO'RSION.* See CONTORTION.

To CONTO'RT.† v. a. [contortus, Lat.] To twist; to writhe.

If these contorted sentences be aught worth, it is not the desertion that breaks what is broken, but the impiety. Milton, Tetrach.

The vertebral arteries are variously contorted. Ray.

Air seems to consist of spires contorted into small spheres, through the interstices of which the particles of light may freely pass. Cheyne.

CONTO'RTION.† n. s. [from contort; old Fr. contorsion; and our word is as frequently written contorsion as contortion.] Twist; wry motion; flexure.

That tongue,
Inspir'd with contradiction, durst oppose
A third part of the gods. Milton, P. L.
2. Opposition.
Consider him that endureth such contradiction of sinners against himself, lest ye be wearied. Heb. xii. 3.
3. Inconsistency with itself; incongruity in words or thoughts.
Can he make deathless death? That were to make
Strange contradiction, which to God himself
Impossible is held; as argument
Of weakness, not of power. Milton, P. L.
The apostle's advice to be angry and sin not, was a contradiction in their philosophy.
South, Serm.
If truth be once perceived, we do thereby also perceive whatsoever is false in contradiction to it.
Grew, Cosmol.
4. Contrariety, in thought or effect.
All contradictions grow in those minds, which neither absolutely climb the rock of virtue, nor freely sink into the sea of vanity. Sidney.
Laws human must be made without contradiction unto any positive law in scripture. Hooker.

CONTRADI'CTIONAL.* adj. [from contradiction.] Inconsistent.
We have tried already, and miserably felt what ambition, worldly glory, and immoderate wealth can do; what the boisterous and contradictional hand of a temporal, earthly, and corporeal spirituality can avail to the edifying of Christ's holy church. Milton, of Ref. in England.

CONTRADI'CTIOUS.† adj. [from contradict.]
1. Filled with contradictions; inconsistent.
And what might come to pass,
Implies no contradictious inconsistentness.
More, Infin. of Worlds, st. 49.
If there were more supreme agents, their decrees must still be the more absurd and contradictious to one another. Dryden, Life of Plutarch.
The rules of decency, of government, of justice itself, are so different in one place from what they are in another, so party-coloured and contradictious, that one would think the species of men altered according to their climates. Collier.
2. Inclined to contradict; given to cavil.
Bondet was argumentative, contradictious, and irascible. Bp. of Killala's Narrative, p. 54.
3. Opposite to; inconsistent with.
Where the act is unmanly, and the expectation immoral, or contradictious to the attributes of God our hopes we ought never to entertain. Collier.

CONTRADI'CTIOUSNESS. n. s. [from contradictious.]
1. Inconsistency; contrariety to itself.

This opinion was for its absurdity and contradictiousness, unworthy of the refined spirit of Plato. Norris.

2. Disposition to cavil; disputatious temper.

CONTRADI'CTORILY. adv. [from contradictory.] Inconsistently with himself; oppositely to others.

Such as have discoursed hereon, have so diversely, contrarily, or contradictorily delivered themselves, that no affirmative from thence can be reasonably deduced. Brown.

CONTRADI'CTORINESS.† n. s. [from contradictory.] Opposition in the highest degree.

This objection from the contradictoriness of our dreams, sounds big at first, and seems very unpromising to be accounted for.

Baxter, Enq. into the Soul, ii. 180.

CONTRADI'CTORY. adj. [contradictorius, Latin.]

1. Opposite to; inconsistent with.

The Jews hold, that in case two rabbies should happen to contradict one another, they were yet bound to believe the contradictory assertions of both. South, Serm.

The schemes of those gentlemen are most absurd, and contradictory to common sense.

Addison, Freeholder.

2. [In logick.] That which is in the fullest opposition, where both the terms of one proposition are opposite to those of another.

CONTRADI'CTORY. n. s. A proposition which opposes another in all its terms; contrariety; inconsistency.

It is common with princes to will contradictories; for it is the solecism of power to think to command the end, and yet not to endure the means. Bacon.

To ascribe unto him a power of election, not to chuse this or that indifferently, is to make the same thing to be determined to one, and to be not determined to one, which are contradictories.

Bp. Bramhall, Answ. to Hobbes.

CONTRADISTI'NCT.* adj. [from contradistinguish.] Distinguished by opposite qualities.

The grasshoppers and capers are in their form and fashion, their substance and consistence, clean contrary one to another; the one, being protuberous, rough, crusty, and hard; the other, round, smooth, spongy, and soft: and therefore may be very fit emblems to represent the several contradistinct parts of the body, under the same variety of consistence. Smith's Portraiture of Old Age, p. 183.

CONTRADISTI'NCTION. n. s. [from contradistinguish.] Distinction by opposite qualities.

We must trace the soul in the ways of intellectual actions, whereby we may come to the distinct knowledge of what is meant by imagination, in contradistinction to some other powers.

Glanvill, Scepsis.

That there are such things as sins of infirmity, in contradistinction to those of presumption, is a truth not to be questioned. South.

CONTRADISTI'NCTIVE.* adj. [from contradistinct.] That marks contradistinction.

The diversity between the contradistinctive pronouns and the enclitic, is not unknown even to the English tongue. Harris, Herm. i. 5.

To CONTRADISTI'NGUISH.† v. a. [from contra and distinguish.] To distinguish not simply by differential but by opposite qualities. Used with to and from; but generally with to.

The descent into hell, as it now stands in the Creed, signifieth something commenced after Christ's death, contradistinguished to his burial.

Pearson on the Creed, Art. V.

The soul of Christ contradistinguished from his body. Ibid.

By flesh, or flesh and blood, especially when contradistinguished to the spirit, is commonly meant, not human nature simply considered; but human nature thus corrupted, or sinful flesh.

Wallis, Serm. at Oxf. 1682, p. 12.

Christ's active obedience they do contradistinguish to what they call negative justification, which they refer to the passive obedience of Christ.

Ibid. p. 15.

The primary ideas we have peculiar to body, as contradistinguished to spirit, are the cohesion of solid, and consequently separable parts, and a power of communicating motion by impulse.

Locke.

These are our complex ideas of soul and body as contradistinguished. Locke.

CONTRAFI'SSURE. n. s. [from contra and fissure.]

Contusions, when great, do usually produce a fissure or crack of the scull, either in the same part where the blow was inflicted, and then it is called fissure; or in the contrary part, in which case it obtains the name of contrafissure. Wiseman.

CONTRAI'NDICANT.* n. s. [contra and indicans, Lat. See To CONTRAINDICATE.] A symptom forbidding the usual treatment of the disorder.

Throughout it was full of contraindicants. Burke.

To CONTRAI'NDICATE. v. a. [contra and indico, Lat.] To point out some peculiar or incidental symptom or method of cure, contrary to what the general tenour of the malady requires.

Vomits have their use in this malady; but the age and sex of the patient, or other urgent or contraindicating symptoms must be observed.

Harvey on Consumptions.

CONTRAINDICA'TION. n. s. [from contraindicate.] An indication or symptom, which forbids that to be done which the main scope of a disease points out at first. Quincy.

I endeavour to give the most simple idea of the distemper, and the proper diet, abstracting from the complications of the first, or the contraindications to the second. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

CO'NTRAMURE. n. s. [contremur, French.] In fortification, is an out wall built about the main wall of a city. Chambers.

CONTRANI'TENCY. n. s. [from contra and nitens, Lat.] Reaction; a resistency against pressure. Dict.

CONTRANA'TURAL.* adj. [contra and natural.] Opposite to nature; unnatural.

'Tis the perfection of every being to act according to the principle of its own nature; and it is the nature of an arbitrarious principle to act or not, to do or undo, upon no account but its own will and pleasure: to be determined and tied up, either by itself, or from abroad, is violent and contranatural. Bp. Rust, Disc. on Truth, § 6.

To CONTRAPO'SE.* v. a. [Lat. contrapositus.] To place against; to set in opposition.

We may manifestly see contraposed death and life, justice and injustice, condemnation and justification. Salkeld's Treat. of Paradise, 1617, p. 235.

CONTRAPOSI'TION. n. s. [from contra and position.] A placing over against.

Many other things might here be alleged to shew how exact and exquisite an antithesis and contraposition there is between the apostles and cardinals. Potter on the Numb. 666. p. 91.

If I have spoken more than needs concerning the opposition, or contraposition, of things in general, I have therefore done it, because I am fully persuaded, &c. Potter on the Numb. 666. p. 122.

The extremities of which are no other than the last contraposition or opposition to God, in the state of death. Cabalistical Dialogue. (1682,) p. 16.

CONTRAPU'NTIST.* n. s. [from the Ital. contrappunto, counterpoint, in musick, i. e. contra-point. See COUNTERPOINT.] One who is skilled in counterpoint.

Counterpoint is certainly so much an art, that to be, what they call, a learned contrapuntist, is with harmonists a title of no small excellence.

Mason on Ch. Mus. p. 209.

CONTRAREGULA'RITY. n. s. [from contra and regularity.] Contrariety to rule.

It is not only its not promoting, but its opposing, or at least its natural aptness to oppose the greatest and best of ends; so that it is not so properly an irregularity as a contraregularity.

Norris.

CONTRA'RIANT.† adj. [contrariant, from contrarier, French.] Inconsistent; contradictory: a term of law, Dr. Johnson says; but it is also a general word, used by an admirable author, in the sense of opposite, repugnant. In its legal sense, it is also of much higher athority than Ayliffe, whom alone Dr. Johnson cites.

Such canons, &c. as be not contrariant nor repugnant to the laws, statutes, and customs of this realm. Acts of Parl. 25 H. 8. c. 19.

The Christian religion contained precepts far more ungrateful and troublesome to flesh and blood, and contrariant to the general inclination of mankind. Pearson on the Creed, Art. II.

The very depositions of witnesses themselves, being false, various, contrariant, single, inconcludent. Ayliffe's Parergon.

CO'NTRARIES. n. s. [from contrary.] In logick, propositions which destroy each other; but of which the falshood of one does not establish the truth of the other.

If two universals differ in quality, they are contraries; as, every vine is a tree, no vine is a tree. These can never be both true together, but they may be both false. Watts, Logick.

CONTRARI'ETY. n. s. [from contrarietas, Latin.]

1. Repugnance; opposition.

The will about one and the same thing may, in contrary respects, have contrary inclinations, and that without contrariety. Hooker.

Making a contrariety the place of my memory, in her foulness I beheld Pamela's fairness, still looking on Mopsa, but thinking on Pamela. Sidney.

He which will perfectly recover a sick and restore a diseased body unto health, must not endeavour so much to bring it to a state of simple contrariety, as of fit proportion in contrariety unto those evils which are to be cured. Hooker.

It principally failed by late setting out, and by some contrariety of weather at sea. Wotton.

Their religion had more than negative contrariety to virtue. Decay of Piety.

There is a contrariety between those things that conscience inclines to, and those that entertain the senses. South.

These two interests it is to be feared, cannot be divided; but they will also prove opposite, and not resting in a bare diversity, quickly rise into a contrariety. South.

There is nothing more common than contrariety of opinions; nothing more obvious than that one man wholly disbelieves what another only doubts of, and a third stedfastly believes and firmly adheres to. Locke.

2. Inconsistency; quality or position destructive of its opposite.

He will be here, and yet he is not here;
How can these contrarieties agree? Shaks Hen. IV.

CONTRA'RILY. adv. [from contrary.]

1. In a manner contrary.

Many of them conspire to one and the same action, and all this contrarily to the laws of specifick gravity, in whatever posture the body be formed. Ray on the Creation.

2. Different ways; in different directions.

Though all men desire happiness, yet their wills carry them so contrarily, and consequently some of them to what is evil. Locke.

CONTRA'RINESS. n. s. [from contrary.] Contrariety; opposition. Dict.

CONTRA'RIOUS.† adj. [from contrary.] Opposite; repugnant the one to the other.

Malice — is contrarious and repugnant to benevolence. Sir T. Elyot, Gov. fol. 109.

God of our fathers, what is man!
That Thou towards him, with hand so various,
Or might I say contrarious,
Temper'st thy providence through this short course? Milton, S. A.

CONTRA'RIOUSLY. adv. [from contrarious.] Oppositely; contrarily

Many things, having full reference
To one consent, may work contrariously.
Shakspeare, Hen. V.

CO'NTRARIWISE. adv. [contrary and wise.]

1. Conversely.

Divers medicines in greater quantity move stool, and in smaller urine; and so, contrariwise, some in greater quantity move urine, and in smaller stool. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

Every thing that acts upon the fluids, must, at the same time, act upon the solids, and contrariwise. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

2. Oppositely.

The matter of faith is constant, the matter, contrariwise, of actions daily changeable. Hooker.

This request was never before made by any other lords; but, contrariwise, they were humble suitors to have the benefit and protection of the English laws. Davies on Ireland.

The sun may set and rise:
But we, contrariwise,
Sleep, after our short light,
One everlasting night. Ralegh, Hist. of the World.

CO'NTRARY.† adj. [contrarius, Latin. The accent on this word was formerly on the first or second syllable, as suited the convenience of our poets. Even Milton presents both accents. See Par. Lost, i. 161. Samson Agonist. 971. The word is still vulgarly pronounced with the accent on the second syllable.]

1. Opposite; contradictory; not simply different, or not alike, but repugnant, so that one destroys, or obstructs the other.

Perhaps some thing, repugnant to her kind,
By strong antipathy the soul may kill;
But what can be contrary to the mind,
Which holds all contraries in concord still. Davies.

2. Inconsistent; disagreeing.

He that believes it, and yet lives contrary to it, knows that he hath no reason for what he does. Tillotson.

The various and contrary choices that men make in the world, do not argue that they do not all pursue good; but that the same thing is not good to every man alike. Locke.

3. Adverse; in opposite direction.

The ship was in the midst of the sea, tossed with the waves; for the wind was contrary.
St. Matt. xiv. 24.

By virtue of a clean contrary gale.
Habington's Castara, p. 116.

CO'NTRARY. n. s. [from the adjective.]

1. A thing of opposite qualities.

No contraries hold more antipathy,
Than I and such a knave. Shakspeare, K. Lear.

He sung
Why contraries feed thunder in the cloud.
Cowley, Davideis.

Honour should be concern'd in honour's cause;
That is not to be cur'd by contraries,
As bodies are, whose health is often drawn
From rankest poisons, Southern's Oroonoko.

2. A proposition contrary to some other; a fact contrary to the allegation.

The instances brought by our author are but slender proofs of a right to civil power and dominion in the first-born, and do rather shew the contrary. Locke.

3. On the CONTRARY. In opposition; on the other side.

He pleaded still not guilty:
The king's attorney, on the contrary,
Urg'd on examinations, proofs, confessions
Of diverse witnesses. Shakspeare, Henry VIII.

If justice stood on the side of the single person, it ought to give good men pleasure to see that right should take place; but when, on the contrary, the commonweal of a whole nation is overborn by private interest, what good man but must lament? Swift.

4. To the CONTRARY. To a contrary purpose; to an opposite intent.

They did it not for want of instruction to the contrary. Stillingfleet.

To CO'NTRARY.† v. a. [contrarier, French.] To oppose; to thwart; to contradict.

When I came to court I was advised not to contrary the king. Latimer.

Finding in him the force of it, he would no further contrary it, but employ all his service to medicine it. Sidney.

You must contrary me! marry, 'tis time.
Shakspeare, Rom. and Jul.

If they could have contraried him for any falsity. Donne, Hist. of the Sept. p. 217.

CONTRARY-MINDED.* adj. [from contrary and mind.] Of a different opinion.

We are ready to impute to the contrary-minded not only those things which they profess to hold, but these which we conceive to be consequent to their opinions. Bp. Hall, The Peacemaker.

CO'NTRAST.† n. s. [contraste, Fr.] Opposition and dissimilitude of figures, by which one contributes to the visibility or effect of another.

Longinus says, that Cecilius wrote of the sublime in a low way: on the contrary, Mr. Pope calls Longinus "the great sublime he draws." Let it be my ambition to imitate Longinus in style and sentiment; and, like Cecilius, to make these appear a contrast to my subject; to write of deformity with beauty; and by a finished piece to atone for an ill-turned person.
Hay, Essay on Deformity, p. 3.

Those umbrageous pines,
That frown in front, and give each azure hill
The charm of contrast. Mason, English Garden.

To CO'NTRAST. v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To place in opposition, so that one figure shews another to advantage.

2. To shew another figure to advantage by its colour or situation.

The figures of the groups must not be all on a side, that is, with their face and bodies all turned the same way; but must contrast each other by their several positions. Dryden.

CONTRATE'NOR.* n. s. [from contra and tenor, in contradistinction to the tenor part; written also countertenor.] In musick, the middle part; higher than the tenor, and below the treble.

In his [Dr. Croft's] time there was a very fine contratenor in the Royal Chapel, called Elford, to whom, in the preface to his anthems, he gives great, and I suppose deserved applause, and for whose voice he purposely set several solos.
Mason on Church Musick, p. 136.

CONTRAVALLA'TION. n. s. [from contra and vallo, Latin.] The fortification thrown up, by the besiegers, round a city, to hinder the sallies of the garrison.

When the late czar of Muscovy first acquainted himself with mathematical learning, he practised all the rules of circumvallation and contravallation at the siege of a town in Livonia. Watts, Logick.

To CONTRAVE'NE.† v. a. [contra and venio, Lat.] To oppose; to obstruct; to baffle.

This unfortunate accident did both contravene and overmatch the counsels of a hundred wise men. Hacket's Life of Abp. Williams, 1693, P. I. p. 137.

Laws, that place the subjects in such a state, contravene the first principles of the compact of authority: they exact obedience and yield no protection. Johnson, Journey to the West. Islands.

CONTRAVE'NER. n. s. [from contravene.] One who opposes another.

CONTRAVE'NTION,† n. s. [French.] Opposition.

They shall voluntarily accept the condition and fulmination of the said censures, in case of contravention. Ld. Herbert, Hist. of H. VIII. p. 191.

There may be holy contradictions and humble contraventions, (as to God's silent providence, so to his declared will,) either discovered by effects, or by his express word.
Bp. Taylor, Artif. Hands. p. 57.

If christianity did not lend its name to stand in the gap, and to employ or divert these humours, they must of necessity be spent in contraventions to the laws of the land. Swift.

CONTRAVE'RSION.* n. s. [Lat. contra and versio.] A turning to the opposite side.

The second stanza was called the antistrophe from the contraversion of the chorus; the singers, in performing that, turning from the left hand to the right. Congreve.

CONTRAYE'RVA.† n. s. [contra, against, and yerva, a name by which the Spaniards call black hellebore; and, perhaps, sometimes poison in general.] A species of birthwort growing in Jamaica, where it is much used as an alexipharmick. Miller.

No Indian is so savage, but that he knows the use of his tobacco and contrayerva.
Bp. Hall, Select Thoughts, § 51.

CONTRECTA'TION.† n. s. [contrectatio, Lat.] A touching or handling. Dict.

The greatest danger of all is, in the contrectation and touching of their hands.
Ferrand's Love Melancholy, (1640,) p. 254.

CONTRI'BUTARY. adj. [from con and tributary.] Paying tribute to the same sovereign.

Thus we are engaged in the objects of geometry and arithmetick; yea, the whole mathematicks must be contributary, and to them all nature pays a subsidy. Glanville, Scepsis.

To CONTRI'BUTE.† v. a. [contribuo, Latin. Formerly accented on the first syllable.] To give to some common stock; to advance towards some common design.

Yet scarce to contribute
Each orb a glimpse of light. Milton, P. L. vii. 155.

England contributes much more than any other of the allies. Addison on the War.

His master contributed a great sum of money to the Jesuits' church, which is not yet quite finished. Addison on Italy.

To CONTRI'BUTE.† v. n. To bear a part; to have a share in any act or effect.

Their several shares of woe
Must contribute to Philip's overthrow.
May, Edw. III. 1635, B. 3.

Whatever praises may be given to works of judgement, there is not even a single beauty in them to which the invention must not contribute. Pope, Ess. on Homer.

CONTRI'BUTER.* See CONTRI'BUTOR.

CONTRIBU'TION.† n. s. [old Fr. contribution.]

1. The act of promoting some design in conjunction with other persons.
2. That which is given by several hands for some common purpose.

It hath pleased them of Macedonia to make a certain contribution for the poor saints. Rom. xv. 26.

Parents owe their children not only material subsistence for their body, but much more spiritual contributions for their mind. Digby.

Beggars are now maintained by voluntary contributions. Graunt, Bills of Mortality.

3. That which is paid for the support of an army lying in a country.

The people 'twixt Philippi and this ground,
Do stand but in a forc'd affection;
For they have grudg'd us contribution.
Shakspeare, Jul. Cæs.

CONTRI'BUTIVE.† adj. [from contribute.] That has the power or quality of promoting any purpose in concurrence with other motives.

As the value of the promises renders them most proper incentives to virtue, so the manner of proposing we shall find also highly contributive to the same end. Decay of Piety.

In the matter of beauty, we challenge to ourselves something as contributive to handsomeness, which is not our's by a native, personal, and individual title. Bp. Taylor, Artif. Hands. p. 99.

CONTRI'BUTOR.† n. s. [written contributer by Cotgrave; old Fr. contributeur.] One that bears a part in some common design; one that helps forward, or exerts his endeavours to some end, in conjunction with others.

I promis'd we would be contributors,
And bear his charge of wooing, whatsoe'er. Shaks.

A grand contributor to our dissentions is passion. Decay of Piety.

Art thou a true lover of thy country? Zealous for its religious and civil liberties? And a chearful contributor to all those publick expences which have been thought necessary to secure them? Atterbury.

The whole people were witnesses to the building of the ark and tabernacle, they were all contributers to it. Forbes.

CONTRI'BUTORY,† adj. [from contribute.] Promoting the same end; bringing assistance to some joint design, or increase to some common stock.

Like bonfires of contributory wood,
Every man's look shew'd, fed with others' spirit.
Chapman, Bussy D'Ambois.

To CONTRI'STATE.† v. a. [contristo, Lat.] To sadden; to make sorrowful; to make melancholy. Not now used.

Blackness and darkness are but privatives, and therefore have little or no activity: somewhat they do contristate, but very little. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

Let me never more contristate thy Holy Spirit with these vanities. Spiritual Conquest, (1651,) P. i. p. 64.

CONTRISTA'TION.† n. s. [from contristate.] The act of making sad; the state of being made sad; sorrow; heaviness of heart; sadness; sorrowfulness; gloominess; grief; moan; mournfulness; trouble; discontent; melancholy. Not now used.

Incense and nidorous smells, such as were of sacrifices, were thought to intoxicate the brain, and to dispose men to devotion; which they may do by a kind of sadness and contristation of the spirits, and partly also by heating and exalting them. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

The Eastern traditioners mean by this a continual sadness and contristation of heart, which Adam had, and made, for the loss of Paradise. Gregory's Works, p. 123.

The husband, tender and pusillanimous, falleth into pangs of fears and contristation. Robinson's Endox. of Sympathy, p. 41.

CO'NTRITE.† adj. [contritus, Lat. This word formerly had the accent on either syllable; the example from Shakspeare presenting it on the first; that from Milton, on the last. It is now usually pronounced with the accent on the first.]

1. Bruised; much worn.
2. Worn with sorrow; harassed with the sense of guilt; penitent. In the books of divines contrite is sorrowful for sin, from the love of God and desire of pleasing him; and attrite is sorrowful for sin, from the fear of punishment.

I Richard's body have interred now;
And on it have bestow'd more contrite tears,
Than from it issu'd forced drops of blood.
Shakspeare, Hen. V.

With tears
Wat'ring the ground, and with our sighs the air
Frequenting, sent from hearts contrite, in sign
Of sorrow unfeign'd, and humiliation meek.
Milton, P. L.

The contrite sinner is restored to pardon, and, through faith in Christ, our repentance is intitled to salvation. Rogers.

CONTRI'TENESS. n. s. [from contrite.] Contrition; repentance. Dict.

CONTRI'TION.† n. s. [from contrite.]

1. The act of grinding; or rubbing to powder.

Some of those coloured powders, which painters use, may have their colours a little changed, by being very elaborately and finely ground; where I see not what can be justly pretended for those changes, besides the breaking of their parts into less parts by that contrition. Newton, Opt.

2. Penitence; sorrow for sin: in the strict sense, the sorrow which is felt at the apprehension of having displeased God; distinguished from attrition, or imperfect repentance produced by dread of hell.

What is sorrow and contrition for sin? A being grieved with the conscience of sin, not only that we have thereby incurred such danger, but also that we have so unkindly grieved and provoked so good a God. Hammond, Pract. Cat.

Fruits of more pleasing savour, from thy seed
Sown with contrition in his heart, than those
Which, his own hand manuring, all the trees
Of paradise could have produc'd. Milton, P. L.

Your fasting, contrition, and mortification, when the church and state appoints, and that especially in times of greater riot and luxury. Sprat, Serm.

My future days shall be one whole contrition;
A chapel will I build with large endowment,
Where every day an hundred aged men
Shall all hold up their wither'd hands to heav'n.
Dryden.

CONTRI'VABLE. adj. [from contrive.] Possible to be planned by the mind; possible to be invented and adjusted.

It will hence appear how a perpetual motion may seem easily contrivable. Wilkins, Dædalus.

CONTRI'VANCE. n. s. [from contrive.]

1. The act of contriving; excogitation; the thing contrived.

There is no work impossible to these contrivances, but there may be as much acted by this art as can be fancied by imagination. Wilkins, Math. Mag.

Instructed, you'll explore
Divine contrivance, and a God adore.
Blackmore, Creation.

2. Scheme; plan; disposition of parts or causes.

Our bodies are made according to the most curious artifice, and orderly contrivance. Glanville, Scepsis.

3. A conceit; a plot; an artifice.

Have I not manag'd my contrivance well,
To try your love, and make you doubt of mine?
Dryden.

There might be a feint, a contrivance in the matter, to draw him into some secret ambush. Atterbury.

To CONTRI'VE.† v. a. [controuver, Fr.]

1. To plan out; to excogitate.

One that slept in the contriving lust, and waked to do it. Shakspeare, K. Lear.

What more likely to contrive this admirable frame of the universe than infinite wisdom. Tillotson.

Our poet has always some beautiful design, which he first establishes, and then contrives the means which will naturally conduct him to his end. Dryden.

2. To wear away. Out of use. [Lat. contero, contrivi.]

Three ages, such as mortal men contrive. Spenser, F. Q.

Please ye, we may contrive this afternoon,
And quaff carouses to our mistress' health.
Shakspeare, Tam. of the Shrew.

To CONTRI'VE. v. n. To form or design; to plan; to scheme; to complot.

Is it enough
That masking habits and a borrowed name,
Contrive to hide my plenitude of shame? Prior.

CONTRI'VEMENT.† n. s. [from contrive.] Invention. Dict.

The king being not only active to meet their contrivements, but had some advantage upon them. Sir G. Buck, Hist. of Rich. III. p. 43.

To sit down and consider the admirable contrivement and artifice of this great fabrick of the universe. Glanville, Pre-exist. of Souls, p. 176.

CONTRI'VER. n. s. [from contrive.] An inventer; one that plans a design; a schemer.

I, the mistress of your charms,
The close contriver of all harms,
Was never call'd to bear my part. Shaks. Macbeth.

Epeus, who the fraud's contriver was. Denham.

Plain loyalty, not built on hope,
I leave to your contriver, Pope:
None loves his king and country better,
Yet none was ever less their debtor. Swift.

Scenes of blood and desolation, I had painted as the common effects of those destructive machines; whereof, he said, some evil genius, enemy to mankind, must have been the first contriver. Swift, Gul. Trav.

CONTROL. n. s. [controle, that is, contre role, French.]

1. A register or account kept by another officer, that each may be examined by the other.
2. Check; restraint.

Let partial spirits still aloud complain,
Think themselves injur'd that they cannot reign;

And own no liberty, but where they may,
Without control, upon their fellows prey. Waller.

He shall feel a force upon himself from within, and from the control of his own principles, to engage him to do worthily. South.

If the sinner shall win so complete a victory over his conscience, that all those considerations shall be able to strike no terrour into his mind, lay no restraint upon his lusts, no control upon his appetites, he is certainly too strong for the means of grace. South, Serm.

Speak, what Phœbus has inspir'd thy soul
For common good, and speak without control.
Dryden, Homer.

3. Power; authority; superintendence.

The beasts, the fishes, and the winged fowls,
Are their male's subjects, and at their controls.
Shakspeare.

To CONTRO'L.† v. a. [from the noun, Dr. Johnson says; but it is from the old Fr. verb, contreroller. V. Cotgrave.]

1. To keep under check by a counter reckoning.

2. To govern; to restrain; to subject.

Authority to convent, to control, to punish, as far as with excommunication, whomsoever they think worthy. Hooker, Pref.

Give me a staff of honour for mine age;
But not a sceptre to control the world.
Titus Andronicus.

Who shall control me for my works? Eccl. v. 3.

I feel my virtue struggling in my soul:
But stronger passion does its pow'r control.
Dryden, Aurengz.

With this he did a herd of goats control,
Which by the way he met, and slily stole;
Clad like country swain he pip'd and sung,
And playing drove his jolly troop along. Dryden.

O, dearest Andrew, says the humble droll,
Henceforth may I obey, and thou control. Prior.

3. To overpower; to confute: as, he controlled all the evidence of his adversary.

As for the time while he was in the Tower, and the manner of his brother's death, and his own escape, she knew they were things that a very few could control. Bacon, Hen. VII.

CONTRO'LLABLE. adj. [from control.] Subject to control; subject to command; subject to be overruled.

Passion is the drunkenness of the mind, and therefore, in its present workings, not controllable by reason. South.

CONTRO'LLER.† n. s. [old Fr. contrerolleur.] One that has the power of governing or restraining; a superintendent.

He does not calm his contumelious spirit,
Nor cease to be an arrogant controller.
Shakspeare, Hen. VI.

Shall the controller of proud Nemesis
In lawless rage upbraid each other's vice?
Bp. Hall, Sat. vi. 1.

They were driven to have their nomenclators, controllers, or remembrancers, to tell them the names of their servants and people about them, so many they were. Hakewill on Providence, p. 421.

The great controller of our fate,
Deign'd to be man, and liv'd in low estate. Dryd.

CONTRO'LLERSHIP. n. s. [from controller.] The office of a controller.

CONTRO'LMENT.† n. s. [from control.]

1. The power or act of superintending or restraining.

It is an excellent thing to have a giant's strength; yet where it is, let it be so tempered, that law stoop not to every governour's humour and controlment. Sir M. Sandys, Ess. (1634,) p. 123.

2. The state of being restrained; restraint.

They made war and peace with one another, without controlment. Davies on Ireland.

3. Opposition; confutation.

Were it reason that we should suffer the same to pass without controlment, in that current meaning whereby every where it prevaileth. Hooker, iii. § 7.

4. Resistance; hostility.

Here have we war for war, and blood for blood,
Controlment for controlment. Shakspeare, K. John.

CONTROVE'RSARY.* adj. [from controverse.] Disputatious.

These controversary points I have rather crost in my way, than taken along with me. Bp. Hall, to his Dioc. Works, ii. 370.

CO'NTROVERSE.* n. s. [old Fr. controverse.] Debate; controversy; dispute.

So fitly now here commith next in place,
After the proofe of Prowesse ended well,
The controverse of Beautie's soveraine grace.
Spenser, F. Q. iv. v. 2.

For he the appeal of innocence derides,
And with his sword the controverse decides.
Sandys, Paraph. of Job, p. 15.

Come, buckle on thy armour; let us end
This controverse, since thou wilt needs contend.
Ibid. p. 55.

The controverse of life and death
Is arbitrated by his breath. Sandys, Ps. p. 106.

To CO'NTROVERSE.* v. a. [from the noun.] To dispute; to debate. See To CONTROVERT.

Persuasion ought to be fully settled in men's hearts that in litigations, and controversed causes of such quality, the will of God is to have them to do whatsoever the sentence of judicial and final decision shall determine. Hooker.

In exact discussing of all controversed questions. Sir E. Sandys, State of Religion.

CONTROVE'RSIAL. adj. [from controversy.] Relating to disputes; disputatious.

It happens in controversial discourses as it does in the assaulting of towns, where, if the ground be but firm whereon the batteries are erected, there is no farther enquiry whom it belongs to, so it affords but a fit rise for the present purpose. Locke.

CONTROVE'RSIALIST.* n. s. [from controversial. This is a modern word; and it is curious to observe, that heretofore it was controverser, controversor, and controverter, and even controversy-writer; none of which have hitherto been noticed.] One who is engaged in literary war; a disputant.

The translators should be philologists, and not controversialists. Abp. Newcome, Hist. View of Eng. Tr. of the Bible, p. 349.

In 1550 he [Robert Crowley] printed the first edition of Pierce Plowman's Vision, but with the ideas of a controversialist, and with the view of helping forward the reformation by the revival of a book which exposed the absurdities of popery in strong satire. Warton, Hist. of Eng. Poetry, iii. 187.

Marcion, a rash and wild controversialist, published a recension, or chastised edition of St. Luke's Gospel. Paley's View of the Evid. of Chris. i. 9. § 7.

CO'NTROVERSER.* } n. s. [Lat. controver-
CO'NTROVERSOR. } sus.] A disputant; a controvertist.

Thus saith the controversor. Mountagu, App. to Cæs. p. 91.

In which place, boulted before to the bran by many controversers, mine adversary hath learned of his Bellarmine to triumph above measure. Bp. Hall, Hon. of the Marr. Clergy, p. 29.

CONTROVE'RSILESS.* adj. [controversy and less.] Not admitting controversy; questionless.

This matter being controversiless, that tithes predial and personal belong to churchmen. Tooker's Fab. of the Ch. 1604, p. 30.

CO'NTROVERSY. n. s. [controversia, Latin.]

1. Dispute; debate; agitation of contrary opinions: a dispute is commonly oral, and a controversy in writing.

How cometh it to pass that we are so rent with mutual contentions, and that the church is so much troubled? If men had been willing to learn, all these controversies might have died the very day they were first brought forth. Hooker, b. 1.

Without controversy great is the mystery of godliness. 1 Tim.

Wild controversy then, which long had slept,
Into the press from ruin'd cloisters leapt. Denham.

This left no room for controversy about the title, nor for encroachment on the right of others. Locke.

2. A suit in law.

If there be a controversy between men, and they come unto judgement, that the judges may judge them, then they shall justify the righteous and condemn the wicked. Deut. xxv. 1.

3. A quarrel.

The Lord hath a controversy with the nations. Jer. xxv. 31.

4. Opposition; enmity. This is an unusual sense.

The torrent roar'd, and we did buffet it
With lusty sinews; throwing it aside,
And stemming it with hearts of controversy.
Shakspeare, Jul. Cæs.

CO'NTROVERSY-WRITER.* n. s. He who is now a controversialist, or controvertist.

Their schoolmen, casuists, and controversy-writers have so mixed Aristotle's philosophy with their divinity. Bp. Barlow, Rem. p. 169.

To CO'NTROVERT.† v. a. [controverto, Lat. This verb, in our old dictionaries, is defined, to strive, to contend, or be at variance about a matter; not confining the meaning, as Dr. Johnson confines it, to literary dispute. Controverse, which he had introduced under this word as perhaps intended for controvert, is a true word, and no mistake of Hooker's. See To CONTROVERSE.] To debate; to ventilate in opposite books; to dispute any thing in writing.

If any person shall think fit to controvert them, he may do it very safely for me. Cheyne, Phil. Prin.

CO'NTROVERTER.* n. s. [from controvert.] A disputant; a controversialist.

Some controverters in divinity are like swaggerers in a tavern, that catch that which stands next them, the candlestick or pots. B. Jonson, Discov.

In divinity
As controverters in vouch'd texts leave out
Shrewd words, which might against them clear the doubt. Donne, Poems, p. 125.

CONTROVE'RTIBLE. adj. [from controvert.] Disputable; that may be the cause of controversy.

Discoursing of matters dubious, and many controvertible truths, we cannot without arrogancy intreat a credulity, or implore any farther assent than the probability of our reasons and verity of our experiments. Brown, Vulg. Err.

CO'NTROVERTIST. n. s. [from controvert.] Disputant; a man versed or engaged in literary wars or disputations.

Who can think himself so considerable as not to dread this mighty man of demonstration, this prince of controvertists, this great lord and possessor of first principles. Tillotson.

CONTUMA'CIOUS. adj. [contumax, Latin.] Obstinate; perverse; stubborn; inflexible.

He is in law said to be a contumacious person, who, on his appearance afterwards, departs the court without leave. Ayliffe's Parergon.

There is another very efficacious method for subduing of the most obstinate contumacious sinner, and bringing him into the obedience of the faith of Christ. Hammond, Fundamentals.

CONTUMA'CIOUSLY. adv. [from contumacious.] Obstinately; stubbornly; inflexibly; perversely.

CONTUMA'CIOUSNESS. n. s. [from contumacious.] Obstinacy; perverseness; inflexibility; stubbornness.

From the description I have given of it, a judgement may be given of the difficulty and contumaciousness of cure. Wiseman.

CO'NTUMACY. n. s. [from contumacia, Latin.]

1. Obstinacy; perverseness; stubbornness; inflexibility.

Such acts
Of contumacy will provoke the Highest
To make death in us live. Milton, P. L.

2. [In law.] A wilful contempt and disobedience to any lawful summons or judicial order. Ayliffe's Parergon.

These certificates do only, in the generality, mention the party's contumacies and disobedience. Ayliffe's Parergon.

CONTUME'LIOUS. adj. [contumeliosus, Lat.]

1. Reproachful; rude; sarcastick; contemptuous.

With scoffs and scorns, and contumelious taunts,
In open market-place produc'd they me
To be a publick spectacle. Shakspeare, Hen. VI.

In all the quarrels and tumults at Rome, though the people frequently proceeded to rude contumelious language, yet no blood was ever drawn in any popular commotions, 'till the time of the Gracchi. Swift.

2. Inclined to utter reproach or practise insults; brutal; rude.

There is yet another sort of contumelious persons, who, indeed, are not chargeable with that circumstance of ill employing their wit; for they use none in it. Gov. of the Tongue.

Giving our holy virgins to the stain
Of contumelious, beastly, madbrain'd war.
Shakspeare, Timon.

3. Productive of reproach; shameful; ignominious.
